mansion house, situate, lying, and being at Deptford in our county of Kent, and heretofore occupied and enjoyed with the said office; together with all and singular edifices, barns, stables, curtilages, gardens, orchards, and all other the appurtenances to the said messuage belonging or appertaining, or heretofore used, occupied, and enjoyed with the same, to have, hold, and occupy the said messuage or mansion house, with all the appurtenances, unto the said Henry Dundas, so long as he shall exercise the said office; together with all and singular sums of money usually allowed for the hiring of boats and skiffs: and further of our more abundant especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, we have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant unto the said Henry Dundas, for the exercise and occupation of the said office, and for and in satisfaction of all wages and fees of three-pence of lawful money for every pound to be received and paid by the said Henry Dundas by virtue of his said office, an annuity or yearly payment of two thousand pounds of good and lawful money of Great Britain, and also an annual sum or allowance of one thousand and seven hundred pounds of like lawful money of Great Britain, for the wages and salaries of the paymaster, cashier, and accountant, and other officers and clerks in any manner substituted and deputed, or to be substituted and deputed under him the said Henry Dundas in the said office, and to be distributed amongst them, as the said Henry Dundas shall see fit; to have and yearly to receive and retain the said annuity or yearly payment of two thousand pounds, and also the said annual sum or allowance of one thousand and seven hundred pounds by himself out of our treasure remaining in his hands; the first payment thereof to be computed by the day from the day of the date of these our letters patent, and to be taken and retained at and for the feast of St. Michael the Archangel next ensuing, and from thence to be taken and retained at the four most usual feasts in the year, to wit, the feasts of the birth of our Lord Christ, the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist, and Saint Michael the Archangel, by even and equal portions during our pleasure:—and further, we will, and by these presents do grant to the said Henry Dundas, that he shall and may have, possess, and enjoy the said office, and also the said messuage or mansion house, with the appurtenances and the several and respective annuities and annual sums of two thousand pounds and one thousand and seven hundred pounds, and other the premises by these presents granted or mentioned to be granted, in as ample manner and form as the said Isaac Barré, or any other person or persons lately had or received, or ought to have had or received the said office and mansion house with the appurtenances, and the several annual sums before-mentioned, or any of them: lastly, We will, and by these presents grant to the said Henry Dundas, that these our letters patent, or the inrolment thereof, shall be in and by all things good, firm, valid, sufficient, and effectual in the law, notwithstanding the not truly or fully reciting the said former letters patent of the office, and premises aforesaid, or the date thereof, or any other omission, imperfection, defect, matter, cause, or thing, whatsoever, to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding: In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent: Witness ourself at Westminster the nineteenth day of August, in the twenty-second year of our reign.

“ By writ of privy seal,

“ WILMOT.

“ Entered in the office of the right honourable lord Sondes, auditor, the 23rd of November 1782.

“ JOS. HUGHES, Dep. Aud.

“ Entered in Officio Audit. Recept. Sēcūi, xxviii die Augusti 1782.

“ NEWCASTLE.

“ Entered in the office of the comptroller of the treasurer's accounts of his majesty's navy, 13th September 1782.

“ OSB. STANDERT.

“ Entered in the office of the comptroller of the navy.

“ R. PRESTWOOD.

“ Entered at the Treasury chambers, Whitehall, 20th September 1782.

“ I. M. L.

“ Entered in the office of the right honourable John lord viscount Mount Stuart, auditor, 23 November 1782.

“ PHIL. DEARE, Dep. Aud.

“ Irr<sup>itur</sup> int. Record Dñi. Rs. Georgii Tertii infra Recept. Sēcūi ss. remanen. in Officio Clici Pellm. ibm. Secundo die Septembris Anno Rñi. dict. Dñi. Rs. Vicessimo Secundo Annoq. Dñi. 1782.

“ ED. ROBERTS Deput. Cler. Pellium.

Mr. Giles.—The managers now mean to show your lordships, that lord Melville quitted the office of treasurer of the navy on the 10th of April, 1783. For that purpose we propose producing to your lordships the patent appointing lord Bayning to that office. I do not know that it will be necessary to read that patent at length; but if the learned counsel choose to admit that lord Melville quitted the office on that day, I will put in the patent.

Mr. Plumer.—There is no occasion to read it. I admit that lord Melville resigned his office on the 11th of April, 1783.

Mr. Giles.—I have to produce now, a patent, appointing lord Melville again treasurer of the navy, on the 5th of January, 1784.

Mr. Plumer.—Perhaps the honourable managers will be satisfied with my admission, which is, that lord Melville was, upon the 5th of January, 1784, re-appointed to the office, upon a patent in terms similar to the former, and a warrant of a similar import with the former.

Mr. Giles.—I have now to refer your lordships to another report of the same commissioners, one of whose reports has been already read to your lordships.

It is the eighth report of the commissioners of public accounts. I only mean to read an extract, to show it was the foundation of an act of parliament, which passed afterwards, for regulating the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy.

Then the following extract was read from the eighth report of the commissioners appointed to examine the public accounts which had been before delivered in:

"This examination has enabled us to form an opinion upon another point of moment to the public. The legislature have, in the last session of parliament, introduced into the office of the paymaster general of the forces, a regulation which, as it seems to us, may be applied as beneficially to the office of the treasurer of the navy. The custody of the cash applicable to the navy services may be transferred from the treasurer to the Bank of England, and the account only of the receipts and payments be kept in his office. All the sums now received by him may be received by the Bank: sums from the Exchequer may be imprested to the Bank. Sums directed by the letters of the different boards to be paid to him, may be directed to be paid into the Bank: all bills assigned upon him for payment may be paid, and all extra payments may be made by his drafts upon the Bank. The payment of the seamen, the artificers, and labourers in the yards, and the persons in the hospital ships, and on the half-pay lists, must be carried on in the same manner it is now. These men cannot be paid by drafts; they must have cash; and with that cash the pay-clerks must be entrusted, as they are at present, and the treasurer must continue to be responsible for them, as for officers of his appointment and under his control; but this will be no obstruction to the regulation. The money may be all issued to the pay-clerks by the drafts of the treasurer upon the Bank, according to the requisitions of the navy board, in like manner as many of these sums are issued at this day; and upon the death or resignation of a treasurer, the balances of his cash in the Bank, and in the hands of his pay-clerks may be struck immediately, and carried over to the account of his successor. In this situation, the treasurer neither receiving nor paying public money himself, can be neither debtor to nor creditor of the public, except as far as he may be responsible for his clerks. On passing his accounts, the bill indorsed or requisition of the navy board is both his authority and voucher for his draft. The draft indorsed is the voucher for the Bank to prove their payment. If these accounts agree (and they ought frequently to be compared together) it is highly probable that they are both right."

Lord Chancellor.—Do lord Melville's counsel desire that any other part, or the whole of this report, should be read?

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I am not prepared at present to point out any passages which we desire to have read; but your lordships will permit me on a future day, if it should be necessary, to supply that evidence.

Mr. Giles.—It will be necessary to produce the Journals, to show that that report was presented to the House of Commons.

Then the following entry in the Journal of the Commons was read:

"Jovis, 23<sup>o</sup> die Januarij 1785.

"The House being informed, that Mr. Beachcroft and Mr. Drummond, two of the commissioners for examining, taking, and stating the public accounts of the kingdom, attended at the door; they were called in; and at the bar presented to the House, pursuant to the directions of an act of parliament,

"An eighth report of the Commissioners appointed to examine, take, and state the Public Accounts of the kingdom.

"And then they withdrew.

"And the title of the said report was read.

"And the said report was also read."

Mr. Giles.—I wish to show your lordships, from the Journals of the House of Commons, that leave was given to bring in a bill for regulating the office of Treasurer of the Navy, on the 29th of April 1785.

Then the following entries in the Journal of the Commons were read:

"Veneris, 29<sup>o</sup> die Aprilis 1785.

"Mr. Henry Dundas presented to the House, according to order, a bill for better regulating the office of Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy; and the same was received, and read the first time.

"Resolved, that the bill be read a second time.

"Ordered, that the said bill be printed.

"Ordered, that the said bill be read a second time upon Tuesday morning next."

"Mercurij, 25<sup>o</sup> die Maij 1785.

"An engrossed bill for better regulating the office of Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy, was read the third time.

"Resolved, that the bill do pass, and that the title be, "An Act for better regulating the office of Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy." That Mr. Henry Dundas do carry the bill to the Lords, and desire their concurrence."

Mr. Giles.—I desire now to read an entry in your lordships' Journal of the 25th of May 1785, to show that Mr. Dundas did bring this bill up from the Commons.

Then the following entry in the original Journal of the Lords was read :

"Die Mercurij, 25<sup>o</sup> Maij 1785.

"A message was brought from the House of Commons, by Mr. Dundas and others, with a bill, intituled, "An Act for better regulating the office of the Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House."

Mr. Giles.—I believe it is unnecessary to trouble your lordships with reading any entry in your lordships' Journal to prove that the act passed—the act proves itself.

My lords, we have now arrived at the period in which it will be necessary to show your lordships the appointment of Mr. Douglas as paymaster to lord Melville. The first evidence that I offer to your lordships to prove the appointment of Mr. Douglas by lord Melville as his paymaster, is, a letter of lord Melville's to the navy board, in which he states that he has so appointed him. If it be necessary we will prove the hand-writing of lord Melville to that letter.

Mr. Plumer.—We admit it to be lord Melville's hand writing.

Then the following letter was read :

"Treasury Office, Broad-street,
26th Aug. 1782.

"Gentlemen,

"The king having been pleased to appoint me Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy, by his letters patent, bearing date the 19th instant, I do hereby acquaint you, that I have made Andrew Douglas, esq. my paymaster, whom I have directed to attend the Treasury and Exchequer, and I desire his salary may be made out accordingly, to commence from the date of my patent.

"All the rest of the officers, clerks, &c. belonging to this office, I have continued in the same stations they were in under the late treasurer.

"I am, gentlemen,

"Your most humble servant,

"Navy-board.

"HENRY DUNDAS."

Mr. Giles.—I wish now to have read to your lordships an entry made at the Exchequer, of the power of attorney under which Mr. Douglas acted for lord Melville. It will be necessary first to prove, that search has been made for the original, and that it cannot be found; for that purpose I will call the son and executor of Mr. Douglas, and also Mrs. Douglas, his widow.

Then Archibald Douglas, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Are you the son and executor of the late Mr. Andrew Douglas, who was paymaster to lord Melville?

Mr. Douglas.—I am both.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any papers belonging to your late father?

Mr. Douglas.—I have none.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know what became of the papers which your father left upon his death?

Mr. Douglas.—Those papers were all left in my father's house, who then lived in Gerard-street, London.

Mr. Giles.—Who obtained possession of those papers?

Mr. Douglas.—I cannot say farther than that they were left in his house; they were not in my possession.

Mr. Giles.—Did Mrs. Douglas, your mother, reside with him at the time of his death?

Mr. Douglas.—She did.

Mr. Giles.—Did she continue in the house at the time the papers were left in the house?

Mr. Douglas.—She continued for some time in that house, till she removed to another.

Mr. Giles.—Did you see any of the papers belonging to your father, in that house, afterwards?

Mr. Douglas.—No.

Mr. Giles.—How did you understand they were there?

Mr. Douglas.—I have always understood they were there.

Then Archibald Douglas, esquire, was cross-examined as follows :

Mr. Plumer.—Were any of the papers of the late Mr. Douglas, to your knowledge, ever delivered to lord Melville?

Mr. Douglas.—None that I know of.

Mr. Giles.—There may be questions which we shall have to put to this witness in a future stage of this proceeding; but it would be only perplexing it, to introduce them now.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mrs. Mary Douglas was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Did the papers belonging to your late husband come into your possession upon his death?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any papers belonging to Mr. Douglas, your late husband, except those which you delivered over to two gentlemen of the committee, who were appointed to prepare articles of impeachment against lord Melville?

Mrs. Douglas.—None.

Mr. Giles.—Did you deliver over any papers to two gentlemen of the committee appointed to draw up the articles of impeachment against lord Melville?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes, a box of papers.

Mr. Giles.—Did that box contain all the papers belonging to your late husband?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes, all of them.

Then Mrs. Mary Douglas was cross-examined as follows :

Mr. Adam.—When did you deliver over these papers to the two members of the committee who went to your house for that purpose?

Mrs. Douglas.—I cannot recollect the day of the month, not thinking to be called on.

Mr. Adam.—In what year was it?

Mrs. Douglas.—It was in 1805.

Mr. Giles.—The day can be settled immediately, if the learned counsel are anxious to have that ascertained.

Mr. Adam.—In what part of your house were the papers kept at the time they were delivered?

Mrs. Douglas.—In the attic story.

Mr. Adam.—In a bed-room?

Mrs. Douglas.—In a waste room.

Mr. Adam.—Where is your house?

Mrs. Douglas.—In Margaret-street, Cavendish-square.

Mr. Adam.—Did you deliver the papers yourself to them?

Mrs. Douglas.—I did not go up stairs with them; but one of my servants did, and saw them take the box of papers.

Mr. Adam.—Was the box of papers shown to you, before they left the house with it?

Mrs. Douglas.—I saw the box, and knew it was mine; it was directed, on a piece of parchment, The Treasurer's and Paymaster's Accounts.

Mr. Adam.—Did they take the box away with them?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes, they did.

Mr. Adam.—Had the box ever been out of your custody from the time of your husband's death till they came and took it away?

Mrs. Douglas.—It had always been in my custody; it was never out of my possession.

Mr. Adam.—Do you know the gentlemen to whom you delivered it?

Mrs. Douglas.—Certainly I should know them.

Mr. Adam.—Did you know them before you delivered the box to them?

Mrs. Douglas.—No.

Mr. Adam.—What was the reason of your delivering the box to them, if you did not know them before?

Mrs. Douglas.—I was sent for by the gentlemen who had the box, to the committee, and I was too ill to attend them.

Mr. Adam.—You were served with an order from the committee, requiring your attendance?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes.

Mr. Adam.—And that was the reason of your delivering them?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes, it was.

Mr. Adam.—Did the gentlemen who came for the box represent themselves as members of the committee?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes.

Mr. Adam.—Did they state that they had a right to the papers?

Mrs. Douglas.—They did.

Mr. Adam.—Did you examine the contents of the box, before the gentlemen took it away from your house.

Mrs. Douglas.—No never; the box had been closed for twenty years.

Mr. Adam.—Was it a locked box?

Mrs. Douglas.—Yes.

Mr. Adam.—Did you keep the key of the box?

Mrs. Douglas.—I kept it locked up.

Mr. Adam.—Did you deliver the key of the box to the two gentlemen who attended?

Mrs. Douglas.—I did.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then John Winter, jun. esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Did you examine the contents of the box delivered by Mrs. Douglas to two members of the committee?

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to ask, as a preliminary question, whether this gentleman was at Mrs. Douglas's when the box was delivered?

Mr. Giles.—He was not.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish to know, whether this witness saw this box delivered by Mrs. Douglas to two members of the committee?

Mr. Winter.—I saw it after it was in Mr. Whitbread's possession.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—Perhaps it may save time, if I inform your lordships, that I was the person who received the box from Mrs. Douglas; it was locked, and she delivered to me the key; and it was in my possession locked, until Mr. Winter opened it.

Lord Chancellor.—The honourable manager must be sworn to those facts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Certainly.

Then Samuel Whitbread, esq. was sworn.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, in the course of the proceedings of the committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment against lord Melville, an order was sent to Mrs. Douglas, the executrix of Mr. Andrew Douglas, the paymaster of lord Melville, to attend that committee. The committee were informed she was in possession of the papers of her late husband, and the order was, I believe, that she should bring those papers to the committee; the answer returned by Mrs. Douglas was, that she was too ill to attend; the message came by the messenger of the House of Commons, who was ordered to attend with that summons; upon which, as time pressed, for that was the day of the prorogation of parliament, and within a very few hours of parliament being prorogued, the committee thought proper to send two of their members, one of whom I was, in order to see whether she was in possession of those papers. Attended by Mr. Creevey, another member of that committee, I went to Mrs. Douglas's house, and inquired for the papers of her late husband, she informed us, that all the public papers of her late husband were contained in a deal box in the attic story. To the room in which that box was deposited we resorted, and there we found a deal box locked up, of which Mrs. Douglas had the key; that key she put into my possession; the other member of the committee and myself took the box, and we returned with it to the House of Commons, and put it into the room where the committee assembled, and arrived at the House of Commons before the prorogation took place; I kept possession of the key; and on the next day, the box was removed to my house, the key being still in my possession, and no paper having been taken out of that box. On the next day, or the day after, Mr. John Winter, now before your lordships, came to me by my desire, and I gave him the key of the box, in order that he might assort and arrange the papers that were there.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg the honourable gentleman, if he can, to state the day.

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not recollect the day immediately, but I know it was the day on which parliament was prorogued,—which I am informed was the 12th of July.

Mr. Plumer.—Have these books and papers been ever since in the possession of the managers for the House of Commons?

Mr. Whitbread.—Either in possession of the committee, of myself, as one of the committee, or of Mr. John Winter; but never certainly out of the custody of the committee, or their solicitor.

Mr. Plumer.—May I be permitted to ask whether that was the course pursued whenever the committee found it necessary to examine any books or papers? to send for them, and to possess themselves of those books or papers?

Mr. Whitbread.—Whenever the committee had occasion to resort to any books or papers, they regularly served the person in possession of those books or papers, with an order, that they might be brought to them: this was the only instance in which papers, in a private person's possession, were obtained; and such things would not have been resorted to, had it not been for the illness of Mrs. Douglas; but had any other instances of the like kind occurred, the committee would have thought it their duty to attend in a body, or to send some members of their body to get possession of those papers.

Mr. Plumer.—Have the committee any private papers of Mr. Newbigging; and, if they have, did they get possession of them in the same way?

Mr. Whitbread.—Mr. Newbigging was sent for to attend the impeachment committee as a witness from Edinburgh, and he brought his papers, a part of which (such as they thought proper to keep) are in possession of the committee.

Then John Winter, jun. esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Did you carefully examine the papers contained in the deal box of which the last witness has spoken?

Mr. Winter.—Yes; in consequence of directions I received from Mr. Whitbread, I examined and selected various papers that were found in the possession of Mrs. Douglas.

Mr. Giles.—Could you find amongst those papers a power of attorney from lord Melville, to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Winter.—I did not.

Mr. Giles.—Did you make search for such power of attorney?

Mr. Winter.—Certainly; I was anxious to find every paper relating to the treasurership of lord Melville.

Mr. Giles.—I now propose to produce to your lordships an entry made of that power of attorney at the Exchequer.

Then John Winter, jun. esq. was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Adam.—Do you recollect any applications having been made to you, or any made to Mr. Whitbread, by the solicitor for lord Melville, for an inspection of that box of papers?

Mr. Winter.—Yes, there was an application made by Messieurs Shawe and Le Blanc, addressed to the committee for an inspection of the papers in this box.

Mr. Adam.—When was that made?

Mr. Winter.—Early in the commencement of the present session.

Mr. Adam.—At what time was the inspection granted?

Mr. Winter.—I cannot state exactly how long, but it was a few days after the application was made.

Mr. Giles.—I believe this application and the answer were both in writing?

Lord Chancellor.—Were the application and the answer both in writing?

Mr. Winter.—They were both in writing.

Mr. Whitbread.—I am the person to whom the letter was addressed, as chairman of the committee; if the learned counsel will state what they mean that the conduct of the committee was, I am sure if they do state it fairly, the committee will immediately allow that such was their conduct.

Mr. Adam.—I must get at the facts of this case by asking questions in the common and usual way. I have no objection to put the question to Mr. Whitbread, instead of the other witness. I wish to know how soon after the original request was made for the inspection of the box, that request was granted?

Mr. Whitbread.—The letter was addressed to me, as chairman of the committee, by lord Melville's solicitor, signed Shawe and Le Blanc; these letters are in existence and may be produced; they will ascertain the precise dates; they are not here, because no notice was served for the production of them. The substance is shortly this; on the day after I believe, probably the same day, but I am sure there was as short an interval as could be, till we could take the sense of the committee upon it (the application was for leave to examine the papers found in Mrs. Douglas's possession). I immediately informed the solicitor, that as soon as an examination had been gone through on the part of the committee, that then those papers might be examined by the solicitor for the defendant under the inspection of the solicitor on the part of the committee, or the committee clerk.

Mr. Plumer.—When, in point of fact, was the inspection had?

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not know; it was had under the inspection of Messieurs Winter and Kaye, of which they can give information, but I have every reason to believe it was as soon as possible after the application; a very considerable time ago.

Mr. Plumer.—Was not the access of the solicitor of lord Melville forbidden, until the committee should have made their last report?

Mr. Winter.—I do not recollect any direction of that sort.

Mr. Plumer.—In point of fact, how soon were they examined by Messieurs Shawe and Le Blanc?

Mr. Winter.—A very short time after we had Mr. Whitbread's directions to let lord Melville's solicitor inspect them.

Mr. Plumer.—When was it you had Mr. Whitbread's directions?

Mr. Winter.—About six weeks ago, or more.

Mr. Plumer.—At what time were they first put into your possession?

Mr. Winter.—In July last.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you show Mr. Le Blanc all the papers contained in that box?

Mr. Winter.—I showed Mr. Le Blanc all the papers relating to the treasurership of lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—It may be proper here to state, that all the papers were shown for which the application was made; and your lordships will recollect, that the day on which the possession of these papers was obtained, was the day of the prorogation of parliament; and that the committee could not act or take any inspection of those papers till parliament was again assembled, and the committee were re-assembled.

Mr. Adam.—I must state again, that I wish to get at the facts in the usual course.—You say, that all the papers relating to lord Melville's treasurership were shown to Mr. Le Blanc?

Mr. Winter.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Were there other papers then in the box, besides those which related to lord Melville's treasurership?

Mr. Winter.—There were.

Mr. Plumer.—What became of these papers?

Mr. Winter.—They are still in my possession.

Mr. Plumer.—Have they been removed from the box?

Mr. Winter.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—Were they removed from the box at the time Mr. Le Blanc examined the papers?

Mr. Winter.—They were.

Mr. Plumer.—Where were they placed?

Mr. Winter.—They were placed in a room at our office, for the convenience of Mr. Le Blanc's inspection.

Mr. Plumer.—I mean to ask where the papers that were taken out of the box, during the period of Mr. Le Blanc's inspection, were taken?

Mr. Winter.—The other papers remained in the box.

Mr. Plumer.—The papers Mr. Le Blanc inspected were taken from the box by you, and put into a room for Mr. Le Blanc's inspection?

Mr. Winter.—They were.

Mr. Plumer.—And the other papers remained in the box?

Mr. Winter.—They did so.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that room locked up?

Mr. Winter.—It was not.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you inform Mr. Le Blanc that there were other papers in the box which came from Mrs. Douglas, besides those which were placed in the room for his inspection?

Mr. Winter.—I did.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you produce to Mr. Le Blanc all the papers relating to the accounts between lord Melville and Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Winter.—I did.

Lord Chancellor.—Are you certain that the papers you took into the other room, and arranged for the inspection of Mr. Le Blanc, were all papers relating to the treasurership of lord Melville?

Mr. Winter.—Certainly.

A Lord.—Were the other papers that remained in the box, papers relating to other treasurers accounts?

Mr. Winter.—They were; to the treasurer-ship of Mr. Welbore Ellis and sir Gilbert Elliot.

A Lord.—Was any notice given to Mr. or Mrs. Douglas before the opening of that box?

Mr. Winter.—Not to my knowledge.

A Lord.—You have proved that you placed the papers open for the inspection of Mr. Le Blanc. Did the box from which you took the papers continue to be locked during the whole time it was in your possession?

Mr. Winter.—Yes.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then William Rose Haworth, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—What situation do you hold at the Exchequer?

Mr. Haworth.—Clerk of the debentures.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any book in your custody brought from the Exchequer, in which is contained an entry of a power of attorney from lord Melville to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Haworth.—I have.

Mr. Giles.—What book is it?

Mr. Haworth.—A book we call the Letter of Attorney Book.

Mr. Giles.—What does that book contain?

Mr. Haworth.—Letters of attorney, entered from 1779 to 1784.

Mr. Giles.—What letters of attorney?

Mr. Haworth.—It contains generally, all the letters of attorney at the Exchequer.

Mr. Giles.—Do you mean all letters of attorney under which money is received at the Exchequer?

Mr. Haworth.—Certainly.

Mr. Giles.—Is there an entry of a letter of attorney from lord Melville to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Haworth.—There is one in this book, in the year 1782, entered at the Exchequer, on the 30th of August, 1782.

Mr. Giles.—Whose writing is that entry?

Mr. Haworth.—It is mine.

Mr. Giles.—From what did you write that?

Mr. Haworth.—From the original power of attorney.

Lord Chancellor.—How do you know it was the original power of attorney?

Mr. Haworth.—From its being brought to me, as all other powers of attorney are, for entering.

Lord Chancellor.—Who brought it to you?

Mr. Haworth.—I cannot say; most probably Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Giles.—Did Mr. Douglas receive money under that power of attorney?

Mr. Haworth.—He did.

Mr. Giles.—I propose reading the power of attorney from this entry in the Exchequer book.

Lord Chancellor.—At what time did Mr. Douglas receive money under that power of attorney, or was it more than once?

Mr. Haworth.—From the date of it to the time of his death, I believe,

VOL. XXIX,

Lord Chancellor.—Was any objection ever made to his receiving any money under that power of attorney?

Mr. Haworth.—None that ever I heard of.

Mr. Giles.—Did he receive any money on account of the treasurer-ship of lord Melville, except under that power of attorney?

Mr. Haworth.—None that I know of.

Then William Rose Haworth, esq. was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Is the payment of money in your office?

Mr. Haworth.—The payment of money is not in the office I belong to, but the direction of the money for payment.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you ever pay any money, or see any money paid to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Haworth.—No, I never paid any money to Mr. Douglas; but I have seen a direction to pay the money to Mr. Dundas or Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Plumer.—That direction is in writing?

Mr. Haworth.—The auditor directs the money, and the teller pays it.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you of your own knowledge know of any sum of money whatever having been paid to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Haworth.—I know that Mr. Douglas has had money under this power of attorney, from my writing on the order for Mr. Douglas to receive the money.

Mr. Plumer.—How do you know that he did in fact receive the money?

Mr. Haworth.—I cannot speak myself to the money being paid to Mr. Douglas, because the money does not come through my hands.

Mr. Plumer.—Then all you mean to say is, that some directions for payment were given, but you do not know in point of fact that he ever received any money at all?

Mr. Haworth.—Certainly not.

Lord Chancellor.—Was there any other power of attorney executed, excepting that of which you are now speaking?

Mr. Haworth.—We have no power of attorney but that, entered in the office, from the year 1782 to the present time, of the treasurer of the navy.

A Lord.—Does the paper which you produce as a copy, purport to contain the names of the persons who were attesting witnesses to the power of attorney?

Mr. Haworth.—It does.

A Lord.—Do you know whether those persons are living or dead?

Mr. Haworth.—I do not.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you mean that up to this time there is no other power of attorney?

Mr. Haworth.—There is not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I am persuaded that it is not necessary to argue this question; all your lordships have anticipated what is the objection to the competency of this evidence. There is no proof before your lordships that an original signed by lord Melville ever existed; none whatever; and that is the first step to take, before any thing like a copy of a supposed original can possibly be received in evidence. The first thing is, to prove that any original ever did exist, before we can resort to the secondary evidence. And in the next place they are attempting to supply the fact of actual payment to Mr. Douglas, even supposing it would do, which it would not; but there is no evidence to prove that Mr. Douglas ever in fact received a farthing under any authority whatever.

Mr. Giles.—When the learned counsel contend before your lordships, that there is not any evidence of an appointment by lord Melville, they seem to lay entirely out of the question that letter which I produced signed by lord Melville, stating that he had appointed Mr. Douglas as his paymaster. He could not appoint Mr. Douglas as his paymaster, and authorize him to receive money at the Exchequer, but by this power of attorney; and therefore the learned counsel are not correct when they say, there is no evidence that lord Melville executed a power of attorney to Mr. Douglas; but if your lordships think that we are not entitled to read this entry, it is impossible that you should ever receive evidence of a power of attorney but from the original. Your lordships have here a person who made a copy of it: you have here a letter, stating that lord Melville had appointed Mr. Douglas his paymaster: you have evidence that he could not receive one penny but under a power of attorney, and though the witness does not know that he did receive the money, yet he says he gave the warrant order for him to receive it; and we can add to this, if your lordships think it material, the receipts of Mr. Douglas for the money he received at the Exchequer under that power of attorney.

Lord Chancellor.—I am of opinion that you have not carried your proof far enough to entitle you to read this. The question is not, whether by some means or other this gentleman was paymaster to lord Melville, but whether he was constituted paymaster by that power of attorney. There is no legal proof that this is lord Melville's hand-writing: it has been asked whether he knows that the persons who appear to be the attesting witnesses to it are living or dead; but the witness does not seem to know whether they are living or dead, nor does it appear that any inquiry has been made as to who were the persons who could prove that fact; neither does it appear that Mr. Douglas ever received any money under that appointment; the managers therefore have not entitled themselves to read this paper.

Mr. Giles.—The managers will produce tomorrow the attesting witness to that power of attorney: he is alive, but he is not here now.

Lord Chancellor.—That will put the thing in a very different situation.

Then John Winter junior, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—Did you yourself keep the key of the box which has been the subject of inquiry? or did you ever part with that key during that time to any other person?

Mr. Winter.—The key sometimes remained in the box in my office.

A Lord.—Did it remain in the box in your office when you were absent from the office?

Mr. Winter.—I had examined all the papers before the box ever came into our office.

A Lord.—Had you examined all the papers the box contained before you ever suffered the key to be out of your custody?

Mr. Winter.—Certainly; I examined all the papers contained in the box the first day I saw the box.

A Lord.—Are you certain that no papers could have been taken out of the box during the time whilst you had the possession of the key?

Mr. Winter.—I cannot say that it would have been impossible; all I can state is, that I examined all the papers contained in the box the first day I saw it.

A Lord.—Did you make any list of them?

Mr. Winter.—No; I fairly arranged them, and put labels on each.

A Lord.—Are you able to swear, that those papers on which you put labels the first day you took possession of the box, continued to be in your possession during all the time that the box remained with you?

Mr. Winter.—Certainly.

A Lord.—At what time did you separate the papers relative to lord Melville's treasurer-ship from the other papers?

Mr. Winter.—The morning that Mr. Le Blanc attended to examine them.

A Lord.—Was Mr. Le Blanc made acquainted with what the other papers were that remained in the box, after the separation? that they belonged to the other treasurerships, and not to the treasurership of lord Melville?

Mr. Winter.—After Mr. Le Blanc had completed his examination of the papers relative to the treasurership of lord Melville, I thought it was right to tell him there were papers relative to other treasurerships that were open to his inspection, if he desired to see them.

A Lord.—What answer did he make to that?

Mr. Winter.—The last time I saw Mr. Le Blanc, I think it was, he said, he had not time to make an arrangement; but he would let me know if he thought it material to examine them.

A Lord.—Did you see Mr. Le Blanc only once?

Mr. Winter.—No; the first time I left the message with his clerk.

A Lord.—Were the papers which were taken out for the examination of Mr. Le Blanc, at other times always kept locked up in the box with the other papers?

Mr. Winter.—The papers selected for the inspection of Mr. Le Blanc were put into that room, and they continued there till after he had inspected them, and then they were returned again into the box.

A Lord.—Are you a clerk, or any other officer of the House of Commons?

Mr. Winter.—No; I have the honour to be one of the solicitors for the managers.

A Lord.—Were the papers which were not shown to Shawe and Le Blanc always kept in that box?

Mr. Winter.—They were.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—I mean now to offer evidence to your lordships, to show, that upon opening an account at the Bank, lord Melville signed the Firm-book, and that Mr. Douglas, his pay-master, did the same.

Then Mr. Thomas Rippon was called in, and being sworn, was examined, as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Are you a clerk in the Bank? and what book is that you now hold in your hand?

Mr. Rippon.—I am one of the cashiers in the Bank; this is one of the Firm-books belonging to the Bank.

Mr. Giles.—Do you find in that book the signatures of lord Melville (then Mr. Dundas) and of Mr. Andrew Douglas?

Mr. Rippon.—It appears, in this book, that Henry Dundas and Andrew Douglas, signed on the 8th of August 1782.

Mr. Giles.—Are you acquainted with the hand-writing of lord Melville?

Mr. Rippon.—I am.

Lord Chancellor.—Did you ever see him write?

Mr. Rippon.—I never saw him write.

Mr. Plumer.—We will admit the hand-writing.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know the hand-writing of Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Rippon.—Yes; I never saw him write; but this corresponds with the signature to the power of attorney which was granted.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Archibald Douglas was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Is that name, Andrew Douglas, your father's hand-writing?

Mr. Douglas.—It is.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Thomas Rippon was again called in, and examined, as follows:

Mr. Giles.—State for what purpose lord Melville and Mr. Douglas signed that book on that day?

Mr. Rippon.—In consequence of a power of attorney, granted from Henry Dundas to Andrew Douglas. Henry Dundas signed this book, in consequence of his opening an account with the Bank; and Andrew Douglas signed it in consequence of a power of attorney, granted from Henry Dundas to him.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know what is become of that power of attorney?

Mr. Rippon.—I do not.

Then the following entries in the said Firm-book of the Bank were read:

"Henry Dundas, 8th August, 1782.
John Clifford.

"For account of right hon. Henry Dundas.

"Andrew Douglas, 8th August, 1782.
John Clifford.

"For the right hon. Henry Dundas and J. Slade, 8th August, 1782.
John Clifford.

"For the right hon. Henry Dundas and George Swaffield, 8th August, 1782.
John Clifford.

Lord Chancellor.—When an account is opened at the Bank, do they enter their signatures in the book, that the Bank may be acquainted with their hand-writing?

Mr. Rippon.—Yes; this is the book in which such signatures are always taken for the purpose of comparing the drafts as they are drawn.

Lord Chancellor.—Is that the universal course at the Bank, in opening accounts?

Mr. Rippon.—It is an invariable rule.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—My lords, I am now going to put in a book which comes from the Navy-office (not from the Navy-pay-office, but the Navy-office), containing receipts of Mr. Douglas, or accounts signed by Mr. Douglas, stating, that he has received certain sums of money at the Exchequer: these receipts are transmitted from the Navy-pay-office regularly to the Navy-office; it is a part of his duty, as pay-master, to transmit those receipts to the Navy-office; and this book comes from the Navy-office.

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Is it the duty of the treasurer of the navy, through his paymaster, to transmit such accounts as these to the Navy-office?

Mr. Standert.—It is the practice that every sum the treasurer receives, he sends a certificate for to the Navy-office.

Mr. Giles.—Is that the book containing the receipts during the paymastership of Andrew Douglas?

Mr. Standert.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—Are these certificates signed by Mr. Andrew Douglas, the then paymaster?

Mr. Standert.—When he is present he signs them, or in his absence another person signs them.

Mr. Giles.—Are these receipts his writing?

Mr. Standert.—They are.

Lord Chancellor.—Have you seen him write?

Mr. Standert.—I never saw him write.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Archibald Douglas, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at the words Andrew Douglas in that book, and say whether they are the hand-writing of your late father?

Mr. Douglas.—They are.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—I put in a receipt in that book, showing that Mr. Douglas did, on the 6th of November, 1782, receive the sum of 45,000*l.* from the Exchequer, as paymaster of lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—I understand the honourable manager to propose to prove a certain fact, viz. that 45,000*l.* was received by the late Mr. Douglas, in some character or other.

Mr. Giles.—The learned counsel much misunderstands the application of that evidence. So far from stating that Mr. Douglas received it in some character or other, it is expressly stated that he received it as paymaster of lord Melville, and gives that certificate at the Navy-office, of having received it as paymaster of lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—My objection goes, in whatever character he is supposed to have received it, to this receipt or certificate being taken for evidence that he did actually receive so much money. Whatever character he was invested with, if it be material to establish as a fact in this cause, that he in point of fact received so much money as has been stated, or any sum of money, that must be proved by legal evidence; and this, I submit, is not the proper evidence; for surely it will not be argued that the receipt of a person is evidence against any body but himself. But the managers mean now to affect lord Melville, by proving as a fact, that another person received so much money by that person's receipt. His receipt is evidence against himself, but not against any body else; and therefore this is not the proper evidence to prove that fact, whatever character the person was invested with. If the honourable and learned manager should make it necessary, or call in question this position, it will not be difficult to supply him with cases upon the subject.

Mr. Giles.—I do not produce this as a receipt; it is a certificate by Mr. Douglas, who was paymaster of lord Melville, to the Navy-office; a certificate he is bound to make from time to time, stating that the paymaster or treasurer of the navy has received such and such sums of money. This is the account transmitted to the Navy-office of sums received; it is not his receipt for the money.

Mr. Plumer.—This does not alter the nature of the objection. Call it certificate, receipt, or what you please, what is it but a written declaration not upon oath to affect third persons? That is the principle upon which this cannot be received in evidence. You must prove every fact against the noble lord, by viva voce testimony upon oath, open to examination and cross-examination; unless in particular circumstances where there are documents under his hand, or by which he is affected, which dispense with the necessity of that evidence. That paper is a declaration made by a third person not upon oath, and consequently is evidence only against the individual signing it.

Lord Chancellor.—You must establish that this gentleman was invested with the character of paymaster by lord Melville, but it remains yet to prove the power of attorney under which he acquired that character.

Mr. Giles.—I offered this evidence with that view. Having shown to your lordships by lord Melville's letter to the Navy board, that he had appointed Mr. Douglas paymaster,—and being his paymaster, it was necessary he should receive all that money that came from the Exchequer, for the treasurer of the navy never receives any; it is a part of the duty of his office to transmit those certificates to the Exchequer;—I produce this as the best and most authentic evidence, coming as it were from lord Melville himself; for Mr. Douglas, when he acts as paymaster, represents lord Melville.

Lord Chancellor.—If you prove the payment to him, and establish by lord Melville's letter, or any other evidence, that he was invested with that character, then a receipt by him will be a receipt by lord Melville. But the question is this; whether if I appoint a person to represent me, and act as my agent, his acknowledgment of his having received a sum of money is evidence against me?

Mr. Giles.—As paymaster, it is the duty of his office to acknowledge the sums he receives; and this is the acknowledgment which he makes, and which could be made in no other possible way.

Lord Chancellor.—Have you any difficulty in proving the fact that he received that money, clothed with the character of paymaster.

Mr. Giles.—I have not any difficulty in proving that fact, but I conceive it to be of great importance to this cause, that it should now be decided by your lordships, whether this book is not evidence against lord Melville:—it being a book containing certificates, which are transmitted under lord Melville's authority by Mr. Douglas his paymaster, to the Navy-office. It is the duty of the paymaster so to transmit an account of the money he receives at the Exchequer, and he has done so in this case. Mr. Douglas, as paymaster of lord Melville, receives money at the Exchequer; and, in the execution of his duty as paymaster, he transmits accounts of the money so received to the Navy-office. By his appointment as paymaster, he is authorized to make the certificates to the Navy-office on behalf of the treasurer, and lord Melville must be bound by his act. I do not mean to say that it would be conclusive evidence against lord Melville; but if your lordships please we will call back Mr. Standert to explain more particularly the practice of the office, and the nature of that book; added to which your lordships see it is an entry, in the hand-writing of Mr. Douglas, in which he charges himself—for he states that he has received so much money.

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the book you have in your hand?

Mr. Standert.—The treasurer's receipts for money he has received at the Exchequer.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that an official book?

Mr. Standert.—It comes in single sheets of paper, which we keep as certificates of the payment of money to the paymaster of the Navy, for the treasurer, which are afterwards bound up.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Lord Chancellor.—For what purpose do you produce this?

Mr. Giles.—To show that Mr. Douglas did receive a sum of money on such a day at the Exchequer, and that he made a certificate to the Navy-office that he had received it.

Lord Chancellor.—That might be conclusive against Mr. Douglas, who admits by that entry, that he did receive that sum; but the question is this, whether in the present state of the evidence, that admission by Mr. Douglas, establishes the fact against lord Melville?

Mr. Solicitor General.—On the part of the managers, we submit to your lordships, that this is evidence to prove a sum of 45,000*l.* received by lord Melville. We submit to your lordships that we have already proved that Mr. Douglas was the paymaster of lord Melville. We have proved it in the first place, by a letter signed by lord Melville himself. In the next place, we have proved it by showing that Mr. Douglas acted as the paymaster for lord Melville; and, I understand your lordships to be of opinion, that what alone we have failed in the proof of is, that a letter of attorney had been executed by lord Melville, appointing Mr. Douglas to act for him, and that the letter of attorney was couched in the words which were contained in the book which was produced to your lordships. It was for the purpose of supplying that evidence that we were to produce to your lordships to-morrow, the subscribing witness to that letter of attorney; but we submit that it is not necessary for us to give evidence of that power of attorney, in order to prove that Mr. Douglas was the paymaster. Lord Melville has admitted that Mr. Douglas was his paymaster, by his letter in which he signifies to the Navy-board that he had appointed Mr. Douglas his paymaster. We have besides proved the acts of Mr. Douglas as paymaster, and we can prove, if it be necessary, a receipt of lord Melville, after the death of Mr. Douglas, to his representatives, acknowledging him to have been his paymaster at the time of his death. We will besides prove to your lordships, that, according to the constitution of the office, the paymaster alone gives receipts for all the sums which are imprested to the treasurer of the navy. If after all this, it be necessary to prove that the treasurer of the navy actually has received and signed receipts for money, it will be a most important point indeed gained for lord Melville by his counsel; because it will be impossible for us to prove that any one sum was received by lord Melville, he not having himself received any of the public money imprested to him by the Exchequer; all the receipts of the treasurer of the navy, and all the payments of the treasurer of the navy, are receipts and payments made by his paymaster. We submit therefore to your lordships, that proving by the office book the certificate of the receipt of 45,000*l.* imprested to the treasurer of the navy, by the signature of Mr. Douglas, is proof that it was received by lord Melville.

Lord Chancellor.—Suppose A. B. receives at this public office a sum of money (for instance) 45,000*l.*; is there no way in which that payment can be established, except by his acknowledgment of having received it? is there no official mode independently of that, to prove the fact that the money was paid to him?

Mr. Solicitor General.—I am not able to inform your lordship whether that can be proved by any other means or not, but what I submit is, that this is the only proper way of proving it; that this is the public voucher for the receipt of that sum by the treasurer of the navy; that if we were to attempt to prove it by any other means, we should prove it, irregularly; and that it is by the production of these vouchers that his accounts, as treasurer of the navy, are afterwards passed. The receipt I offered to produce to your lordships in evidence, I have in my hand, and we will prove lord Melville's hand-writing to it, if it is not admitted.

Mr. Plumer.—We admit it to be lord Melville's signature.

Mr. Giles.—This is a receipt from lord Melville to the executors of Mr. Douglas, for the balance of the money due on account of Exchequer fees. Your lordships will attend to the words of the receipt, which purport that Mr. Douglas was paymaster to lord Melville, during both treasurerships.

The Receipt was read and is as follows:

"4,475*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* London, 10th Jan. 1786.

"Then received from Archibald Douglas, esq. acting ex<sup>t</sup> to Andrew Douglas, esq. my late paymaster, four thousand four hundred and seventy-five pounds four shillings and nine-pence, being the amount of a balance remaining in his hands, due to me upon account of twelve thousand pounds advanced him in the course of my two treasurerships to pay Exchequer fees, &c. per account also received. HENRY DUNDAS."

A Lord.—It appears to me that the evidence given is in order to show the recognition, on the part of lord Melville, of this person as his official deputy; and if the letter which has been read, or the receipt last read, amount to such recognition of this gentleman as his official deputy, then I think there would be no difficulty in giving in evidence his acts of office as the acts of office of lord Melville.

A Lord.—I feel very great difficulty in knowing how to state the question without affecting to debate; but I apprehend—and I will take leave to put it in that way), that I may have the opportunity of receiving satisfaction from those who can give it me, as to the view with which the evidence is offered,—I conceive that if it is already proved to your lordships' satisfaction, that Mr. Douglas was the paymaster of lord Melville; and if it is already proved to your lordships' satisfaction, that by the constitution, and nature, and duty of the office, the paymaster so appointed by the principal, was to receive the money, and was in the execution of his duty, and according to the nature of it to certify such receipt of money; if that be proved, the question will then fairly arise, whether the certificate is evidence against lord Melville, and for what purposes it is evidence. It may perhaps be the effect of an anxious attention to this evidence, that it has escaped me, if it is yet proved by any thing that I can call proof, that such is the nature, and duty, and constitution of the paymaster's office; for that I apprehend must be proved either by the habitual practice in the office, or by some document stating what the nature of the office is. Supposing this to be sufficiently proved, I wish then to ask the managers whether they mean to contend, that if these facts were sufficiently proved, the certificates would be evidence, not only in a civil proceeding, to charge lord Melville with the amount of the money, but whether they would be evidence in a criminal proceeding to enable this Court to convict him of guilt.

Mr. Giles.—There will be no difficulty in satisfying the noble lord of the facts which he has supposed respecting the constitution of the office; and certainly, when they are proved, the managers do mean to contend that this is evidence of a payment of 45,000*l.* from the Exchequer to the treasurer of the navy, and that it is admissible evidence in a criminal proceeding. I do not say that it establishes lord Melville's criminality, for those are two very distinct questions. Certainly, taken by itself, it establishes no criminality whatever, but must be followed up by a great variety of other circumstances, which we are in the course of proving; but I undertake to prove to the noble lord's satisfaction, that the nature of the evidence is precisely that which his lordship supposes.

Lord Chancellor.—The question (as it strikes me) will be this, not merely whether lord Melville would be civilly responsible for this sum of money, whether he personally received it or not; but whether in the course of this criminal prosecution, the evidence be sufficient to establish the actual receipt of that sum of money by lord Melville.

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—When any payment is made at the Exchequer, on account of the treasurer of the navy or his paymaster, by what authority, or upon what voucher, is that payment made.

Mr. Standert.—We do not know at the Navy-office.

Mr. Giles.—I believe the witness we propose to call to-morrow, will give the noble lord very satisfactory information upon that subject.

A Lord.—I wish it should be understood, that I rose for the purpose of stating to your lordships, that it did seem to me, that the managers had not gone to the length of proof which entitled them to raise the question.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

THIRD DAY.

Thursday, May 1, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament, into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the Lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the managers were obliged to delay producing the entry of the power of attorney we proposed to read yesterday, owing to the absence of Mr. Dyson, who appears to be the attesting witness to it. Mr. Dyson is now attending, and, with your lordships leave, I will call him to give such account of the original power of attorney, as is within his recollection.

Then James Dyson, esq. was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Were you solicitor for the Admiralty in the year 1782?

Mr. Dyson.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Were you acquainted with the late Mr. Andrew Douglas, who was then paymaster to lord Melville?

Mr. Dyson.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any recollection of being desired by Mr. Douglas to pass the patent of lord Melville, upon his appointment to the office of treasurer of the royal navy?

Mr. Dyson.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any recollection of having provided a stamp for the power of attorney from lord Melville to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Dyson.—I have a faint recollection of it, but no positive recollection.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any recollection of having attested such power of attorney, when executed by lord Melville?

Mr. Dyson.—I have a very slight recollection of attesting it, at the Navy-pay office in Broad-street.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any doubt that you did attest a power of attorney, executed by lord Melville, authorizing Mr. Douglas to act as his paymaster?

Mr. Dyson.—I cannot positively speak to that fact; I am inclined to believe it; beyond that I cannot go.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any doubt of having attested the execution of it?

Mr. Dyson.—I do not know very well how to answer that question; I cannot go farther than I have already done.

Then James Dyson, esq. was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Has any circumstance recently brought this to your recollection, or do you now speak entirely from your own memory upon the subject, without having recourse to any written paper that has lately been shown to you?

Mr. Dyson.—From a paper that has been shown to me this morning.

Mr. Plumer.—Without that paper, had you any memory at all of the transaction?

Mr. Dyson.—As far as concerns the passing of the patent, I am sure I could not have forgotten it.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you, independently of that paper, any recollection of attesting the power of attorney?

Mr. Dyson.—If I had been asked the question, I should, on considering, probably have recollected it without seeing that paper; but I was not thinking of it.

Mr. Plumer.—Were you asked the question, whether you recollected your having attested that power of attorney before that paper was shown you?

Mr. Dyson.—Yes; and I gave a like answer to what I have given now (and not to the managers, or any person concerned for them) before any paper was seen.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the managers for the House of Commons, propose now to read the entry made at the Exchequer of this power of attorney; conceiving that, considering the space of time that has elapsed since the execution of it, it is quite impracticable to give your lordships more satisfactory evidence of its existence than you now have.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I submit to your lordships, that they have not now entitled themselves, by this evidence (understanding that they do not mean to go further), to read that entry in the book. In order to do that, it was necessary for them to establish, as a fact, the pre-existence of a power of attorney, executed by lord Melville, to that purport and effect.

We are not now in a case, where an instrument is presented to a witness, who, after a length of time, seeing his own attestation and subscription, speaks to the best of his knowledge and belief, of having done that which the attestation purports that he did. In that case, I admit, it would be quite sufficient for the witness to say what Mr. Dyson has said, looking at the paper, which would of itself afford a considerable degree of corroboration, confirmation, and assistance to the witness; and which, if his recollection of the fact were partial and defective, would supply him with evidence of it,—where the instrument is in the eye of the Court. Here we have not the instrument—we do not see the signature of the noble defendant—we have not any additional testimony whatever, to establish this preliminary fact, whether such a paper did exist or not. In order to prove it to exist, what is the evidence given? The gentleman says, I cannot positively speak to it—I am inclined to believe it—further than that, I cannot go;—I have a faint recollection upon the subject:—but he will not take upon himself positively to say, that the fact was so. My lords, is this sufficient in a criminal case? I submit it is not. The fact must be proved, not by an inclination of the witness to believe—not what he may have a faint recollection about, but what he will take upon himself positively, upon his oath, to assert was the fact, which is a necessary step to let in the secondary evidence.

Mr. Adam.—My lords, this evidence is given, in order to satisfy your lordships that the instrument proposed to be given in evidence did exist. I humbly submit to your lordships, that this is no evidence of that fact, because the recollection of the witness is so uncertain, that he does not venture to speak to a particular power. My lords, there may have been more powers than one, there may have been different powers executed; and while that is the case, and it is impossible to fix the witness to a particular recollection, I trust your lordships will not think this sufficient to entitle the evidence to be read.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the only observation I have to make, in answer to the argument of the learned counsel, is this;—they seem to think that the witness had forgotten the transaction, and that he recollected it only by looking at the paper. Your lordships will observe, that the witness has stated that before he had seen the paper, upon the question being first proposed to him, he gave the same account he has now given before your lordships.

My lords, doubtless an attesting witness to a transaction twenty-six years ago, cannot, unless he sees his hand-writing, speak positively and certainly to the having attested an instrument. Your lordships would be more inclined to suspect the veracity and truth of the witness, if he had so positively sworn; but, speaking with that sort of reserve, with which it becomes every man of honour and honesty to speak upon such an occasion, he tells your lordships, that he has a faint recollection of the transaction; and not only so, but recollects the place where the execution took place, namely, the Navy-pay-office, in Broad-street.—It is impossible that your lordships can expect more positive evidence of a transaction which took place so many years ago. There are other honourable managers who will address your lordships upon this point, but I do trust that the evidence which we have already produced, entitles us to read the copy entered in the Exchequer book.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—My lords, I do not conceive it necessary for me to add many words to that which has been addressed to your lordships. If this be not sufficient evidence to entitle us to give the next best evidence to this paper, it seems to me impossible that at such a distance of time any sufficient account can be given of any paper. In deciding this point, your lordships will take into consideration, that the rules of evidence do not require impossibilities; they only require the best account to be given of a paper, which from the nature of the case can be given.

It appears to me that the objection of the learned counsel is founded upon their keeping back, or forgetting some of the evidence that has been given. The counsel say, there is no evidence to prove that the paper attested by this witness, is the paper respecting which we are now inquiring; the learned counsel forget that the time of the execution of the power of attorney was the time when he passed the patent of Mr. Dundas; what other power of attorney could there be? What better account of it can possibly be given than has been given? It is one entire transaction; it is the power of attorney necessary to be given for the purpose of conveying to Mr. Douglas the authority which lord Melville had, and for the purpose of carrying into effect that for which the patent was then passed.

Then, my lords, it is further stated, that the witness did not recollect, but that his memory was refreshed by the paper—that proceeds on forgetting what the witness had said; for the witness distinctly says, that before he had any conversation with any manager, before any paper was shown him, he did state, that he recollected the execution of this paper. Therefore with great deference to your lordships, I submit this case stands as strong as it possibly can stand upon a transaction which took place so many years ago; but if any further evidence need be given, perhaps there is one slight circumstance that might be added which puts this out of all doubt, and that indeed appears already before the Court, namely, that Mr. Douglas acted as the paymaster of lord Melville.

Your lordships will recollect a number of cases in which it has been decided, that the acting in a particular character is evidence of that particular character. Probably we might dispense with this altogether; and the counsel must put out of sight the letter written by lord Melville, in which he describes Mr. Douglas as being his paymaster, upon which the Exchequer acted with that gentleman as the accredited agent of lord Melville;—he could not in that character act without a power of attorney.

Lord Chancellor.—What distinct act of Mr. Douglas, in the character of paymaster to lord Melville, do you conceive you have established?

Mr. Giles.—The managers conceive they have fully established that Mr. Douglas was the paymaster of lord Melville, by the best possible evidence against lord Melville, the letter of lord Melville, informing the Navy-board he had so appointed him; and if I recollect right, the clerk who produced the book from the Treasury, spoke of Mr. Douglas's having acted as the paymaster of lord Melville; if not, the Bank clerk certainly did, for he attended at the Bank with lord Melville to sign the Firm Book, in order that his signature might be known at the Bank, and his drafts be answered.

Lord Chancellor.—What is the date of the power of attorney you propose to read?

Mr. Giles.—The 24th of August, 1782.

Lord Chancellor.—What is the date of the letter?

Mr. Giles.—That is the 26th, two days afterwards.

Lord Chancellor.—I wish to know whether the entry you propose to read of this power of attorney, has the appearance of an attesting witness to it, of the name of Dyson?

Mr. Giles.—Yes, my lord, it has; and he is described as solicitor to the Admiralty.

Mr. Whitbread.—The attestation is, that it was sealed and delivered, being first duly stamped, in the presence of James Dyson, solicitor to the Admiralty; and it is entered in the Treasury book 30th of August, 1782.

A Lord.—I wish Mr. Dyson to be called back, to answer a question which I do not recollect having been put to him. He stated that he prepared the paper; but I do not recollect that he stated that he had any recollection of attesting it.

Then James Dyson, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Lord Chancellor.—You stated that you had a slight recollection of preparing this paper, does your recollection also go to your being an attesting witness to it?

Mr. Dyson.—My answer went to the attestation, and not to the making it out; I do not believe I did fill it up.

A Lord.—I do not apprehend that the appointment of paymaster gives the party any of that authority which he has under the power of attorney. I desire to know, whether Mr. Dyson recollects the purport and contents of the power of attorney which he recollects he so attested?

Mr. Dyson.—My recollection goes to its being of this purport—to authorize the paymaster to apply to the Treasury, from time to time, for monies to be imprested to the treasurer of the navy; and, afterwards, when the monies were deposited in the Bank, to draw them out as the cashiers should have occasion for them.

A Lord.—Do you believe that the power of attorney could have been drawn up for any other purposes than those you have communicated to us?

Mr. Dyson.—I should think, certainly not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—We have abundant evidence to show that Mr. Douglas acted as paymaster to lord Melville; but, your lordships must be aware, from the course of the proceeding, that it is the same evidence which we shall shortly lay before you in the progress of this trial. We do not wish to forestall it, but we can show, by lord Melville's confession and a variety of circumstances, that Mr. Douglas acted as his paymaster; though we do not now wish to press it upon the Court.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I shall make very few observations in reply. It does not appear to me that it is at all material to hear the evidence proposed to be given to prove that Mr. Douglas acted as paymaster. It appears to me, that two things are contended upon this subject; viz. first the character of paymaster, and all that he might do in that character officially as such, though he never had been authorized by any power of attorney to do any thing beyond it; and, secondly, a perfectly distinct question, which is now before your lordships, whether he had superadded to the character of paymaster, any authority of any kind from lord Melville. I beg that these two questions may be kept perfectly distinct. That he was the paymaster; that he acted as paymaster, I do not dispute; that is not the question. The question is, was he authorized by a power of attorney, duly executed by the noble defendant, besides his being paymaster? That I deny; I deny that they have entitled themselves to offer any evidence upon that subject. That is a separate and independent question. Now, that he ever did any one single act which might not be explained by his filling the character of paymaster alone, or that they have given any evidence upon that subject I deny. All the evidence upon the subject that has hitherto been given, is referable to that character which he indisputably possessed, and which I do not controvert. In order to show that, besides being paymaster, he was for any purpose the authorized attorney of lord Melville, they must prove it; and in proving that, it is necessary, as a substantive preliminary fact, to prove that an instrument for that purpose was executed by the noble defendant. The evidence upon that subject is defective.

The honourable manager has said, that "we have not fairly treated the question, because we consider the witness as having fortified his recollection upon the subject, by reference to a paper; whereas on a former occasion and without any reference to the paper, he said the same as he does now." I am in your lordship's recollection, whether I pressed that, or made a single observation upon it. I admitted, that he might fairly have had his recollection revived, by an observation of that paper; but when he answered in the negative, my argument proceeded upon his answer, that it was nothing more than a doubtful recollection, not a positive assertion of the fact.—That is my objection.

Now, my lords, in proving this case, your lordships are to have this fact, namely, the existence of a paper established, by precisely the same sort of evidence as you are to have every fact established before you. And it becomes an universal question—Whether if all the facts in the cause are proved by similar testimony only, that is to say, if they have no one positive witness, but all speak as Mr. Dyson does to this—"I have a faint recollection. I will not be positive. I have some faint idea upon the subject, but I cannot go beyond that"—Would any one of your lordships pronounce a verdict of guilty with respect to any one fact that is to be taken as proved against the noble defendant? because it is not enough that a witness says, "I have a faint recollection of it—I am inclined to believe it," but you must have positive, decisive testimony, before it is possible to convict any individual in any case whatever.

My lords, the honourable and learned manager, who spoke second upon this subject, has stated that it was impossible, at this distance of time, to do more than they have done; that the rules of evidence require nothing impossible—that they have given reasonable evidence—such as is required at this time. With great submission to the manager, the rules of evidence do not vary upon a subject like the present—the existence of a fact—either by the distance of a time when the fact happened, or by the difficulty of supplying that evidence by any other testimony. If any difficulty has arisen from the lapse of time, or the death of witnesses, or any other cause, it does not let in inferior or secondary evidence: it is a misfortune happening to all testimony depending on living witnesses,—that it dies with the person, and when the witness is gone, you cannot supply it by any inferior or secondary evidence.

My lords, one of the honourable managers spoke of our having treated this witness improperly, when the reserve with which he has spoken tends to add additional credit to what he has said. We did not mean to say that he had not spoken to the best of his recollection on the subject; but only to insist upon this, that, after he has exercised the best memory he can on the subject, it ends in doubt; and doubtful evidence is not sufficient to establish any one fact against the noble defendant.

Lord Chancellor.—If any noble lord is desirous that this subject should be a matter of further consideration in the Chamber of Parliament, it will be proper that he should now move to adjourn; if not, I have formed an opinion and I will deliver it.

The question is, not whether upon Mr. Dyson's testimony alone, but, whether upon all the evidence of which the House is in possession upon the subject, this power of attorney shall or shall not be read. What is to be the ultimate effect and consequence of its being read, whether it will ever lead to any thing that may touch the noble lord is not the question. The question is, whether the House is to take as a fact upon this evidence, that such a power of attorney as purports to be entered in this book, was executed by lord Melville.

The facts upon which we are to decide are; that Mr. Douglas is dead; that his papers were in the possession of his widow, who kept them in the manner which has been described by her, and which it is not necessary to repeat; that an original, after the most diligent search, cannot be found; but that there appears an entry in the book which has been described, and which is proposed to be read, which entry bears date the 24th day of August, 1782, and is of a power of attorney of some sort or other; of what sort the book will exhibit when it comes to be read; but I asked the question of the honourable managers, whether or not the entry purported to have the attestation of that witness? for if it had not had such attestation, I should have been of opinion it was not fit to be read; but it was answered, that it was so attested. There is also a letter from the noble lord himself, in which he says he had constituted, no matter with what power, Mr. Douglas as his paymaster. The letter is silent with respect to the power, but we may safely look to the book, when it comes to be read, for the instrument by which the power was created; because the letter bears date the 26th day of August, 1782, only two days after the date of that entry proposed to be read to the House.

It was also proved, before Mr. Dyson was presented to us, that there was an entry in the book of the Bank, such as is to be found in the book of every private banker when a person opens an account, viz. the name of the party written by himself, so as to be a security, as far as security can be had, against the imitation of the hand-writing by persons guilty of forgery; and this entry has also been exhibited in evidence before your lordships. Mr. Dyson was then called; and the difficulty attending his evidence is this: that Mr. Dyson cannot be presented with the original, which he attested; he cannot look at his own attestation, in his own hand-writing; if he could have been shown his own attestation, in his own hand-writing, it would have been conclusive, though he had had no trace at all in his memory, that he had subscribed it as a witness. Instances of this kind must be familiar to every gentleman in the profession of the law. A witness, who has subscribed in the course of a year, in consequence of being an attorney's clerk, perhaps, five hundred different instruments, cannot possibly swear, when he is examined as the attesting witness, that he has a trace in his memory of all his attestations. He is asked, is that your hand-writing? If he were further to be asked, do you remember whether you saw that executed? In what room was it? What were the colours of the curtains? He certainly could not remember any of those circumstances, but, conscious of his own integrity, he would answer thus: I see my name here as a witness; I know I should not have subscribed it unless I had seen the act done which my name stands here to attest. This is the course of evidence, and if it were a case of high treason it would be sufficient; but for want of the original, this convincing testimony cannot be had.

The next question therefore is, does Mr. Dyson's testimony, coupled with all the rest of the evidence, go far enough to entitle the managers to read this entry? He says, that he has a slight recollection of the circumstance of his attestation, but he cannot swear positively to it—he cannot go any further than a recollection in his mind upon the subject; and, on being asked whether he has any doubt of the fact, he answers in a manner extremely favourable to the credit due to a witness—he does not say he has no doubt, but abides by the answer he had given. This, my lords, is sufficient; for he could have no recollection at all concerning it, if the fact had never existed. He is then asked by the counsel for lord Melville this question: Had you any original recollection of this, or is your recollection created by the paper shown to you? Now I will suppose, first, that he had said his recollection was only suggested by the paper, even that would not be a sufficient objection, because the paper could not suggest a recollection of what never had happened: but is it not stronger when the witness states an original recollection of the circumstance, which recollection receives confirmation and corroboration from the paper in question? Under these circumstances, unless any noble lord should be of opinion that the matter requires further consideration, I think the paper ought to be read.

Then the Paper was read from the book, entitled, "Letters of Attorney, from August 1779 to February 1784," and is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, the right honourable Henry Dundas, treasurer of his majesty's navy, have made, ordained, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do make, ordain, constitute, and appoint Andrew Douglas, of Suffolk-street, in the parish of Saint Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, my true and lawful attorney, for me, and in my name, and on my behalf to transact, do, perform, and execute all such matters and things, as either now do, or shall hereafter, in any manner whatsoever, appertain to the duties of my office, or place of treasurer of his majesty's navy; and is specially for me, and in my name, and to my use, to apply for, and receive of, and from the officers of the receipt of his majesty's Exchequer for the time being, all and every such sum and sums of money as shall from time to time be wanting and necessary for the due execution of my said office, and to give and sign receipts for the same; I the said Henry Dundas hereby ratifying and confirming, and agreeing to ratify and confirm, all and whatsoever my said attorney shall lawfully do or cause to be done in and about the premises, by virtue of these presents. In witness whereof, I the said Henry Dundas have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 24th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1782.

"HENRY DUNDAS, (L. S.)

"Entered 30th Aug. 1782.

"W. H. R."

"Sealed and delivered, being first duly stamped, in the presence of

"JAMES DYSON, Solicitor of the Admiralty"

Mr. Giles.—The managers for the Commons have taken the opportunity of the adjournment of yesterday, to consider of the production of the evidence they offered just before your lordships adjourned; they are disposed now to trouble your lordships again with that evidence, conceiving that the hesitation that was discovered to your lordships receiving it, was owing perhaps to some negligence of the managers, in not fully stating to your lordships the situation and duty of the paymaster of the navy. The particular duties of this officer may be collected from one of the Reports read yesterday to your lordships; but, perhaps the best course that we can take, will be to call persons from the Navy-pay-office, who will give your lordships a clear and distinct account of the duty of the officers belonging to that office, previous to the passing of the statute for regulating the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy. I wish to take this opportunity of observing to your lordships, that the evidence which I am offering to the Court, is evidence in support of the first and tenth charges, and particularly relates to transactions which took place before the passing of the act.—The first charge is in truth comprehended in the tenth, the tenth being merely an amplification and extension of the first; and the evidence may therefore be said to relate to transactions which took place before the passing of the act, and which are all comprehended in the tenth charge.

Then George Fennell, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Are you not the accountant to the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Fennell.—I am.

Mr. Giles.—How long have you held any situation in the Navy pay-office?

Mr. Fennell.—From the year 1773.

Mr. Giles.—How long have you been accountant?

Mr. Fennell.—From the year 1788.

Mr. Giles.—Are you well acquainted with the duties of the paymaster and the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Fennell.—Generally.

Mr. Giles.—Do they not generally come under your observation as accountant to the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Fennell.—No; they do not.

Mr. Giles.—How are you then acquainted with the duties of the paymaster of the navy?

Mr. Fennell.—Generally from having belonged so long to the office.

Mr. Giles.—Does the paymaster of the navy superintend all the other officers and servants of the treasurer's office?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Did the paymaster of the navy, before the act passed, receive the money that is issued at the Exchequer for the use of the office?

Mr. Fennell.—Always, I believe.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know that of your own knowledge?

Mr. Fennell.—No.

Mr. Giles.—What were the duties of the paymaster of the treasurer of the navy before the act passed, before the year 1785, as far as you are acquainted with them?

Mr. Fennell.—A general superintendence of the duties of the office, and acting, in every respect, as I understand, for the treasurer.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know how many sub-accountants there were in the Navy pay-office before the year 1785?

Mr. Fennell.—There were only three sub-accountants, besides the paymaster.

Mr. Giles.—Of what description are the sub-accountants? how do you distinguish them?

Mr. Fennell.—The chief clerk in the cashier's or navy branch, the cashier of the victualling, and the chief clerk for the payment of wages.

Mr. Giles.—Was there a sub-accountant to each of these branches?

Mr. Fennell.—There was.

Mr. Giles.—It will be more distinct to take it the pay branch—the navy branch—and the victualling branch?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes; the navy branch, the pay branch, and the victualling branch.

Mr. Giles.—Were those sub-accountants the officers of the Navy pay-office who made all the small payments?

Mr. Fennell.—They were; except an officer for paying small contingencies.

Mr. Giles.—Did the paymaster of the navy pay, for the treasurer of the navy, money in small payments?

Mr. Fennell.—I understand the paymaster did, as it regarded Exchequer fees.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know it of your own knowledge?

Mr. Fennell.—I always understood so. I never saw any money paid, nor ever saw any account of it.

Mr. Giles.—Explain what you mean by Exchequer fees.

Mr. Fennell.—Monies paid to the officers of Exchequer on the issues of money.

Mr. Giles.—Out of what fund are those Exchequer fees paid?

Mr. Fennell.—A specific fund.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know whether it is the duty of the paymaster of the treasurer of the navy, when he receives money at the Exchequer, to transmit receipts of that money to the Navy pay-office, or a certificate of his having received the money to the Navy-office?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes, to the navy board.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know of your own knowledge that that is the course?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Is the navy board the superior board?

Mr. Fennell.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—Does the treasurer of the navy ever receive or pay any money himself as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Fennell.—None to my knowledge.

Mr. Giles.—Could he make any payments of that description before the year 1785, without your knowledge, you being accountant?

Mr. Fennell.—At that time I was not accountant.

Mr. Giles.—But were you not accountant at the time lord Melville passed his accounts of the first treasurership, and during the whole of that period?

Mr. Fennell.—Those accounts have been but lately passed.

Mr. Giles.—You were accountant then at the time those accounts were passed?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes, I was.

Mr. Giles.—Did you not make up those accounts?

Mr. Fennell.—I did.

Mr. Giles.—In the course of that investigation did it appear to you that the treasurer of the navy had ever paid or received any money as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Fennell.—It did not.

Mr. Plumer.—I am very unwilling to object, but it must be obvious that this is extremely irregular.

A Lord.—This is speaking to the contents of a written paper, which written paper must speak for itself.

Mr. Giles.—I will not pursue it now, we shall perhaps have occasion to produce that written paper before your lordships.

Then George Fennell, esq. was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—What was the situation you held in the years from 1782 to 1785?

Mr. Fennell.—That of a junior clerk of the pay branch.

Mr. Plumer.—In that character had you any means of knowledge respecting the paymaster's accounts or duties?

Mr. Fennell.—Not particularly.

Mr. Plumer.—Did your knowledge then commence in the year 1788, when you were accountant?

Mr. Fennell.—As I was longer in the office I obtained more knowledge of the general business; and I stated before that my knowledge of the duties of the paymaster was general, from having been in the office.

Mr. Plumer.—If you had left the office while you were in an inferior department, should you have been able to speak with any information upon this subject?

Mr. Fennell.—Not particularly.

Mr. Plumer.—What knowledge have you now of the duty of the paymaster to transmit certificates to the navy board, of which you have spoken?

Mr. Fennell.—I know that it has been always the practice.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know that of your own knowledge?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes, I do.

A Lord.—I desire Mr. Fennell may be asked whether, according to his knowledge, the paymaster of the treasurer of the navy is appointed by a written instrument, or how otherwise?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not know that, but from hearsay.

A Lord.—Whether you mean to say in your evidence, that the paymaster can receive one shilling at the Exchequer, unless he has a special power of attorney, given by the treasurer for that purpose?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not know it.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then William Rose Haworth, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Do you know whether the paymaster of the navy can receive any money, issued to the treasurer of the navy from the Exchequer, unless he is expressly authorized by a power of attorney, from the treasurer of the navy so to do?

Mr. Haworth.—Certainly not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—What situation do you hold in the Navy-office?

Mr. Standert.—Chief clerk for examining the treasurer's accounts.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know whether it is the duty of the paymaster of the navy when he receives money at the Exchequer, to transmit a certificate, receipt, or some document to the Navy-office, of his having so received the money at the Exchequer?

Mr. Standert.—I conceive it to be so, but I do not know it from authority.

Mr. Giles.—Is it the constant practice of the paymaster of the navy so to do, to send a certificate of the money having been received at the Exchequer?

Mr. Standert.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—Where does he send it to?

Mr. Standert.—To the navy board.

Mr. Giles.—Is the navy board the superior board?

Mr. Standert.—I think it is.

Mr. Giles.—State for what purpose is that certificate transmitted to the navy board?

Mr. Standert.—To acknowledge the receipt of the sums which the certificate contains.

Mr. Giles.—Does that acknowledgment enable the navy board to act upon it, and do they act upon it?

Mr. Standert.—It does.

Mr. Giles.—In what way do they act upon it?

Mr. Standert.—By assigning bills out of the sums which are received.

Mr. Giles.—Do you mean by assigning bills upon the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Standert.—Upon the treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Giles.—Do the navy board ever assign any bills for payment upon the treasurer of the navy, until they have received such certificate from the paymaster?

Mr. Standert.—No.

Mr. Giles.—Is the transmission of the certificate of the receipt to the navy board, a necessary preliminary to the assignment being made?

Mr. Standert.—Certainly.

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was cross-examined as follows :

Mr. Plumer.—In drawing for money or assigning bills, are the board in any measure influenced by applications from the treasurer?

Mr. Standert.—They are influenced entirely by the navy board, and not by any application from the treasurer.

Mr. Plumer.—Does the drawing for money upon the Exchequer in favour of the treasurer, originate with the treasurer or with the boards, the navy and the other boards?

Mr. Standert.—With the boards.

Mr. Plumer.—Are they, in that instance, at all influenced by any application from the treasurer?

Mr. Standert.—The treasurer never makes any.

Mr. Plumer.—Does the amount of the balance at any time in the treasurer's hand, originate from the acts of the different boards?

Mr. Standert.—Certainly.

Mr. Plumer.—Uninfluenced altogether by the treasurer or the paymaster?

Mr. Standert.—Certainly.

Lord Chancellor.—Is that which you have stated to the House in answer to the questions of the honourable manager, the invariable course of the office?

Mr. Standert.—It is.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know it to be so?

Mr. Standert.—I do.

A Lord.—Whether the answer you have last given, applies to the period previous to passing the act in 1785?

Mr. Standert.—It applies to all the cases before and subsequent.

Mr. Giles.—I now put the book into the witness's hand, which contains the certificates transmitted from the paymaster to the navy board. I mean to produce the certificate, signed by Mr. Douglas as paymaster, transmitted in the course of his official duty, to prove that such certificate was transmitted. The effect it will have upon your lordships, when you come to read the contents of it, is another thing. I do not feel myself at all bound to state to your lordships what is the ultimate object of producing it: I contend that the evidence is admissible in this cause; that the transmission of this certificate is an act of the paymaster, done in the execution of his official duty: an act which if he does not do, as paymaster, the navy board cannot make any assignment, or any order upon the treasurer, to pay bills: it is done in the course of his official duty, in execution of a trust reposed in him by the treasurer; and therefore I submit it is admissible evidence in this cause.

Lord Chancellor.—What do you propose to prove against lord Melville by that certificate?

Mr. Solicitor General.—The managers for the House of Commons offer this evidence to your lordships, for the purpose only of proving this fact, that 45,000*l.* in the first instance—we shall offer evidence of the same kind as to other sums of money—but we now offer this evidence to your lordships only for the purpose of proving, that 45,000*l.* of public money was issued from the Exchequer to Mr. Douglas, when paymaster, and as paymaster to the treasurer of the navy; for that purpose it is, we that offer this evidence; and we conceive, and with due respect for your lordships we contend, that it is admissible evidence to prove that fact, and that that fact is material to the issue which is joined between the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, and lord viscount Melville.

Your lordships, I apprehend, will not call upon us at this stage of the cause, to say, what are all the uses which we mean to make of that fact; however, it is our intention to show, that of that 45,000*l.* so issued to the paymaster of my lord viscount Melville, 5,000*l.* were never applied to any public service; and that some part of it was applied by my lord viscount Melville to his own private use. We offer this evidence, and with due respect to your lordships, we insist that we are entitled to have it received.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, the honourable and learned manager having distinctly answered for what purpose this evidence is proposed to be adduced, the question now arises, whether it is competent evidence to be received for that purpose. The question does not now stand in the vague manner in which it was originally presented to your lordships,—whether to prove any act, or any course of office, this document is proper evidence; but it is now distinctly averred, by the honourable and learned manager, that he proposes to ground upon it a positive criminal charge, and insists that this is legal evidence to establish against the noble defendant, that a sum of 45,000*l.* was paid out of the Treasury to Mr. Douglas.

My lords, I object to this evidence, and insist that, upon every principle of the law of evidence, it cannot be received. The plain simple ground, upon which I object to it, is this; that it is a written declaration by one person, not upon oath, offered to affect another. Now, it is a universal principle of the law of evidence (subject to certain exceptions), that what one man says, does, or writes, behind the back of another, cannot be received in any criminal court to affect any body but himself; that if it is necessary to substantiate any fact against a person who stands accused of a crime (and there is no distinction, whether the crime be one that affects the life of the individual, or a misdemeanor only), it must be substantiated upon oath, by the testimony of a living witness. Every individual, who stands upon his trial in a British court of justice, has a clear right to have the witness brought in the front of the Court, to be submitted to his cross-examination, that he may have an opportunity of interrogating him respecting all the particulars of the fact. Therefore, if this evidence can be received, it must be under some exception to the general rule, because it certainly is not evidence within that rule. It is merely the declaration of Mr. Douglas, offered against lord Melville. Whether it was made at one place, or at another—whether it is in writing or by word of mouth—it is nothing but a declaration of his, not made upon oath, to which he cannot be cross-examined—not made in the presence, but behind the back of the individual who is to be affected by it; and, consequently, under the general principle to which I have referred, it cannot be received in evidence.

Upon what principle is it, that, in a criminal court, evidence of this nature can be received? I presume it will be said, that the treasurer is responsible for the acts of his paymaster. I admit, that to the whole extent of his fortune, the treasurer is unquestionably responsible for the acts of his paymaster in a civil court; but, my lords, I deny altogether the consequence that such civil responsibility in any respect aids the present question, or makes this paper evidence.

It is not universally true, that the receipt or certificate (call it what you please) of an agent, is evidence to affect his principal. I know that, even in civil cases, that proposition has been controverted and denied by the highest authority.* I know that in the case of Bauerman v. Radenius (which some of your lordships will recollect is in 7 Term Reports, 664), when the case of Biggs v. Lawrence, (3 T. R. 454), was cited before the late chief justice of the King's-bench, and it was stated that his lordship had repeatedly determined to the contrary at Nisi Prius; he acquiesced in the truth of that position, and admitted that the case of Biggs v. Lawrence was not to be considered as the ruling law of the day, and it has since been repeatedly over-ruled. Upon this question I speak with the more confidence from a very recent case before a court of very high authority, the court of dernier resort on all questions which arise in the colonies, where, in the very year that I am now addressing your lordships, in a cause in which I happened to be myself of counsel, where one of the highest legal authorities in this country was personally present, and who now sits among your lordships; before that great authority this very question was presented for consideration, whether the receipt of an agent was sufficient evidence of the actual payment of a sum of money to the principal. When the question arose, we, on the part of the appellant, in opening the case, stated that we had a receipt of that agent to prove that the debt in the East-Indies, originally of seven thousand pagodas, had been reduced to a hundred and fifty, by four several payments, acknowledged by the receipt of the agent to have been actually received by him. We were interrupted by the observation of the noble and learned lord, who then sat in that court, and the Court decided, that the receipt could not in that cause be evidence of the payment of the money, and that we must call the agent to prove the fact, for that his acknowledgment of it in writing was no evidence against his principal; substantiating this doctrine, that when a fact is to be proved, you are to call the person who can prove it upon oath, and that his declaration by a written instrument is no evidence whatever.

* See Phillipps's Law of Evidence, 101, 102, 4th edit. and the cases there cited.

The same doctrine was held also in a civil case, by the predecessor* of the noble and learned lord to whom I have lately alluded, in the case of Maesters v. Abraham (1 Esp. N. P. c. 375), wherein that noble and learned lord decided, that the letter of an agent was not evidence against his principal.

That case, my lords, arose upon an agreement, by which the plaintiff had sold all his bark to the defendant at eighteen pounds a load, to be delivered in London. The question was, which party was to find bags for the carriage of it on delivery. To prove that the defendant had agreed to furnish bags, the plaintiff proved, that the bark had been sold by one Eyre, a broker; and he produced a letter from Eyre, addressed to him, in which Eyre said, "that the bags would be ready by a certain day." Eyre was at that time in the box as a witness. Your lordship,† as counsel for the defendant, insisted, that Eyre should be questioned as to the fact; and the letter should not be produced. It was answered, by the counsel on the other side, that Eyre was employed by the defendant, as his agent, and that the defendant was therefore bound by his acts. Lord Kenyon said, that, as agent, he would admit evidence of what he had done on account of the defendant, but that he must give that evidence himself, and not by his letter, and the plaintiff was accordingly nonsuited. This is another direct and positive authority, that, even in a civil case, a paper written by another, is not to be received in evidence to establish a fact, but that you must produce the author, if he be living; and if he be dead, you have lost the evidence.

I might also refer to another authority upon the same point, wherein the question, how far the declarations of an agent can affect his principal, came under the consideration of a very high court, the case of Fairlie v. Hastings (10 Ves. 127); wherein the master of the Rolls decided, that the declarations of an agent should not affect his principal, even in a civil cause, referring to the authorities I have cited, and going the full length of substantiating them.

My lords, upon these grounds I submit, that the certificate of Mr. Douglas could not be received as evidence to substantiate the payment of this sum of money, even if the question were now agitated in a civil case. But, if I were to admit, that it would indisputably be evidence against the defendant, if he were now called upon civiliter for this sum of money; yet it by no means follows, that in a criminal case, it is competent and proper evidence. And here I entreat your lordships to attend to the broad and clear distinction between civil and criminal cases, and to observe how clearly, in all the rules of evidence, the law has drawn the line of distinction between civil and criminal responsibility. When I admit that the noble defendant was civilly responsible for all the money that Mr. Douglas, Mr. Trotter, or any of the sub-accountants, may have received and expended in the course of his office; your lordships will permit me to say, that, in a criminal case, he is not responsible for their acts, farther than as he was a participator in, or cognizant of them, and authorized them. The broad distinction is, that whether he knew them or not, he is civilly responsible; but he is not criminally responsible for any one act that was not adopted by him, and confirmed as his own. In a criminal court, all the civil relation, which existed between them, is put out of the question, and you consider them as two independent individuals, each responsible only for his own acts. If this were not so, consider what would be the consequence in all the civil relations of life—between master and servant—between principal and factor—between principal and agent—between owners and captains of ships—to an immense extent. The principal is responsible for all that is done, all that is said by the agent, in the course of his employment. So partners are responsible for the acts of each other, and civiliter the acts of one may be given in evidence against the other. But does this principle apply in a criminal case? If you indict the master of a servant, or the owner of a ship, can the act of the servant or the captain possibly be given in evidence against the defendant? No; because in a criminal case there is no responsibility; each one is responsible for his own acts only. The foundation is wanting, when you attempt to charge an individual criminally for any thing that has been done by his agent or servant.

The crime wherewith a defendant is charged, must be proved against him by his own declaration, by his own papers, by his own admission, or by testimony upon oath; that is the sound and firm ground upon which I stand in support of this objection.

I rely, first, upon the general principle that requires all facts to be proved against a person upon his trial by living testimony upon oath; and insist that the exception, which holds with respect to persons standing in particular relations to others, qualified as it is even in civil cases, as I have before stated, in a criminal case fails altogether. And I think I may challenge all the learning and ability on the other side to produce even one solitary case, in which the declaration of an agent not upon oath was ever received as evidence to affect any person on a criminal trial. I trust your lordships will not make a precedent in the present case, considering that it is evidence of a description which was never received before.

* Lord Kenyon.

† Lord Chancellor Erskine.

Mr. Adam.—In this question which, in my conception of it, involves one of the most important branches of the law of evidence, I trust your lordships will favour me with a few observations; although my friend has in the most luminous manner stated the grounds upon which we object to the admissibility of this evidence. The learned manager who last addressed your lordships, stated distinctly and clearly, that it was their object in this first stage of their proof to affect the noble lord criminally; indeed it would be a nugatory proceeding to introduce this as a detached fact, for your lordships' consideration. I have to contend, before your lordships, that the principle which has been laid down by my friend (the grounds of which have been explained by him), prevails universally as a principle of the law of England, and has been repeatedly declared as such by the most eminent judges. Mr. Justice Powell, in the remarkable case of the Seven Bishops, lays it down most emphatically, that there is a distinction to be taken between that species of evidence which is admissible in the common affairs of mankind, in the civil transactions of life, and that which is admissible in criminal matters.*

My lords, the principle has been stated by my friend, that in all the intercourses of life there are a variety of civil relations, where the authority of agent will bind the principal; and he has stated to your lordships, that although the authority which is given to the agent binds the principal, it does not bind him further than in civil matters; that is, it does not make the principal criminally responsible. There is a familiar illustration of this principle which, I am sure, must enforce it upon your lordships' minds and judgments. If the proprietor of one of the ordinary conveyances in this country—a stage coach—commits any civil injury by the act of the coachman, though the proprietor is sleeping in London, when his coachman is driving at York, yet he is civilly responsible. But did any one ever hear that a person affording to the public that means of conveyance, was ever held to be criminally responsible for the act of his agent, at so great a distance? The distinction is marked and recognized, and it is clear. The question therefore is, what is the nature of the evidence that is now proposed to be produced? and what is the particular period of time?—For I trust your lordships will take that into consideration too;—that an act done by Mr. Douglas, as the mere civil agent of lord Melville, in the month of August 1782, is proposed now to be given in evidence against the noble person, within your lordships' bar, in order to prove that that noble person was guilty of a crime. If this had been a question of civil responsibility, the period at which lord Melville could have been made civilly responsible for this act, provided it was a mere act of civil duty, would have long since elapsed; and shall it be said that under the circumstances of this case, where the accusation is of a criminal nature, where this detached and isolated fact is proposed to be introduced for the purpose of forming a ground of criminal charge, it is fit that your lordships should admit it in evidence?

Let us see in what situation the parties stand; and considering the particular situation in which Mr. Douglas would have stood if he had been alive, I take for granted, the learned managers must necessarily have produced Mr. Douglas, at your lordships' bar, as a witness, to prove these facts. Now observe the situation in which Mr. Douglas is placed. He stood in this relation to lord Melville at that time, viz.: that if lord Melville was guilty of the offence, Mr. Douglas was a participator in it; he was an accomplice. Your lordships have recently passed an act of parliament, in order to indemnify persons standing in similar circumstances. The case which has been cited by my friend, of Maesters v. Abraham, proves it is necessary to produce the agent, and it is not sufficient to produce the letter of the agent; therefore it is perfectly clear, that upon every principle, Mr. Douglas must have been a witness. I then ask your lordships, if Mr. Douglas had demurred to the question, whether it would have been competent for the learned manager to have resorted to another medium of proof?—to proof not upon oath; to secondary proof; to proof that certainly would have been inadmissible if Mr. Douglas had been alive, and had protected himself against answering, because he might have given evidence to convict himself of a crime. The rule of law being, that if evidence fails from such an objection, it cannot be supplied by secondary evidence; secondary evidence being only admissible, where the primary evidence is withheld by the act of one party to the cause.

The circumstance of Mr. Douglas's death puts the question in this situation, if you lose your witness in all cases you lose your fact, where it is a fact that must be proved by evidence upon oath. The principle upon which the rule is founded I take to be clear, because if the witness is not produced, and either from death, absence, or any other cause, his testimony cannot be obtained, the immediate and necessary consequence is, that there is no opportunity of explaining all the res gesta—there is no opportunity of entering into the transaction. If Mr. Douglas were here alive to be called to prove this isolated and detached fact, those who are attending here for lord Melville would have an opportunity of calling upon him, by cross-examination, to explain all the circumstances and the peculiarities of the transaction—all the minutiae of the business that took place at that particular time, and to obtain from the witness at your lordships' bar the proper correct antidote to that poison which is attempted to be infused into this case by giving proof of the specific and distinct fact without the explanation of accompanying circumstances. I take it that this is the sound principle upon which the practice which we contend for prevails; and I take it to be clear, that upon every ground this evidence must be rejected.

* 12 Howell's State Trials, 304.

Before I conclude what I have to address to your lordships upon this subject, permit me to call to the attention of some of your lordships, who are well acquainted with it, a particular case in which this question was decided, on a trial at the bar of the court of King's-bench. I refer to the trial of Mr. Stone, in the year 1796, for high treason; when the clerk of Mr. Stone who was his agent for all the general purposes of his mercantile concerns, was produced for the express purpose of proving a letter, criminally affecting Mr. Stone; it was clear and manifest that he had not the direct authority of Mr. Stone to write that letter; and the noble person who then presided in that court, lord Kenyon, together with the other judges who were present, were clearly of opinion that the letter was not admissible evidence under these circumstances, although he was his agent for all civil purposes. I take it, that when that case comes to be examined, and the civil relation of the witness with regard to Mr. Stone comes to be attended to, it is perfectly clear that if it had been a letter about the ordinary business of Mr. Stone, binding him to the payment of a certain sum of money, by an acknowledgment of the debt in the course of his business, the necessary consequence would have been that the law would have bound Mr. Stone; but the noble judge who presided, and the other judges assisting him upon that trial, were all of opinion that the letter was not evidence to affect Mr. Stone criminally.* Under these circumstances I do trust that your lordships will not consider this certificate as competent evidence to affect lord Melville criminally.

Mr. Solicitor General.—My lords, it is not my intention to occupy much of your lordships' time, in answering the objection which has been stated by the learned counsel. If, however, it were my misfortune to be obliged to trespass long upon your lordships' time, on this occasion; at least, I should have the consolation to know, that it was upon some point material to the merits of the case, upon which your lordships have to decide; that your lordships' valuable time was not employed in hearing points of evidence, discussed upon facts merely introductory to the matter which your lordships are to try—in determining whether those facts have been proved, which are of public notoriety, and which have been repeatedly admitted by the defendant; at least, I should have the satisfaction to know, that your lordships' valuable time was usefully employed; and perhaps, my lords, it may not be improper for me, before I take notice of the particular objection which is now taken, to offer to your lordships some apology, on the part of the managers, for their not being perfectly prepared yesterday, to prove, according to the strictest rules of evidence, some of the facts which they were called upon by the learned counsel to prove. I hope your lordships will think, that they were in some degree excusable, if they did not imagine that they would be called upon before your lordships, to prove, in the strictest manner, and according to the most rigid rules of evidence, facts which it could not have entered into their conception, that they would be called upon to prove at all.

My lords, the managers for the House of Commons could not forget, that, upon a very memorable occasion, when the noble lord, upon whose conduct your lordships are sitting in judgment, appeared in the House of Commons, and addressed them upon the subjects which your lordships are now to inquire into; he declared that his fame was far more valuable to him than his fortune.* I may properly refer to this speech, because I believe it will hereafter be strictly in evidence before your lordships. My lords, bearing that in their minds, the managers conceived, that the noble lord and his friends would have thought the greatest calamity that could have befallen him, would have been, to have been acquitted by your lordships, because the managers had failed in proof of some of those facts which they were called upon strictly to prove. I offer this to your lordships only by way of apology for the managers not having been perfectly prepared with all the evidence that they were called on to produce yesterday; and I now shall take up but very little of your lordships' time upon the objection which has been stated to your lordships.

My lords, the learned counsel seem, I think, to have confounded two things, which it is extremely important should be kept perfectly distinct. The question before your lordships is not what the effect of the evidence we offer is—what the evidence which we offer to your lordships will prove—but the only question now is, whether that evidence be or be not admissible; and I believe,—I will not take upon me confidently to say, because I have not in my recollection all the cases to which the learned counsel have referred, and have had no opportunity now of looking at them; but, I believe,—in every one of those cases, the question was not, whether the evidence should be received; but whether, if received, it proved the case of the party who produced it.

My lords, the learned counsel for the noble defendant have stated to your lordships, the distinction between the civil and the criminal responsibility of a party:—They have stated, that there is a distinction as to the rule of evidence in civil cases and in criminal cases.—My lords, for the present purpose, I will not take upon myself to say, whether as an universal proposition, there be any distinction between the cases; but, in their case, I contend that there is no such distinction; and all the cases which have been alluded to by the learned counsel, only show that there is a distinction as to the effects, civilly or criminally, against the party who is to be made responsible upon such evidence; that is the only effect of the distinction the learned gentleman has stated, and has no relation at all to the question, whether it should be received as evidence. But, your lordships are to consider, that in this case, we are offering to your lordships a certificate, or if they please to call it, a receipt, of the paymaster, for public money issued to him as paymaster of the treasurer of the navy; and your lordships having decided that the evidence which we had antecedently offered was competent to prove the existence of the letter of attorney, and that letter of attorney being now in evidence before your lordships, what application can any of the cases which the learned counsel have stated, have to the case which is now before your lordships? Because, in the case of Mr. Stone, who was tried for high treason, it was held, that an agent, employed to act civilly for another, could not be considered as authorised to write a letter for him, by which he would be implicated in the crime of high treason; is it from thence to be concluded, that where a man has executed a formal power of attorney, authorising another to act for him, in every respect as his paymaster, nay, to sign receipts for him at the Exchequer, the party who has executed such a power of attorney, will not be bound by receipts which have been signed by that very person whom he has so authorised to act for him? for your lordships are not now to decide what is the effect of this evidence, but the only question now is, whether they shall be received as evidence, that the party acting under that power did sign receipts, by which he acknowledged to have received the money. Your lordships will recollect, that what we propose to prove (whether we shall succeed in it or not will be for your lordships hereafter to determine) is, that Mr. Douglas handed over part of the 45,000*l.* mentioned in that receipt, to lord Melville; and that lord Melville applied it to his own use.

* Vide Stone's case, antè, vol. 25, p. 1311—1314.

* Vide p. 586.

Upon deciding the question, whether this is to be received as evidence or not, your lordships must give us credit for proving that which we offer to prove;—your lordships otherwise would, when deciding only upon a part of the case, make a decision which will have the effect of deciding the whole case; and your lordships perceive by this, the great inconvenience there is in having questions of this kind discussed before your lordships, which are, in substance, questions as to the effect of the evidence after it shall have been received, but which, in form, are offered to your lordships as objections to the evidence being at all received.—Your lordships must decide, that this evidence, when received, coupled with the other evidence we are about to offer to your lordships, and which you have not yet heard, will not be sufficient to prove the facts which we undertake to prove. Your lordships must take upon you to decide that in the first instance, before you can decide that this evidence is not to be received. I think I should waste your lordships time if I took up any more of it upon this question.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Perhaps I ought to apologize to your lordships for taking up any time after you have heard the arguments of my learned and honourable friend.—But my lords, the counsel for the defendant have discussed this point with so much vehemence, as to give it an appearance as if there was more in the objection, than, when it comes to be considered, there really is.—They appear also extremely anxious that your lordships should not do that, which they suppose your lordships will do if you decide for the reception of this evidence, namely, overturn the established rules of evidence—an important part of the law of the land.—My lords, we do not feel that your lordships, by deciding for the reception of this evidence, will overturn any one acknowledged rule of evidence,—on the contrary we feel, and confidently feel, that this evidence cannot be rejected without overturning all the rules upon which courts of justice have been uniformly in the habit of acting.

The learned counsel have endeavoured to distinguish between civil and criminal cases.—There is a considerable distinction between them, but that distinction consists rather in the number of facts to be proved, than in the manner of proving any of them. It is necessary that more facts should be proved for the purpose of showing that a man has money in his possession, or has had money come into his possession, so as to make him liable to the criminal law, than to make him civilly responsible; but, though more facts should be proved in one case than is necessary to be proved in the other, each particular fact is to be proved by precisely the same evidence. The law of evidence is founded on common sense, and that being the case, what is proof of a fact in one case must be proof of the same fact in every other case.*

Your lordships know that this has been settled by a solemn decision in one of the courts of law; in the case of the Attorney General v. Le Merchant (2 T. R. 201), it was expressly decided that the rules are precisely the same in criminal and civil cases; if it were not so, it appears to me, that it would be perfectly impossible ever to reach the noble defendant? What is the charge against the noble defendant? It is this, that his agent having received money into his hands, the noble defendant permitted that agent to apply it to the purposes to which it ought not to be applied, and that the noble defendant himself derived advantages from such application.

* See what was said by Grose, J. and Lawrence, J. in Stone's case, antè, vol. 25, p. 1313, 1314.

What course does reason point out, for the purpose of establishing this guilt of the noble defendant? Should we first begin to prove the criminal application of the money? no, it is impossible; we must first prove that the money has been received, and after we have satisfactorily proved that, then comes the evidence to prove what has been its application after it has been received. By whom was it received? why, according to all the evidence, it was never immediately received from the Exchequer by the hands of the noble defendant: it is the course of office that it should be received by the paymaster. If we are then to be stopped here, and to be told "you cannot prove the receipt of the money by the paymaster," it is impossible we can ever reach the noble defendant, as he never received any money himself, but it was all received by the paymaster. Stop us here then, and you put an end to the charge. All the cases prove, that if Mr. Douglas were the civil agent of a private person, his act in the receipt of money would be sufficient to charge his principal with that receipt; as he was the substitute and representative and sole agent of a public officer, discharging for that officer every duty of his office, the principal himself never appearing or acting, the case is much stronger.

I will put a case, which it is impossible to distinguish from this, the case of a sheriff and under-sheriff; the acknowledgments of the under-sheriff are always taken as evidence against the sheriff. Why? because the sheriff himself never acts, but the under-sheriff always acts for him; so here, the noble defendant never acted by himself, but by his agent. And therefore, as in the case of the sheriff, the declarations and acts of the under-sheriff are proved to affect the sheriff; so, in this case the acts and declarations of the paymaster must be received in evidence; or else it would be absolutely impossible, under any circumstances, in this case, to reach the noble defendant. This certificate, which we now offer, is given to the navy board in the uniform and regular course, by this particular officer, whenever he receives any money, and upon this certificate they make up their accounts with the public. This circumstance alone gives it credit sufficient to make it evidence. Upon these grounds I trust your lordships will receive this certificate in evidence, for the purpose of proving this first fact, namely, that 45,000*l.* was actually received by lord Melville's deputy from the public. We shall then go on, and by other evidence show the concern the noble defendant himself had in the use of that money.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I shall detain your lordships very shortly in replying to the arguments of the two honourable and learned managers, who have urged the competency of this evidence.—In doing so I shall endeavour to confine myself to the arguments which apply to the evidence now before your lordships, and to the proceedings of this day; as I am a little at a loss to conceive how it can tend very much to shorten your lordships' proceedings, or to save your lordships' valuable time, if instead of confining ourselves to what is the evidence now before your lordships, and to the propriety of any objections taken to it, we are to enter into an argument on what passed yesterday, as to the propriety or impropriety of what was then offered as evidence.

I am quite sure the honourable manager did not do so for the purpose of conveying any insinuations against the noble defendant. I recollect the honourable and learned manager himself volunteered a question upon the competency of the evidence, when on the part of the noble defendant we were willing to have admitted the inferior evidence to be received without comment, if the honourable and learned manager had not for the very purpose of provoking discussion, insisted upon the validity of that, which was determined not to be competent evidence. I do hope, therefore, that the argument will be confined to what is the question at the present time, and I conceive it to be a little hard upon the noble defendant, that insinuations should be thrown out to his prejudice for what (if there be any thing improper in it) I hope your lordships will believe is imputable entirely to his counsel. Whatever there may be of blame, if your lordships' time is improperly for one moment occupied in any one of these discussions, I entreat of your lordships to believe that I am acting in direct opposition to the earnest intreaties of the noble defendant, who feels the greatest anxiety that an individual can feel to accelerate your lordships' proceedings, and to bring them to that termination, to which he looks forward with confidence in the justice and wisdom of your lordships.

But, my lords, it is a little hard to be told that we are wasting your lordships' valuable time, when we are endeavouring to discharge our duty to the best of our power; when we should not deserve to wear the gowns we have upon our backs, if we could stand by and suffer incompetent evidence to be recorded on your lordships' minutes; charged as we are, not solely with the care of the noble individual before your lordships, but charged to resist the admission of incompetent evidence in justice to this high court, in justice to every individual who may ever stand before this or any other court, in justice to our own honour and character as professional men. And I trust your lordships will not suffer,—more especially by these posthumous inquiries, by reference to the proceedings of an antecedent day, by reference to what the noble defendant may have said in another place, and which does not belong, and is stated not to belong, to the present subject,—that any thing shall be inferred which trenches upon the rights and privileges of the noble defendant. It is with great satisfaction, I observe, the honourable and learned manager have recourse to these subjects, and flying from the matter before him, having recourse to antecedent proceedings, and not grappling with the present subject. I know his talents, and am rejoiced to see that he is not able to grapple with any one of the authorities I have stated, nor have any one of the learned and honourable managers been able to give any satisfactory answer to the arguments upon which we resist this evidence.

If the question now were, whether the evidence be relevant or not, and it were objected to upon the ground of its irrelevancy, I admit, that what the honourable and learned managers have said, would have some weight. But they are not now called upon to push it to all its consequences, and show all its bearings upon the subject. When the question is, whether the evidence is competent or not, how can it be material to inquire into the effect it will have hereafter? We resist it, not upon the ground of irrelevancy, for, undoubtedly, it is relevant, but upon the ground of incompetency.

Now, what answer has been given to either of the authorities we have cited? The learned managers have condescended to take notice of only one of them, the case of the King v. Stone; in which it is said, that a person is not to be responsible in high treason, for a letter written by his agent, without his authority.—True, and so my friend stated; but he stated it for the purpose of showing the distinction between a civil and criminal case, that a person was his authorized agent, and did in fact write letters for him, and the letters he wrote would be received in a civil court of justice; but, in a criminal case they were not evidence. Excepting that case, I have heard nothing from the learned and honourable managers, except that one of them has cited the case of the Attorney General v. Le Merchant. Of that case I have a general recollection, though the particulars are not stated by the honourable and learned manager; but it does appear to me, with submission to your lordships, that it has no fair application to the present subject. The question there was, whether, after notice had been given to the defendant to produce a paper in his possession, and he omitted so to do, parol evidence could be received of its contents; and, upon that occasion, it was stated that, in that respect, there is no distinction between the rules in a criminal and a civil court.—Undoubtedly not—the course of proceeding is the same; and parol evidence was admitted in that case, as it has been and will properly be in the present. But the case of the Attorney General v. Le Merchant was not a criminal case,—it was a proceeding in the court of Exchequer; and all proceedings there are of a civil nature, for that court has no criminal jurisdiction whatever.—That therefore was not a criminal case, even if it were more applicable than it is. It illustrates a proposition which I do not dispute, namely, that, upon certain subjects, the rules of evidence are the same in a civil and in a criminal court. I desire it may be distinctly understood, that I do not dispute that the rules of evidence are the same in both: but the ground upon which I stand is this; that both in a criminal and in a civil court, all evidence to affect a defendant must be proved upon oath, for the reasons which have been already stated,—namely, the right of the person, to be affected by it, to cross examine and obtain explanation from the testimony of the living witness.

What is the distinction then, in civil and criminal cases, with respect to the reception of evidence? It is this; that in the application of evidence, the legality and competency of it grows out of the civil responsibility, in a civil case. It is not that the rules of evidence are at all altered, but that when you are looking at the individual who stands in a civil relation, and are pursuing it with that view, there is an identity of persons between the agent and principal, and all that one has done or said, is done or said by the other, because to that purpose they are one and the same; and thus it is that the rules of evidence properly let in all that has been done by one to affect the other. But, when there is no longer that identity of persons—when there is no longer that responsibility, as there is not in a criminal case, then what each party has done and said cannot be received against the other. That is the plain sound, and clear principle upon which we stand; not contending that the rules of law are different in the two cases, but that the ultimate result of the inquiry makes that which is competent, legal, and proper in one case, not so in the other.—What I mainly rely upon is this, that however civilly responsible lord Melville may be, for the receipts of Mr. Douglas, criminally he cannot; and, that as establishing this fact is one link of the chain, which is to be proved against the noble defendant, it must be proved by the correct evidence which is to be received in every court. I am sure your lordships will perceive that this is a most important question, not simply as it concerns the present defendant, but as it respects every individual who stands in any civil relation whatever; for, upon the same principles, on which it is argued that this evidence ought to be received against the noble defendant, every individual in the kingdom may be affected by the acts of his servant, by the acts of his factor, by the acts of his agent, by the declarations, by the books, by the writings, and the papers of others, to an extent that may affect his fortune, his character, or his life.

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—When a draft is made on the Exchequer, from one of the boards, alluded to by you in your last answer, what is the authority, either from the treasurer of the navy or the paymaster, by virtue of which the board draws on the Exchequer?

Mr. Standert.—The board never draws on the Exchequer, but always on the treasurer of the navy; the navy board write a memorial to the treasurer of the navy, to solicit at the Exchequer certain sums that are required for the service; so it is through the medium of the treasurer, not immediately to the Exchequer.

A Lord.—Have you seen the certificate, whether it purports to be the certificate of the paymaster, or a certificate to a person acting under a power of attorney?

Mr. Standert.—I have the certificate now before me, which is signed by Andrew Douglas, who acted at that time as paymaster to the treasurer of the navy.

A Lord.—Is it his certificate, that he has received it as attorney, or that he has received it as paymaster.

Mr. Standert.—He does not give his certificate in any capacity; he merely signs his name.

A Lord.—Whether it consists with your knowledge, that when the accounts of the payments in a particular period are passed, the treasurer swears to the accounts, and if the accounts of the period when this payment was made to Mr. Douglas, have been passed, whether the treasurer of the period must not have sworn to the accounts?

Mr. Standert.—It does not come within my knowledge.

A Lord.—Do you know whether the accounts of that period have actually been passed?

Mr. Standert.—The accounts of the first treasurership have been passed.

A Lord.—Of that period to which that certificate refers?

Mr. Standert.—The account in the first treasurership is passed.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

A Lord.—I desire that the witness, who stated that the treasurer's accounts of the first treasurership had been lately passed, may be called to the bar.

Then George Fennell, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—Whether it consists with your knowledge, one way or the other, that the accounts of the first treasurership of lord Melville have, or have not been passed?

Mr. Fennell.—The final account of the first treasurership was delivered to the auditors for that purpose in February, 1805. I have heard that they are passed, but I do not know it.

A Lord.—From whom did you receive your orders with regard to the duties of your office?

Mr. Fennell.—From the then treasurer.

A Lord.—Are those orders delivered to you in writing?

Mr. Fennell.—No.

A Lord.—In what manner are they delivered?

Mr. Fennell.—By a communication from the paymaster.

A Lord.—How is this communication made?

Mr. Fennell.—Verbally.

A Lord.—Whether these verbal communications are made before witnesses?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not remember any such circumstance.

Lord Chancellor.—If the honourable managers for the Commons, or the counsel for lord Melville consider that what has passed since their argument has made it necessary that they speak to the evidence as it now stands before the Court, the Court will hear them.

Mr. Giles.—The managers for the Commons do not apprehend that any thing that has passed from the witnesses makes it necessary to offer any further observations; but I wish to suggest this to the Court, that there may not be any mistake with respect to the power of attorney—

Lord Chancellor.—The honourable manager will confine himself to what has fallen from the witnesses, since the matter was spoken to before; because the Commons have no right to be heard, except upon the evidence that has been given since the conclusion of the argument.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, it was not my intention to trouble your lordships with any observations upon the arguments you have heard; and if I now do so, it is only for the sake of insisting upon and maintaining that right which the Commons contend is their acknowledged and undoubted privilege, the right of being heard after the counsel for the defendant has made his observations in reply. It has been invariably admitted, when required, and it is merely for the sake of not abandoning this privilege which we insist upon, that I now trouble your lordships with a single observation upon the reply of the learned counsel. The learned counsel for the noble defendant has confounded two things which are totally dissimilar and distinct; he has professed to lay down the rules of evidence in criminal as well as in civil cases, and has said that he would state the distinction between them. Yet he has not stated any distinction whatever between the rules of evidence, but only between the rules of responsibility. The rule of responsibility is certainly different in civil and in criminal cases, but the rule of evidence must continue the same. The rule of responsibility I take to be this, that a man may be civilly liable for the act of his agent, even without knowing any thing of what his agent has done, but he certainly cannot be criminally liable for the act of such agent, if done without his knowing it and his mind going along with the act. But the evidence to prove the act must still be the same, whether the object of the suit be criminal or civil responsibility, and that which is evidence in one case must be so in the other.

My lords, I have made these observations merely for the purpose of exercising the privilege, and insisting upon the right of the Commons to reply, not doubting your lordship's judgment upon the question.

Lord Chancellor.—The right of the Commons to reply was never doubted or disputed; but their right, like every other, may be waived or abandoned; and I conceived it to have been abandoned, from the honourable managers not having presented themselves to the Court, before the counsel for lord Melville had proceeded.

Mr. Giles.—I am commanded by the managers to state that they are perfectly satisfied, and are sorry for having given your lordships so much trouble.

Lord Chancellor.—Unless any noble lord shall think that this question is involved in such difficulty as to make it convenient for your lordships to adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament for further consideration of it, I will now deliver my opinion.

I think that the whole difficulty of the argument consists in not distinguishing between the fact which is to be established, and the ultimate effect which is aimed at from its establishment, when connected with additional evidence, which may or may not follow, after the fact in question is admitted to proof. The evidence is offered by the managers to establish an article in charge; namely, that the noble lord did take and receive from and out of the monies from time to time issued to him, as treasurer of his majesty's navy, large sums of money amounting to such a sum; and then the article goes on to charge upon the noble lord a misapplication of the money so received by him. But, before it is possible to impeach the conduct of the noble lord, in the application of monies issued to him from the Exchequer, it must first be proved that money was issued; and the fact proposed to be established extends no further than to show that a person appointed by him as his paymaster, did, in the ordinary course of business, as it appears by certificate transmitted to him from the navy board, and from his own acknowledgment in writing, receive from the Exchequer a sum of 45,000*l.* But whether the money thus issued to the paymaster ever reached the noble lord; or, whether, having reached him, he made any criminal misapplication of it, is a question which it is impossible to suppose that the fact of this receipt by the paymaster can establish; and, therefore, in allowing this receipt of Mr. Douglas, to be read, nothing is proved but that this sum of money was issued out of the Exchequer to Mr. Douglas, he having authority and power to receive it, under the power of attorney from lord Melville. This first step in the proof must advance by evidence applicable alike to civil as to criminal cases; for a fact must be established by the same evidence, whether it is to be followed by a criminal or civil consequence; but it is a totally different question, in the consideration of criminal as distinguished from civil justice, how the noble person now on trial may be affected by the fact when so established:—The receipt by the paymaster would in itself involve him civilly, but could by no possibility convict him of a crime.

Then the entries were read, and are as follow :

“ 6th November, 1782.

“ Received at his Maj<sup>y</sup>'s Exchequer in money, out of the following funds, the sum of £45,000, for the Services following, viz.

£.23,645 2 7 out of money paid into the Exchequer by Frederick Vane, Esquire, Treasurer of Chelsea Hospital.

21,354 17 5 in money out of the Sinking Fund, Anno 1782.

£.45,000—

On the Head of Wear and Tear.

To pay Imprests and Bills of Exchange ..... £.30,000 — — “ Wages.

To pay Bounty Imprests and other Services ..... 15,000 — —

£.45,000 — —

ANDREW DOUGLAS.”

Mr. Giles.—I believe it will save time, as the book is now before your lordships, if we read all the entries of a similar description that we intend to extract from it.

Then the following entries were read :

“ 22nd November, 1782.

“ Received at his Majesty’s Exchequer in money, the Sum of £.50,000, for the Services under mentioned, out of Contributions to Annuities, Anno 1782, viz.

On the Head of Wages.

|                                                                          |          |   |   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------|---|---|
| To pay Ships and Recalls .....                                           | £.40,000 | — | — |
| To carry on Recalls on Ships Books paid the Treasurership of Mr. Barré.. | 10,000   | — | — |
|                                                                          | £.50,000 | — | — |

ANDREW DOUGLAS.

Navy Pay-Office, 19th December, 1782.

Received at his Majesty’s Exchequer in money, out of Contributions to Annuities, Anno 1782, the Sum of Ninety-three thousand eight hundred and thirty Pounds Six Shillings and Ten Pence for the Services following, viz.

On the Head of Wages.

|                                                                                                          |          |   |    |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------|---|----|
| To pay Bounty Money and other Services .....                                                             | £.10,000 | — | —  |
| To pay Ships and carry on Recalls in the presentTrea- }surership .....                               | 20,000   | — | —  |
| To pay Do. in Mr. Ellis’s Treasurership .....                                                            | 10,000   | — | —  |
| To pay for Subsistence, &c. of American Prisoners....                                                    | 2,000    | — | —  |
| To pay for Subsistence, &c. of Foreign Officers, &c. }detained in England .....                      | 15,000   | — | —  |
| To pay One Quarter’s Salary to Commissioners, &c. of }Sick and Wounded, due 25th December, 1782 .. } | 830      | 6 | 10 |
|                                                                                                          | 57,830   | 6 | 10 |

On the Head of Wear and Tear.

|                                                                    |        |   |   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|---|---|
| To pay Imprests and Bills of Exchange due 15th and 17th inst. .... | 25,000 | — | — |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|---|---|

On the Head of Ordinary.

|                                                                                                                                |          |   |    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------|---|----|
| To pay a Quarter’s Salary to the Lords of the Admiralty, Commis- }sioners and Officers of the Navy, due 25th instant ..... | 11,000   | — | —  |
|                                                                                                                                | £.93,830 | 6 | 10 |

ANDREW DOUGLAS.”

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was again called in and examined as follows :

A Lord.—You are supposed to have said that the treasurer of the navy did not receive any money at the Exchequer himself, but that it was always received by his paymaster, under a power of attorney by him. Have you said so?

Mr. Standert.—Yes.

A Lord.—Is it the usual course for the treasurer of the navy to receive money for the public service in his office, through the paymaster constituted his agent under power of attorney?

Mr. Standert.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—The next witness we propose to call, is Mr. Gimingham, who is a clerk in the Bank.

Then Mr. John Gimingham was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Are you a clerk to the Bank of England?

Mr. Gimingham.—I am one of the three clerks appointed to attend the Exchequer on account of the Bank of England.

Mr. Giles.—State for what purpose you attend on the part of the Bank of England at the Exchequer?

Mr. Gimingham.—To receive all monies paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, and to pay all monies issued out of the Exchequer, with very few exceptions.

Mr. Giles.—Is it your duty, attending as clerk from the Bank at the Exchequer, to pay the money which is ordered to be imprested to the treasurer of the navy or to his paymaster?

Mr. Gimingham.—We pay the money to the treasurer of the navy in consequence of an order which we receive from the Tellers office, from whence the money is to be issued.

Mr. Giles.—Do you pay the money to the treasurer of the navy, or to his paymaster?

Mr. Gimingham.—To the treasurer of the navy, or his representative.

Mr. Giles.—In what mode do you pay the money either to the treasurer or his representative?

Mr. Gimingham.—The treasurer usually takes credit with the Bank of England for the whole of the sum to be so issued; but sometimes it happens that he chooses to have a part in Bank-notes, in which case we give him credit for the remaining sums, after deducting the money advanced in Bank-notes.

Mr. Giles.—Do you mean by the Bank of England, that the Bank of England give him credit for so much as he does not take in Bank-notes?

Mr. Gimingham.—We attend on account of the Bank of England. The money is placed by us in the Bank book for the governor and company of the Bank of England:—I conceive that we represent the Bank of England when we are there, and whatever we do is on their account.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know this Book?

Mr. Gimingham.—I know the book perfectly well, and have occasionally written in it.

Mr. Giles.—Do you recollect to have ever given credit to lord Melville as treasurer of the navy, or paid any money upon the application of his paymaster Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—I think I do.

Mr. Giles.—What book is that you now hold in your hand?

Mr. Gimingham.—This is the treasurer of the navy's banking book, wherein the credits are entered.

Mr. Giles.—Are all sums which the treasurer receives at the Exchequer, and is credited for at the Bank, entered in that book?

Mr. Gimingham.—They were a few years back, at the time credits were given there.

Mr. Giles.—I am asking to a period antecedent to the act of parliament?

Mr. Gimingham.—Previous to the act of parliament, the credits were entered into that book.

Mr. Giles.—In whose custody was that book kept?

Mr. Gimingham.—In the custody of the treasurer I apprehend.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you ever see it in the possession of the treasurer?

Mr. Gimingham.—No, but only of his representative.

Mr. Giles.—Who produced that book to you when you were at the Exchequer, to have the money so credited in it?

Mr. Gimingham.—The treasurer's representative, who came to receive the money, usually brought the book with him—I mean the person appointed by the treasurer of the navy to transact that business at the Exchequer.

Mr. Giles.—Was that person, at that time, the late Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—Mr. Douglas used to attend the Exchequer for that purpose.

Mr. Giles.—Refer to the entry in that book, of the 6th of November 1782.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it in the hand-writing of the witness?

Mr. Giles.—It is not an entry in the hand-writing of the witness, but an entry in this book, which he says was a book brought by Mr. Douglas, the paymaster of lord Melville, to the Exchequer, to have the sums he received credited in that book. I propose to have that entry read, it being the Bank book of the treasurer of the navy, kept in the custody of the paymaster.

Lord Chancellor.—First ask the witness whether he has seen that book, from time to time, in the possession of Mr. Douglas, in the character of paymaster to lord Melville.

Mr. Giles.—Have you, from time to time, seen that book in the custody of Mr. Douglas, as paymaster to lord Melville, at the Exchequer.

Mr. Gimingham.—To the best of my belief, I have.

Lord Chancellor.—Look at the book; can you swear you have?

Mr. Gimingham.—I have no doubt about the book.

Mr. Giles.—After the credit was entered in that book, was the book returned to Mr. Douglas, the paymaster of lord Melville?

Mr. Gimingham.—I apprehend it was returned immediately.

Mr. Giles.—Did you, when you made entries of credits in that book, so return it?

Mr. Gimingham.—Immediately; as soon as the entry was made, I returned the book.

Lord Chancellor.—What is your reason for saying you apprehend it was returned? what doubt have you upon it?

Mr. Gimingham.—I can have no doubt at all about it.

Lord Chancellor.—Before the year 1785, and whilst Mr. Douglas was the representative of lord Melville, was it in the course of business for him to carry that book which you have in your hand to the Exchequer, to have his credits entered, and when entered, to have it returned to him, and then to carry it to the Bank for a similar purpose, and have it returned to him there?

Mr. Gimingham.—Whenever they received money, they usually brought the book with them to the Exchequer; and there they received credit for the money, or a part in credit, whichever they pleased, and the remainder in bank-notes.

Lord Chancellor.—Was that book returned, upon those occasions, to the person who brought it?

Mr. Gimingham.—It was immediately returned to the person who brought it.

Mr. Giles.—I propose the clerk should now read the entry in that book, of the 6th of November 1782.

Then Mr. John Gimingham was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Is the entry in question, in your hand writing?

Mr. Gimingham.—No; it is not.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it amongst the entries that it belongs to the Bank to make? amongst those that were made at the Bank?

Mr. Gimingham.—It appears to be amongst the entries made at the Exchequer.

Mr. Giles.—By whom?

Mr. Gimingham.—Either by myself, or by one of those two who attended with me.

Mr. Giles.—Who were those two?

Mr. Gimingham.—Bank clerks, as well as myself.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you, independently of that entry, any recollection of the fact?

Mr. Gimingham.—I can only say, that I have not the smallest doubt of it; but as to an immediate recollection, I cannot undertake to state that, owing to its being so many years back.

Mr. Plumer.—Is that confident belief of the fact which you express, derived entirely from the entry in that book?

Mr. Gimingham.—It does not immediately arise from the entry in the book, but from some recollection of the transaction at the time.

Mr. Plumer.—Could you, without that book, have recollected either the sum, or the date, or any particular respecting it?

Mr. Gimingham.—I could not undertake to do that.

Then Mr. John Gimingham was re-examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Will you look at the next entry, the entry of the 23rd of November, 1782, and inform the Court whose hand-writing that is?

Mr. Gimingham.—That is the hand-writing of one Mr. Reuben Ettie, who is now dead.

Mr. Giles.—Was he one of the Bank clerks who attended at the Exchequer at that time?

Mr. Gimingham.—He was one of the Bank clerks who attended at that time.

Mr. Giles.—In whose hand-writing is the entry you refer to, of the 6th of November?

Mr. Gimingham.—In the same hand-writing.

Mr. Giles.—Are you well acquainted with the hand-writing of Mr. Reuben Ettie?

Mr. Gimingham.—Perfectly well with both.

Mr. Giles.—Refer to an entry of the 19th of December, 1782, in the same book, in whose hand-writing is that entry?

Mr. Gimingham.—In the same hand-writing.

Mr. Giles.—Have you ever made any entry of the same description in the book yourself?

Mr. Gimingham.—Two or three entries, I believe; there are two entries of my making of the 8th of November, 1782; I made a credit to the treasurer of the navy for 39,000*l*.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Perhaps it will be more satisfactory to your lordships, before I read the entry, that I should show from whence the book came; it was found amongst Mr. Douglas's papers.

Then John Winter, jun. esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that book?

Mr. Winter.—I do.

VOL. XXIX.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you had possession of that book?

Mr. Winter.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where did you find that book?

Mr. Winter.—Amongst the papers found in the possession of the widow of the late Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has it been in your custody ever since?

Mr. Winter.—It has.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—We propose to read the entry in this book, it being the Bank book of lord Melville, kept in the custody of his paymaster, Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish to ask Mr. Gimingham a question.

Then Mr. John Gimingham was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the proper custody of the book was that of Mr. Douglas, or it ought to have been in the Bank?

Mr. Gimingham.—Whenever a book is taken from the Exchequer, we know nothing more of it officially, because any individual can brink his Bank book, and receive a credit at the Exchequer for the money issued to him; when so done, he takes the book, and we see no more of it till he comes to receive again.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the title of that book.

Then the title of the book was read, and is as follows:

“Old account of the Right Honourable Henry Dundas, Bank 1782, D<sup>r</sup>.

“The Bank of England with the Right Honourable Henry Dundas, C<sup>r</sup>.”

Mr. Whitbread.—We offer the whole of this book in evidence, and desire that an entry of the 6th of November may now be read.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, the honourable managers offer an entry to be read, which is not authenticated by the witness, but is only an entry contained in this book; I hope your lordships will quite understand me, that when I do not object to this book, it is upon grounds which apply peculiarly to this book and this entry, and that I do it without prejudice to any question that may arise with respect to any other book, not in the same situation with the present.

Then the following entry was read:

“November 6th, 1782. To Mr. Beldam, R. E. 40,000*l*.”

Mr. Whitbread.—This entry purports, that the treasurer of the navy is credited at the Bank on the 6th November, 1782, for the sum of 40,000*l*.

Then the following entries were read:

1782.

£.

“Nov<sup>r</sup>. 22. To Mr. Willis, R. E. 47,000 0 0

“Dec<sup>r</sup>. 19. To ditto, Ettie 90,830 6 10.”

3 D

Mr. Giles.—Your lordships will be so good as to observe the dates of these entries, corresponding with the dates in the certificate book, of 45,000*l.* being received on the 6th of November; 50,000*l.* being received on the 22nd of November; and 93,830*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* on the 19th of December, 1782; there being only 40,000*l.* entered to the credit of the Bank, at the time of 45,000*l.* being received.

Mr. Giles.—Did you attend as a clerk of the Bank at the Exchequer, on the 6th of November, 1782?

Mr. Gimingham.—I did.

Mr. Giles.—Did you pay to the paymaster of the navy any sum in bank-notes, as part of the sum that he was to receive that day at the Exchequer?

Mr. Gimingham.—Yes; 5,000*l.* in bank-notes.

Mr. Giles.—State the day, the number, and the sum of each note. What is the book you have in your hand?

Mr. Gimingham.—This is the book wherein we enter all notes that are issued at the Exchequer, on account of the governor and company of the Bank of England.

Mr. Giles.—Is the entry, to which you are called upon to refer, in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Gimingham.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—State the dates, the numbers, and the sums of the notes, you paid to Mr. Dundas on the 6th of November?

Mr. Gimingham.—No. 9, 1,000*l.*; No. 10, 1,000*l.*; No. 11, 1,000*l.*; No. 12, 1,000*l.*; No. 13, 1,000*l.*; all dated 24th October, 1782; 5,000*l.* altogether.

Mr. Giles.—Is the note you now hold in your hand, one of the notes you paid on the 6th of November to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—I have no doubt but it is.

Mr. Giles.—Which number is it?

Mr. Gimingham.—No. 12.

Mr. Giles.—Look to the entry of the 22nd of November, 1782, in the same book, and state whether you on that day paid any, and what sum, in bank-notes, to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—On that day we paid to Mr. Dundas—

Mr. Plumer.—Is that entry in your hand-writing?

Mr. Gimingham.—It is; we paid 3,000*l.* on the 22nd of November to lord Melville.

Lord Chancellor.—Are you able to ascertain by the entry, or otherwise, that 3,000*l.* was paid to lord Melville, or was it paid to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—I apprehend it was paid to Mr. Douglas; I never saw his lordship at the office.

Mr. Giles.—State the dates, the numbers, and the sums of the notes which you paid on the 22nd of November?

Mr. Gimingham.—The notes were paid on the 22nd of November, 1782.

Mr. Plumer.—Is that entry your own hand-writing?

Mr. Gimingham.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—What are the dates of the notes?

Mr. Gimingham.—The 7th of November, 1782.

Mr. Giles.—What are the numbers?

Mr. Gimingham.—No. 212, 213, and 214, each of 1,000*l.* in value.

Mr. Giles.—Look at that note; is that one of the notes which you paid on that day?

Mr. Gimingham.—I have no doubt but it is; it is No. 212.

Then Mr. John Gimingham was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Does it appear upon your book, that those notes, paid on the 22nd of November, were paid to Mr. Douglas, because you say you apprehend so? Does it appear upon the book that it was so?

Mr. Gimingham.—The notes are written off in the name of Mr. Dundas; but I apprehend that Mr. Douglas received them.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any recollection whatever of the fact?

Mr. Gimingham.—I have no doubt at all of the transaction.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any memory of the transaction, independent of the book?

Mr. Gimingham.—I cannot say that I immediately recollect the transaction.

Mr. Plumer.—What is your reason for saying you have no doubt of the transaction?

Mr. Gimingham.—I have no doubt of it because it is my own act and deed.

Mr. Plumer.—What is your reason for saying, you think you paid it to Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—Only because Mr. Douglas usually attended upon that business.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the other entries you speak to, do not specify that the payments were made to Mr. Douglas personally?

Mr. Gimingham.—Wherever Mr. Douglas's name appears in the book, he had the notes.

Mr. Plumer.—Do these entries contain, upon the face of them, that the payments were made to Mr. Douglas? Turn to the entry of the 6th of November.

Mr. Gimingham.—That on the 6th of November is entered in the name of Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you explain why the entry in that case should contain the name of Mr. Douglas, and in another the name of Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Gimingham.—It sometimes happens that both names are made use of.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the names indiscriminately used?

Mr. Gimingham.—They were usually written off in the name of the person who received the notes.

Mr. Whitbread.—In fact, were those payments of the 6th, and the other of the 22nd of November, made on account of the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Gimingham.—No doubt they were.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether, independent of the book, you have any recollection of any instance in which a payment was made to Mr. Douglas personally, and it was entered under the name of Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Gimingham.—I do not immediately recollect any.

Lord Chancellor.—Could you have paid the money either upon the 6th of November, or the 22nd, to any body but Mr. Dundas, or Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—Not unless he came from the treasurer of the navy's office.

Lord Chancellor.—Should you have paid it to any person, if he had stated that he came from the treasurer of the navy, though it had not been Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Gimingham.—Yes; our authority is derived from the tellers of the Exchequer, by whose authority we give credit to the treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Plumer.—If either the treasurer in person, or any person that appeared to be authorized by him, came for money upon the credit of that treasurer, you would have paid it?

Mr. Gimingham.—Provided he came from the teller's office, to receive on account of the treasurer, we should pay him the money.

Mr. Whitbread.—What authority should you have demanded from any person who had come, stating himself to be deputed by the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Gimingham.—Provided he brings the bank-book, we ask no questions of that sort.

Mr. Plumer.—What bank-book do you mean?

Mr. Gimingham.—The treasurer's bank-book; any person bringing this book with him, with an order from the tellers of the Exchequer, would immediately receive credit, or part in bank-notes, as he thought proper.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the person to whom you made these two payments of the 6th and 22nd of November, had in fact that book in his possession at the time you made those payments to him?

Mr. Gimingham.—He brought the book with him.

Mr. Whitbread.—We wish to put this other book into the hands of the Witness. What book is that?

Mr. Gimingham.—It is the bank-note book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that of the same description as the book you had last in your hand; the bank-note book?

Mr. Gimingham.—Exactly the same.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the entry of the 19th December in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Gimingham.—It is not.

Mr. Whitbread.—In whose hand-writing is that entry?

Mr. Gimingham.—I believe Mr. Ettie's.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that to be Mr. Ettie's hand-writing?

Mr. Gimingham.—To the best of my knowledge and belief it is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was Mr. Ettie at the Exchequer on the 19th of December, at the time that entry was made?

Mr. Gimingham.—No doubt he was.

Mr. Whitbread.—And you were at the Exchequer also?

Mr. Gimingham.—I apprehend I was, but I cannot take upon myself to say that.

Mr. Plumer.—Surely, my lords, this entry can never be evidence as it now stands; this is no book of which your lordships have had any account; where it comes from, and what book it is, we know not at all; but an entry is going to be received, because it is Mr. Ettie's hand-writing: how this can be evidence I cannot conceive.

Lord Chancellor.—You say you never saw lord Melville at the Exchequer yourself?

Mr. Gimingham.—Not that I know of.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you remember, during the period you are speaking of, when Mr. Douglas was paymaster, any other person than him bringing that Bank book?

Mr. Gimingham.—I believe there have been instances of another person bringing the book.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you remember instances of other persons bringing the Bank book during Mr. Douglas's time, besides himself?

Mr. Gimingham.—I cannot charge my memory with that, but I believe it to be so.

Mr. Plumer.—If other persons had come with the Bank book to receive the money on account of the treasurer, professing to come from him, would it not have been entered in the name of Mr. Dundas or Mr. Douglas, and not in the name of the individual who came to receive it?

Mr. Gimingham.—The payment would have been in the name of the person receiving it; that is the usual practice.

A Lord.—How does it happen, that in the entry of payments in the name of the person receiving them, Mr. Dundas's name should have found its way here?

Mr. Gimingham.—When the name of Mr. Dundas has been entered, it has been to correspond with the credit of part of the sum which was issued on that day.

A Lord.—Under what circumstances can it be for the purpose of making this credit correspond, when it at the same time appears that Mr. Dundas's name is entered, when he had not received the money; and, that on another occasion, the person's name is entered who actually did receive the money?

Mr. Gimingham.—It was quite a usual thing; the credit went regularly to the treasurer's account, but the bank-notes were frequently written off in the name of the person who came to receive them.

A Lord.—Are we then to understand, that whenever Mr. Dundas's name appears there, the payment was not made in bank-notes; and that when the payments were made to other persons, they were made in bank notes?

Mr. Gimingham.—When there were no bank-notes paid, my lord Melville's name only appeared as the creditor.

A Lord.—Whether, when lord Melville was first appointed treasurer of the navy, you would have credited his account at the Bank, without having a power of attorney authorizing you for that purpose?

Mr. Gimingham.—We do not give any credit at the Bank, only at the Exchequer.

Mr. Whitbread.—The managers are extremely desirous of feeling, that what has been proved has been properly understood by your lordships. The receipt book has been proved, which, to take one date (the 6th of November 1782) shows, that Mr. Douglas gave a certificate to the navy board of having received at the Exchequer the sum of 45,000*l*. The banking book shows to your lordships, that on that day a credit was written in to the treasurer of the navy of 40,000*l*. only. The next book which Mr. Gimingham produces, shows, that on the 6th of November, he, in his own hand-writing, entered five notes of 1,000*l*. each, from No. 9 to 14; which bank-notes were paid to Mr. Douglas:—farther than that, we have put in one of those bank-notes which the witness here supposes was one of the identical bank-notes which he so paid to Mr. Douglas.—With regard to the payments of the 22nd of November, it has also been shown by the same mode of proof, that Mr. Douglas certified at the navy board, that he had received at the Exchequer 50,000*l*.; in the banking book it is shown, that there was carried to the credit of the treasurer of the navy on that day 47,000*l*. only: and the witness has proved, that he paid to a person, who he says was Mr. Douglas, on that day, although written in the name of Mr. Dundas, three bank-notes of 1,000*l*. each; which makes up the credit of 50,000*l*. acknowledged by Mr. Douglas: and one of those notes is now actually before your lordships in evidence, which he says is one of the bank-notes he so paid, on account of the then treasurer of the navy, Mr. Dundas, to Mr. Douglas.

A Lord.—Is it to be understood, that when the entry appears in the name of Mr. Dundas, the entry was so made under that name, in consequence of a credit being transferred, and that in those cases bank-notes were not delivered; but that the entry in other names, was, when bank-notes were delivered as part of the payment?

Mr. Gimingham.—We give credit in consequence of an order which we receive from the tellers of the Exchequer, if the person who receives the money wishes to have a credit for the whole, the sum is immediately entered in his bank-book; but if he chooses a part in bank-notes, then the remainder only is carried to the credit of the treasurer's account.

A Lord.—Whether there is any entry in the banking-book to the credit of Mr. Dundas, other than as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Gimingham.—I can only answer to the credits which are made at the Exchequer.

A Lord.—Confine your answer to the credits made at the Exchequer. Were there any other credits at the Exchequer made to Mr. Dundas, than as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Gimingham.—None other that I know of.

A Lord.—You have stated that on the 22nd of November, you paid 3,000*l*. in bank-notes, the dates of which notes, and the numbers, you have given to the Court; do you know whether those sums were entered in the name of Mr. Dundas, or Mr. Douglas, or either of them?

Mr. Gimingham.—I must beg leave to refer to the book;—on looking at the book, I see that on the 22nd of November, 1782, 3,000*l*. was paid in bank-notes, and written off in the name of Mr. Dundas.

A Lord.—Can you give any reason why those three notes of 1,000*l*. each, were written off in the name of Mr. Dundas, when you say that you never saw Mr. Dundas at the Exchequer, and therefore the payments could not be made to him?

Mr. Gimingham.—No particular reason; it was a casual thing, whether they were written off in the name of the treasurer of the navy, or of the person who represented him; it was sometimes in one way, and sometimes in another.

A Lord.—Whether, under whatever name those entries were made, they were not all understood by you to have been made on account of the then treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Gimingham.—Undoubtedly.

A Lord.—Whether the entry in the bank-book, on the 6th of November, 1782, does not appear on the face of it to be an entry to the credit of the treasurer of the navy, as well as the person to whom the notes were paid?

Mr. Gimingham.—Exactly the same. It all goes to the treasurer's account, either in the shape of a credit, or in bank-notes.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Heald was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the banking-house of Messieurs Drummond?

Mr. Heald.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you a clerk in that house in the year 1782?

Mr. Heald.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the book which you have before you?

Mr. Heald.—We call it the Waste-book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you written in that waste-book at any time?

Mr. Heald.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 29th of November, 1782. Are the entries made on that day, or any of them, in your hand-writing?

Mr. Heald.—They are.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there an entry on that day to the credit of the right honourable Henry Dundas?

Mr. Heald.—There is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that credit written in your hand-writing?

Mr. Heald.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the amount of that credit?

Mr. Heald.—Six hundred pounds.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there a debit on that day to the right honourable Henry Dundas?

Mr. Heald.—I do not know that there is.

Mr. Whitbread.—How was that six hundred pounds paid?

Mr. Heald.—By a bank-note for 1,000*l.* letter K, No. 212.

Mr. Whitbread.—Of whom did you receive that bank-note?

Mr. Heald.—By the entry, it appears from Mr. Dundas; but that I cannot swear positively to.

Mr. Whitbread.—From the nature of that entry, in the common course of business in your house, do you apprehend, believe, or know that Mr. Dundas must be the person who so paid that note?

Mr. Heald.—It would appear to have been brought by Mr. Dundas, but I cannot swear so: it might be from some other person immediately from him, and not by his own hands.

Mr. Whitbread.—If the payment had been made, on account of Mr. Dundas, by any person other than Mr. Dundas himself, would the entry have been precisely what that entry is?

Mr. Heald.—No; the name of the person would have stood at the top of the entry.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does any name now stand at the top of the entry, or any name appear but that of Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Heald.—None.

Mr. Whitbread.—What became of the 400*l.* balance of the 1,000*l.* note?

Mr. Heald.—I paid the difference in bank-notes and cash.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom?

Mr. Heald.—That I cannot take upon myself to say.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it to the person who appeared making the payment according to the entry which you have stated to be contained in that book?

Mr. Heald.—It was to that person—it might be by Mr. Drummond—he might have given me the note, and I might have returned the money to him—I had instructions to give credit for 600*l.* and to return the difference in bank-notes and cash.

Mr. Whitbread.—You know that this credit was entered to Mr. Dundas for 600*l.* by yourself, and that the change was given of the bank-note to the person who produced the note, which is the subject of that entry?

Mr. Heald.—I apprehend that to be the case.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does this note now in your hand for 1,000*l.* correspond with the note entered in that book, a part of which was carried to the credit of Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Heald.—The number and the sum correspond.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the number and the sum the whole of the entry?

Mr. Heald.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there any other book belonging to the house of Messieurs Drummond, in which any entry is made respecting this note?

Mr. Heald.—There is.

Then Mr. William Heald was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Whether, independently of the book that lies before you, and the entry it contains, you have any memory of the transaction to which you have spoken?

Mr. Heald.—None.

Mr. Plumer.—If the money had been given to you, or the note brought to you by Mr. Drummond, whose clerk you were, with directions to make an entry in that book, you yourself not having taken any part in the transaction at all, would the entry have been the same in that book, that it is now?

Mr. Heald.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you now say with any certainty, whether the transaction took place with yourself, or whether it was through the medium of Mr. Drummond that you made that entry?

Mr. Heald.—The entry is made by myself, but I cannot answer who delivered me the money.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you the least recollection of the noble defendant having come to you with any such note?

Mr. Heald.—None.

Then Mr. William Heald was re-examined, as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether you ever saw the person of the noble defendant in the banking-house of Messieurs Drummonds?

Mr. Heald.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether you ever received any money from the hands of Mr. Dundas, to place to his credit?

Mr. Heald.—It is impossible for me to answer that question.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether you know, or have any recollection, of ever having in the course of your business at Messieurs Drummonds, received any sum of money, of any description, at any time, from Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Heald.—I cannot charge my memory to answer that question.

A Lord.—Suppose that this bank-note had not been brought by Mr. Dundas, and not delivered to you by Mr. Drummond himself, or by his direction, but if any stranger had come into the shop with a bank-note, and directed you to put it to the credit of Mr. Dundas, would the entry have been the same as it is now, or would the entry have contained the name of the person bringing the note to you?

Mr. Heald.—It would have been the same as it is now.

Mr. Whitbread.—The witness has upon his oath deposed, within the last five minutes, that if any other person had brought the money for Mr. Dundas, and not Mr. Dundas himself, that he would have entered the name of that person, if he had so brought it, together with that of Mr. Dundas. I beg the witness will explain the inconsistency apparent upon his testimony?

Lord Chancellor.—Supposing this note had been brought by some stranger, who had directed you to place it to the credit of Mr. Dundas; you are supposed to have stated, that the entry would have had at the top of it, the name of that third person.

Mr. Heald.—My question to the person would be—am I to make it received of you or of Mr. Dundas? if he had said of Mr. Dundas, the entry would stand as it did; if he had said of him, the entry would be different.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether you have not some private mode, either prescribed by your principals in that house, or some private mode used by yourself, for your own satisfaction, that you may be able to distinguish whether the receipt of a sum of money for which you give credit, was made to the person in whose name it is credited, or to some other person for him?

Mr. Heald.—Sometimes I make a private mark, but not generally; in the hurry of business I may have neglected it.

Mr. Whitbread.—If any one of the Messieurs Drummond, a partner in that house, and a principal, had come out of the next room, and brought him a thousand pound note, saying carry it to the credit of Mr. Dundas; whether in the usual course of your business, you would not have put some distinguishing mark to that entry, in order that you might know that you received it from some other hand than that of Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Heald.—I should not have made any private mark.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the private mark which you usually make?

Mr. Heald.—Sometimes I make the letter P. to show that it was by another person.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there any P to this entry?

Mr. Heald.—None.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether this entry stands in the form those entries usually, if not universally, stand in these books, where you have received money out of the hands of the person to whose credit that money is carried?

Mr. Heald.—It does.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what manner was the specific sum of 400*l.* paid, which made the balance of the 1,000*l.*?

Mr. Heald.—380*l.* in bank-notes, and 20*l.*

in cash; viz. one bank-note of 40*l.*, two of 30*l.*, four of 25*l.*, five of 20*l.*, four of 15*l.*, and two of 10*l.*, and 20*l.* in cash.

Mr. Plumer.—You were asked whether the letter P was put opposite the entry in question, to show that the money was paid by another person—I wish now to ask you whether, notwithstanding the letter P is not to this, it enables you, with any certainty, to say whether it was money brought by Mr. Dundas, or by any person upon his account?

Mr. Heald.—It does not.

Mr. Plumer.—Though the letter P is not there, yet nevertheless it might be brought by some other person?

Mr. Heald.—That is possible.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether, on taking that book into his hand, and reading the different entries, he would not know, according to the course of business, that entries so made as that is, were not made where persons paid any money to the credit of other persons?

Mr. Heald.—No; I cannot take upon myself to say that.

A Lord.—Whether you always ask the name of a person who comes with the money, desiring you to give credit to another?

Mr. Heald.—It is usual for us to ask, who are we to make it received of?—if they say of the person to whom we give credit, we make the entry as this is in my hand; if they say any other person, we put the name.

A Lord.—If the money had been received from any other person than Mr. Dundas, would you not in the course of business have given such other person a receipt for it?

Mr. Heald.—Yes; we usually do.

A Lord.—Is there any book or document in your custody in which such receipt is entered, and can be found?

Mr. Heald.—None.

A Lord.—Whether it is not the usual course, if a person brings money, and desires it to be entered, not to his own credit, but to the credit of another, to give that person a receipt for the money paid in?

Mr. Heald.—It is usually done.

A Lord.—Is it always done?

Mr. Heald.—No.

A Lord.—Was it done in this particular case?

Mr. Heald.—I cannot charge my memory, to say whether I gave a receipt or not.

A Lord.—When you give any receipt to a person who brings money to be entered, not to his own credit, but to the credit of some other, do you make any memorandum of a receipt so given?

Mr. Heald.—Sometimes we mark the letter R underneath it, sometimes not; it is not a general rule.

A Lord.—Whether it is not the constant custom of Messieurs Drummond, in the accounts with their customers, when any sum of money is paid in to the credit of their customers by another person, to give a receipt for that sum?

Mr. Heald.—Certainly it is.

A Lord.—When you render an account to any of your customers, and when that account contains credit to such customer for money paid in by another person, and not by himself, have you any waste-book, or other book from which that account so rendered that customer, is copied?

Mr. Heald.—It is posted into the ledger, which explains the entry in this book.

A Lord.—Have you got any ledger applicable to this particular transaction, so as to be able, by referring to that ledger, to ascertain whether or not the account of this particular customer was in any part for sums not paid in by himself but by another?

Mr. Heald.—I dare say we have.

A Lord.—Would the ledger furnish any light upon that subject?

Mr. Heald.—The ledger that alludes to this transaction will not—it will appear as if it were received from Mr. Dundas.

A Lord.—Would the ledger ascertain, whether this 1,000*l.* paid in to the credit of Mr. Dundas, was paid in by him, or by some other person on his account?

Mr. Heald.—It would appear by our ledger, as paid in by himself.

A Lord.—Supposing it had been paid in by another person, would a reference to the ledger show it was paid in by another, and not by himself?

Mr. Heald.—It will appear to be paid in by himself.

A Lord.—When you render an account to your customer, do you retain in your possession, in any book, any thing from which you can see what account you have rendered to your customer?

Mr. Heald.—Yes.

A Lord.—What is the name of that book?

Mr. Heald.—The Ledger.

A Lord.—By referring to that ledger, should you be able to ascertain, whether this sum of money which appears in the entry to the credit of Mr. Dundas, was in fact paid in by him, or by any other person?

Mr. Heald.—It would appear, in the ledger, as received from himself.

A Lord.—Whether in fact he paid it or not?

Mr. Heald.—Yes.

A Lord.—Looking at that book, you have said you cannot answer with certainty whether you received the money of Mr. Dundas or not; can you speak with more certainty, from the contents of any other book, than you can speak with, from the contents of that book?

Mr. Heald.—No.

A Lord.—Whether Mr. Douglas at any time ever paid any money to Mr. Drummond's, on account of Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Heald.—He has.

A Lord.—Can you state, from the entry now lying before you, the probable entry that will be found corresponding with this in the ledger?

Mr. Heald.—There will appear the date, the word received, and the sum 600*l.*

A Lord.—Will it appear from whom received?

Mr. Heald.—As from himself.

A Lord.—Is it customary for the customers at the house of Messieurs Drummonds, when they receive their account current from the banking-house, to sign that account?

Mr. Heald.—Yes, but not generally so.

A Lord.—Has any account current been rendered to Mr. Dundas, comprehending this period?

Mr. Heald.—I cannot answer; that is a book I have nothing to do with.

Mr. Whitbread.—We wish the witness to be asked, whether it was the custom for the customers of Messieurs Drummonds to keep banking-books?

Mr. Heald.—Some had books; some not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know whether Mr. Dundas had a banking-book?

Mr. Heald.—I cannot answer that question.

A Lord.—Whether the books which are kept in your banking-house, containing the accounts of Mr. Dundas, have or not, from time to time, been settled by Mr. Dundas himself?

Mr. Heald.—I cannot answer that question.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Thomas Buckley, was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the banking-house of Messieurs Drummond?

Mr. Buckley.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you a clerk in that house, in the year 1782?

Mr. Buckley.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether there are entries in that book you hold in your hand, in your hand-writing?

Mr. Buckley.—There are.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that book?

Mr. Buckley.—A bank-book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there an entry there of the 29th of November 1782?

Mr. Buckley.—There is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there a sum entered in that book, of 1,000*l.* paid in, in a bank-note, on that day?

Mr. Buckley.—There are the particulars of a bank-note, K 212, A. C. 7th November, 1,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that entry in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Buckley.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does this note you now hold in your hand correspond with that entry?

Mr. Buckley.—I believe it does.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it not the note?

Mr. Buckley.—I cannot say positively to that.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the date of the note and the letter, and then read the entry.

Mr. Buckley.—It corresponds with the entry in the book, in the number, date, year and sum.

Mr. Whitbread.—The entry made in the book, and the notations upon the bank-note corresponding with it, I would ask whether the letters A. C. marked in the entry in that book are meant to correspond with the letters A. C. marked upon the bank-note itself?

Mr. Buckley.—I believe so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at that other book; do you know that to be a banking-book belonging to the banking-house of Messieurs Drummond?

Mr. Buckley.—I do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there an entry in that, of the bank-note you have in your hand?

Mr. Buckley.—There is.

Mr. Plumer.—Is that entry in your hand-writing?

Mr. Buckley.—It is not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether the entry in the witness's own hand-writing, in that book in Mr. Drummond's office, corresponds with another entry, made in another book, of that bank-note?

Mr. Buckley.—The letter, number, and sum correspond.

Mr. Whitbread.—And the date?

Mr. Buckley.—The date is not entered in the other.

Lord Chancellor.—What is that other book?

Mr. Buckley.—It is called the Bank Book; where the notes paid into the banking-house are usually entered, for the information of persons that may come to inquire after notes lost, stolen, or mislaid.

Lord Chancellor.—How do you describe that book, in which the entry in your own hand-writing is contained?

Mr. Buckley.—We call it the Bank Book; it is the book in which every note that comes into the house is entered in the evening.

Then Mr. Thomas Buckley was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Whether, in all cases, the ledger kept by the banker is copied from the waste-book, and cannot be more correct than the waste-book itself?

Mr. Buckley.—The waste-book being the original entry, is the book always referred to; the cash-book is copied from the waste-book, and from the cash-book it is copied into the ledger.

Mr. Plumer.—Can the ledger be more particular with respect to the character or circumstances of any notes paid in, than the waste-book?

Mr. Buckley.—I should think not.

Lord Chancellor.—Would the waste-book, if it was referred to, give any more information upon this subject than the book before you does?

Mr. Buckley.—The waste-book is the only book where information can be had.

A Lord.—Is it not the practice to copy every night from the waste-book into the ledger, in order to see that the accounts are correct?

Mr. Buckley.—They are copied in the course of the day into the cash-book, and posted in the course of the day into the ledger from the cash-book.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—We offer the ledger of Messieurs Drummond, to show that the entry in that ledger corresponds with the entries in the other books, and to show that there is a difference in the entries in the ledger, as the witness has stated; there was generally a difference in the entries, when the money was paid by the person himself, or by other persons.

Then Mr. William Heald was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the book you have before you?

Mr. Heald.—The Ledger.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that ledger your own hand-writing?

Mr. Heald.—No.

Mr. Whitbread.—In whose hand-writing is that ledger?

Mr. Heald.—Alexander Hope's.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is Alexander Hope alive or dead?

Mr. Heald.—Dead.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you acquainted with his hand-writing?

Mr. Heald.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the entry on the 29th of November, which you will see there, to the credit of the right honourable Henry Dundas, in the hand-writing of Mr. Hope?

Mr. Heald.—It is.

Mr. Plumer.—Surely the honourable manager will not offer this as evidence.

Lord Chancellor.—It cannot, in my opinion, add to the strength of the evidence.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Thomas Rippon was again called in, and examined, as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you an officer of the Bank of England?

Mr. Rippon.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what office?

Mr. Rippon.—In the cashier's office at present.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long have you been in the Bank of England?

Mr. Rippon.—Ever since the year 1782.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you then conversant with the mode, in which the Bank conducted that part of their business, which relates to the issue of bank-notes?

Mr. Rippon.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—How were the bank-notes, at that time issued by the Bank of England, distinguished from each other?

Mr. Rippon.—They were distinguished by being made out in different books, and the letter of these books was marked on each note.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did it ever happen that any notes bearing the same letter, the same date, and the same number, were issued on the same day?

Mr. Rippon.—Not on the same day.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether any note, exactly corresponding with that note you have in your hand, in letter, date, number, and day, can have been in circulation in the kingdom?

Mr. Rippon.—Only one of the same kind on the same day can be.

Mr. Whitbread.—And must that have been the one;—do you swear that there could have been but one of that description?

Mr. Rippon.—I have no doubt of it.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

FOURTH DAY.

Friday, May 2, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, Managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the Lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the managers for the House of Commons propose to call further evidence upon the subject of Mr. Drummond's books, and lord Melville's connexion with that house—they will first call Mr. Oliver.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you now a clerk in the banking-house of Messieurs Drummond?

Mr. Oliver.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you in that situation in the year 1782?

Mr. Oliver.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it the custom at that time to give the customers of that house banking-books?

Mr. Oliver.—Whenever it was required; a great many had, and some had not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know whether lord Melville had an account at their house, in that year?

Mr. Oliver.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had he a banking-book?

Mr. Oliver.—It appears that he had for some years.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, a notice has been given for the production of that banking-book.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you ever see this banking-book?

Mr. Oliver.—I have; because I have marked in the ledger, that the book agreed at a certain period.

Mr. Whitbread.—I shall call Mr. Joseph Kaye, to prove that notice had been given to lord Melville's solicitor to produce the book.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, we shall not put the managers to the proof (which I understand the honourable manager is now proposing to give) of notice having been given to the noble defendant's solicitor, to produce the book of which the honourable manager is now speaking. I admit that notice distinctly; at the same time, I can with great truth assure your lordships, from the noble defendant himself, and all who have searched among his papers, that there is not the least trace of it, and he has not any such book in his possession.

Mr. Whitbread.—Then I propose, that the ledger of Messieurs Drummond shall be produced, from whence the entry in this banking-book is a transcript. Turn to the entry in the ledger of the 10th August, 1782.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish first to ask the witness whether that entry is made by himself?

Mr. Oliver.—It is not.

Lord Chancellor.—Describe what that book is?

Mr. Oliver.—It is a ledger for the whole year, 1782.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are the banking-books of the different customers of the house of Messieurs Drummond transcribed from their accounts in that ledger, or other ledgers like that?

Mr. Oliver.—They are always a transcript, an exact copy.

Mr. Whitbread.—Of course lord Melville's account was transcribed in the same manner as other customer's accounts?

Mr. Oliver.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you examined lord Melville's account with the account in that ledger?

Mr. Oliver.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read an entry in Mr. Dundas's account of the 10th August, 1782.

Mr. Oliver.—“10th August, 1782, by cash received of Andrew Douglas, esq. 1,000*l*.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the entry of the 4th of October, 1782.

Mr. Oliver.—“October 4th, ditto, 200*l*. 5*s*. 2*d*.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the entry of the 15th of November, 1782.

Mr. Oliver.—“The 15th of November, of ditto, 232*l*. 14*s*. 8*d*.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Read another entry of the 29th November, 1782: this entry was read yesterday out of another book, which was sworn to as being in the hand-writing of the witness then before your lordships.

Mr. Oliver.—“November 29th, received 600*l*.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the entry of the 19th of December.

Mr. Oliver.—“December 19th, received of Andrew Douglas, 1,000*l*.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Are those all the entries, from the commencement of the account up to this period, on the credit side of this account?

Mr. Oliver.—They are.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, I wish now to go on to the year 1783, and that an entry of the 21st of March be now read.—Is that a ledger of the same description as the one you had in your hand just now?

Mr. Oliver.—Of the same description.

Mr. Plumer.—Are these entries in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Oliver.—No, they are not.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you examined them with the waste-book, or with my lord Melville's banking-book?

Mr. Oliver.—It appears that I have, by marking that the book agrees at the end of the year.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that examination in this case, and in the case of the last book, with a banking-book, delivered to the noble defendant, or an examination with the waste-book?

Mr. Oliver.—An examination with the banking-book of lord Melville. The banking-book is a copy of this without making a reference at the time to the waste-book.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether you can now say, upon your oath, that you have yourself compared the banking-book with that ledger, so as to be sure that the one is a copy of the other?

Mr. Oliver.—If it is not a true transcript, it must be an error in copying.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you recollect who it was that wrote out the banking-book for the defendant?

Mr. Oliver.—It appears that I have done it myself, from the mark here.

Mr. Plumer.—Am I to understand that you mean to say, that the banking-book you delivered to the defendant was a correct copy of the book before you?

Lord Chancellor.—Can you say that upon your oath?

Mr. Oliver.—It is impossible to be more particular in the examination, it is done in the usual way.

Mr. Plumer.—I do not object to the reading of it.

Mr. Whitbread.—I beg an entry of the 21st March, 1783, in the account of the right honourable Henry Dundas, to be read again.

Mr. Oliver.—“March 21st.—By cash received of Andrew Douglas, 1,000*l*.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the entry of the 7th April.

Mr. Oliver.—“The 7th April, received 500*l*.”

A Lord.—Is there no name?

Mr. Oliver.—No name.

Mr. Whitbread.—I beg to know—which is a painful thing to ask—but it is, in order to bring this matter to a point, indispensably necessary,—what was the balance of the account of lord Melville on the morning of the 29th November, 1782, before the receipts and payments of the day began?

Mr. Oliver.—The balance on the morning of the 29th November, appears to be 92*l*. 19*s*. 10*d*. in favour of lord Melville.

Lord Chancellor.—Was that balance before the accounts opened that day?

Mr. Oliver.—Yes, before any thing came to the account that day.

Mr. Whitbread.—Go on to the 21st of March, 1783, and state what the balance of lord Melville's account was on that day before the payment of the 1,000*l*?

Mr. Oliver.—The balance on the morning of the 21st of March, appears to be 12*l*. 19*s*. 10*d*. in lord Melville's favour.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had lord Melville the benefit of all those credits that are so entered in that book?

Mr. Oliver.—Undoubtedly.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Can you recollect whether the banker's-book, when you saw it, was in the possession of Mr. Douglas, or of whom else?

Mr. Oliver.—I cannot.

Mr. Plumer.—At what place did you see it?

Mr. Oliver.—At Mr. Drummond's banking-house.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you ever see it in lord Melville's, or in Mr. Douglas's possession?

Mr. Oliver.—Never in either of their possessions that I can recollect. It is impossible at this distance of time to recollect precisely.

Mr. Plumer.—The balances you have ascertained now, are they balances that appear to be struck in the book, or balances you have now made by calculation?

Mr. Oliver.—The balances are not struck. I have summed up the account on each side, and that appears to be the balance to that period.

A Lord.—You have stated two different sorts of receipts on the credit of lord Melville. Some of the articles are entered as being paid by Andrew Douglas, esq., and others merely stating them as received. Can you, upon your oath, say by whom the latter articles were paid?

Mr. Oliver.—No, I cannot; for I was not in the department to receive money.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether it was usual to deliver the banking-books to the customers of the house?

Mr. Oliver.—To the customers of the house, if they came themselves; but gentlemen more frequently sent than came themselves.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it the custom to deliver the banking-book to whatever persons came for it?

Mr. Oliver.—Whoever was sent for the book always had it.

Lord Chancellor.—In the years 1782 and 1783, had Mr. Andrew Douglas any private account of his own with Messieurs Drummond?

Mr. Oliver.—I will turn to the ledger and see; but I do not recollect any. His name does not appear in the alphabet.

Lord Chancellor.—If he had had one, would it not have appeared in that ledger?

Mr. Oliver.—Undoubtedly.

A Lord.—Did you ever see, or have you an opportunity of knowing, in what manner lord Melville settled his private account with Messieurs Drummond, when these balances were struck?

Mr. Oliver.—There does not seem to be any settlement from the commencement.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has a copy of lord Melville's account ever been delivered to him?

Mr. Oliver.—There was an account made out lately, but I did not see it.

A Lord.—Have you said that you were more in the course of sending the banking-book open or sealed up?

Mr. Oliver.—We do it both ways; if a person brings it open, it is generally returned the same way; but it is generally sealed.

A Lord.—Were the payments made to lord Melville's credit by order, or by check?

Mr. Oliver.—By common drafts, generally payable to some person, or payable to bearer.

A Lord.—Does it appear that they were ever paid to lord Melville in person?

Mr. Oliver.—I do not see any entry to that effect as far as I have examined.

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish this paper to be put into the hand of the witness; it is a draft of lord Melville upon the house of Messieurs Drummond. Do you know that hand-writing?

Mr. Oliver.—I knew the signature of Mr. Dundas at that time; but I never saw him write.

Mr. Plumer.—If it is any paper signed by the noble defendant, he will admit it directly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Would you have answered any draft upon lord Melville's account not signed by himself?

Mr. Oliver.—Not without we had had an order for that purpose.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive any such order?

Mr. Oliver.—I cannot answer to that.

Mr. Plumer.—I admit it to be signed by lord Melville.

Then the draft was read, and is as follows:

"London the 8th November 1782 Pay to William Bell or order Fifty Pounds Sterling to the account of Henry Dundas.—To Messrs. Robert and Henry Drummond and Company Charing Cross."

A Lord.—Are these drafts still in the possession of Mr. Drummond?

Mr. Oliver.—They are here in court.

A Lord.—By whom are these drafts signed? Are any of them signed by lord Melville?

Mr. Oliver.—I believe the whole of them are, unless there are particular orders to draw; I have not examined them lately.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Heald was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What book have you now before you?

Mr. Heald.—The waste-book of Mr. Drummond's house.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the entry of the 29th of November, 1782.

Mr. Heald.—"Received of the right honourable Henry Dundas, £.1,000."

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the entry of March the 21st, 1783, in the waste-book.

Mr. Heald.—"Received of Andrew Douglas, esq. a bank-note of £.800, and a bank-note of £.200—for which I give credit to Henry Dundas in £.1,000."

Mr. Whitbread.—The entry of the 29th of November is made in the ledger received where the name of Henry Dundas, without any addition to it, appears in the waste-book; and the entry of the 21st of March, 1783, where the name of Douglas appears in the entry, is a special entry, purporting that it was received of Mr. Douglas, on account of the right hon. Henry Dundas. Read the entry of April 7th, 1783.

Mr. Heald.—"Received of the right honourable Henry Dundas, 500*l.* for which I give him credit."

Mr. Whitbread.—In that entry of the 7th April, 1783, it is, "Received of Henry Dundas," without any addition. The entry in the ledger has only the word "Received."

Then Mr. William Heald was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Does the last entry you have read specify the manner in which it was received, whether by bank-notes, or in cash, or in what way?

Mr. Heald.—By a bank-note, value 500*l.*

Mr. Plumer.—Are you to be understood now to say what you did yesterday say, that though the entry purports to be a receipt from the right honourable Henry Dundas, yet that it might be so entered, though received from any body else on his account?

Mr. Heald.—It might be from some other person.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you account for the difference in the ledger, when compared with the waste-book?

Mr. Heald.—I do not know of any difference.

Mr. Whitbread.—If there is no difference, whether received, in the ledger, does not mean it was received from the person himself, or herself, to whom that credit is carried?

Mr. Heald.—It does,

Mr. Whitbread.---Is it customary, in the house of Messieurs Drummond, to charge interest upon their over-payments, to their customers?

Mr. Heald.---It is.

Mr. Whitbread.---Was such charge ever made, or would it have been ever made, to lord Melville, provided his account had been over drawn, in the same way as it would have been made to other customers?

Mr. Heald.---I believe it would.

Mr. Whitbread.---Did it ever happen that any such charge was made in the account of Messieurs Drummond?

Mr. Heald.---I cannot answer; that is not in my department.

Mr. Plumer.---You are asked with respect to a comparison between the ledger and the waste-book, whether the ledger must not necessarily be general as the waste-book is, and therefore a receipt from Mr. Dundas be in the same terms as it is in the waste-book?

Mr. Heald.---It would.

Mr. Whitbread.---On referring to the ledger, it will appear that the word received is in the entry, and not Dundas.

A Lord.---If I paid a sum of money into Mr. Drummond's bank, upon the account of Mr. Dundas, or any other individual, declining to mention to the Bank my name, whether they would not enter it as received of Mr. Dundas, or such other individual?

Mr. Heald.---I should ask the gentleman, of whom I was to make that received: if he said of Mr. Dundas himself, I should have then entered in Mr. Dundas's name only.

A Lord.---Should you have made the entry as a payment from Mr. Dundas himself, in all cases in which another person paying the money directed you to enter it?

Mr. Heald.---Agreeably to the direction given me, I should have made the entry.

Mr. Whitbread.---In such a case as that just now stated by the noble lord, to which you have given that direct answer, should you not have made some private mark, by which you would have known that there had been some other person there, and not Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Heald.---That might have been omitted by me.

Mr. Whitbread.---Is there any mark prescribed in the usual form by the House, that they may be informed of such payment having been so made, when the name of the person is not delivered in?

Mr. Heald.---None.

Mr. Whitbread.---Is there not a certain mark or memorandum, made by the letter P, inserted in the books upon such occasions?

Mr. Heald.---Sometimes I do, but not generally.

Mr. Whitbread.---What is the interpretation of that letter P?

Mr. Heald.---That it was by another person.

A Lord.---Do you recollect any such instance as a person coming to the house of Messieurs Drummond, to make a payment of a thousand pounds on account of Mr. Dundas, and desiring his name might not be inserted as the person making the payment, but that it should be entered to Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Heald.---It is impossible for me to recollect such a circumstance.

A Lord.---Whether you have any recollection whatever, of what did pass, when any one of these notes was paid in?

Mr. Heald.---I have not.

A Lord.---Do you know of your own knowledge that all these notes were carried to the credit of Mr. Dundas, and to no other person?

Mr. Heald.---I do not know that: the last witness could inform the House.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.---The managers wish to ask a question of Mr. Oliver.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.---In case over payments were made to any of the customers of the house of Messieurs Drummond, was interest always charged?

Mr. Oliver.---Generally charged.

Mr. Whitbread.---Was lord Melville any exception to that rule?

Mr. Oliver.---No.

Mr. Whitbread.---Was he ever charged interest for over payment?

Mr. Oliver.---No, he was charged regularly for money at the end of the year.

A Lord.---Is it not the practice at Messieurs Drummond's house, when any payment whatever is made by another person, to give notice to the customer of such payment?

Mr. Oliver.---It is a regular rule, when one person pays upon another's account, to give notice of it the next morning.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.---What was the amount of the interest charged upon the noble defendant from January 1786 to May 1800?

Mr. Oliver.---I have not got the particulars, but by referring to the ledger I can collect it.

Mr. Plumer.---You will refer to the books for that purpose, and prepare yourself to give an account on a future day.

A Lord.---When a payment is made in Mr. Drummond's house, by an agent on account of his principal, is it customary to give notice to such principal of the payment of his agent?

Mr. Oliver.---It is a general custom, unless it is particularly desired not to be.

A Lord.---Who is it that gives that notice next day?

Mr. Oliver.---The clerk whose business it is to write the letters.

A Lord.---How does the clerk collect the knowledge that it was paid by a third party?

Mr. Oliver.—He collects that knowledge from the entry in the cash-book.

A Lord.—What mark in the entry communicates that knowledge to the clerk?

Mr. Oliver.—If Mr. Douglas, for instance, paid in a sum of money on Mr. Dundas's account, it is stated "Henry Dundas of Mr. Douglas."

A Lord.—Supposing the person does not choose to give his name, he says, I bring such a sum for Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Oliver.—I enter it in his name, and give him credit for it, without specifying who he was.

A Lord.—Am I to understand that in every case, where a person does not give his name, there is no notice given?

Mr. Oliver.—Certainly; there is no notice at all where the person paying does not give in his name.

A Lord.—I understand you to have said, that if the money is paid in without the person giving his name, no notice is given of that payment.

Mr. Oliver.—Certainly not, when it appears only in the person's name on whose account it is received.

A Lord.—Then how is the person to whose credit it is received, supposed ever to learn that it has been sent to that house?

Mr. Oliver.—The supposition is, that it has been sent immediately from that person by a messenger.

A Lord.—I understand you infer then, that it is supposed to be by the party himself?

Mr. Oliver.—By the party himself.

A Lord.—Is it the usage of the house, whatever the fact be, to consider the person paying, who does not give his name, as paying on account of the individual to whose account the money is to be placed?

Mr. Oliver.—Certainly.

A Lord.—Leaving them to settle the matter between them as they think proper?

Mr. Oliver.—Certainly.

A Lord.—Then where a person pays a sum of money without giving his name, though it is carried to his credit, may it not frequently happen, that the person to whose account it is carried, knows nothing of the fact till his book is sent to your house to be settled?

Mr. Oliver.—It may so happen.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Mac George was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the house of Messieurs Drummond?

Mr. Mac George.—I was in the year 1785.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you so in the year 1782?

Mr. Mac George.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you copy the letters that were sent by that house to their different customers?

Mr. Mac George.—It was my custom, at an early period of my going to the house, to copy the letters; afterwards I wrote them.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that book you have in your hand?

Mr. Mac George.—The Letter-book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to a letter written in June 1785, which purports to be written to the right honourable Henry Dundas. Is that letter in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Mac George.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Notice has been served upon the noble defendant, to produce the original of that letter; we can prove it if necessary.

Mr. Plumer.—I do not dispute the notice; but we have no such letter.

Then the copy of the letter was read from the book, and is as follows:

"Messieurs Drummond present their compliments to Mr. Dundas, and take the liberty to acquaint him his account stands 2,953*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* over-paid, by which they apprehend there must be some mistake, or that some money has not been paid in that he expected, and therefore think it right to acquaint him of it.

"23rd June, 1785."

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Was interest in fact charged upon that specific over-payment?

Mr. Oliver.—The interest was charged from the time the account became over-paid.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Mac George was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—Did lord Melville return any answer to that letter?

Mr. Mac George.—Not that I know of.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—My lords, I am now going to produce an account signed by the noble defendant himself; the object of the evidence is to show the application of some of those notes composing the 5,000*l.* which were received by Mr. Douglas at the Exchequer, on the 6th of November, 1782. I will show the paper to the counsel for the defendant.

Mr. Plumer admitted it.

Mr. Giles.—It is an account between his lordship and a Mr. Newbiggen, who lived in Scotland; it contains an item of a bill drawn by Mr. Newbiggen upon, and payable by lord Melville, in favour of sir William Forbes.

Mr. Plumer.—The honourable and learned manager will show where that paper came from.

Mr. Giles.—We do not conceive we are under the necessity of doing that.

Mr. Plumer.—I certainly cannot insist that the honourable manager should do so.

The same was read, and is as follows:

“Dr. ——— James Newbiggen, to the right honourable lord advocate.

“1782, Nov. 16.—To d<sup>o</sup>. Sir W. Forbes, for my bill on the lord adv. 1,000*l*.”

Mr. Giles.—My lords, I shall now proceed to show that that bill came to the hands of Messieurs Moffatt and Kensington, bankers, in London; and that it was paid by one of those bank-notes which we proved yesterday to have been received at the Exchequer, by Mr. Douglas. The noble defendant has had notice to produce the bill of Mr. Newbiggen.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. George Scott was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Were you clerk to Messieurs Moffatt and Kensington in the month of November, 1782?

Mr. Scott.—I was.

Mr. Giles.—What is the book you now hold in your hand; and is there any entry in it in your hand-writing?

Mr. Scott.—It is called the Goldsmiths' Book; it is a book which contains the particulars of all bank-notes and drafts that come into the house.

Mr. Giles.—Is there any entry in your hand-writing by which it appears that a bank-note for 1,000*l*. K 12, came into the house in November, 1782?

Mr. Scott.—There is K 12, the 24th October.

Mr. Plumer.—Are you the person who actually received the bank-note?

Mr. Scott.—I am not.

Mr. Plumer.—From what did you make this entry?

Mr. Scott.—From the bank-note.

Mr. Plumer.—But by whom it was brought to you, you do not know?

Mr. Scott.—It was received.

Mr. Giles.—Is the bank-note you now hold in your hand, the note from which you made that entry?

Mr. Scott.—I have no doubt of it.

Mr. Giles.—Does that entry made by you enable you to say on what account that bank-note was paid to the house?

Mr. Scott.—It was received for a bill upon the lord advocate of Scotland.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, this shows the impropriety of proceeding in the examination till the point had been ascertained. I understand the witness to say, he was not the person who received the note, or knew upon what account, or by whom it was paid; he only copies into the book, a bank-note, which is brought to him by somebody; but upon what account, or by whom that is paid, he does not know.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know any thing of this bank-note, but from what appears upon the note itself?

Mr. Scott.—From the memorandum upon the back of it, it was received in payment of a draft upon the lord advocate of Scotland.

Lord Chancellor.—Have you any knowledge whom that bank-note came from, except from the hand-writing upon the back of it?

Mr. Scott.—Not any.

Mr. Whitbread.—Having brought the examinations down to the 7th of April, 1783; and having been called by the counsel on the other side, to depose upon oath, as to a part of the articles on this impeachment; I beg to appear in the character of a witness, and upon my oath to declare, that I heard lord Melville declare on the 11th of June, 1805, that during the paymastership of Mr. Douglas, he became possessed of the public money, to the amount of 10,000*l*. or thereabouts; and that he further declared that he would not reveal the application of that money, being impelled to do so from motives of public duty, private honour, and personal convenience.

Lord Chancellor.—Was that answer so given by lord Melville committed to writing?

Mr. Whitbread.—It was not committed to writing, I heard lord Melville say it, and it was merely to save the time of the Court, as I have been already sworn, that I swear it. Many other witnesses, who heard it, might be called to prove it.

Mr. Plumer.—The honourable manager will excuse me for putting a question to him upon the subject on which he has given evidence. How long is it since the honourable manager heard this declaration made?

Mr. Whitbread.—I stated the date, on the 11th of June, 1805.

Mr. Plumer.—Did the honourable manager make any note at the time of the words that were spoken?

Mr. Whitbread.—I did not commit it to writing at the time, but I remember the words, upon my oath.

Mr. Plumer.—Did not the noble defendant at the same time accompany it with a positive declaration that he had not converted any part of it to his own profit or emolument?

Mr. Whitbread.—I believe he did.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you the least doubt that he did so?

Mr. Whitbread.—As to the express terms I do not remember them. Those that I have spoken are the words that made the greatest impression upon me: and I shall never forget them. The import of other parts of this speech certainly was, that he had not applied it to any private advantage or emolument.

Mr. Plumer.—In substance it was to that effect?

Mr. Whitbread.—I have said so.

Mr. Plumer.—The honourable manager has no doubt it was?

Mr. Whitbread.—I have said so.

Mr. Plumer.—I have no other question.

Mr. Whitbread.—If there is no other question to be put to me in the character of a witness, I now propose in the character of a manager, to call Mr. George Swaffield.

Then George Swaffield, esq., was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Before this witness is examined, I hope the honourable manager will pardon me if I take the liberty of saying, that I do not at present recollect any other question I wish to put to the honourable manager; but as the honourable manager has been kind enough to appear in the character of a witness, I hope he will not object to any question we may hereafter put to him.

Mr. Whitbread.—As far as concerns myself, I shall certainly have no objection to the learned counsel cross-examining me at any future time: but on the part of any other witness, I must object to his being put, through any lapse of mine, into any situation in which he ought not to be placed. I may rely, I am sure, with the utmost security upon the discretion and honour of the learned counsel, that he would not induce me, unlearned as I am, to answer any question which he would not put to any other witness.

Mr. Plumer.—No question of the nature suggested will ever be put to the honourable manager.

Mr. Whitbread.—I speak not only as to the nature of the question, but as to the time of putting it also.

Mr. Whitbread.—Mr. Swaffield are you not now an officer in the Navy pay-office?

Mr. Swaffield.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—How many years have you been in the Navy pay-office?

Mr. Swaffield.—Sixty years.

Mr. Whitbread.—In the early part of your duty in the Navy pay-office, do you recollect that there was such a thing as an iron chest kept for the public accommodation of the office?

Mr. Swaffield.—There has always been an iron chest in the strong room, as we call it.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what use was that iron chest applied?

Mr. Swaffield.—To lock up the public money.

Mr. Whitbread.—I have no further question to ask the witness at present; we shall have to call him again.

Mr. Adam.—Then we will reserve our cross-examination till he is called again.

Mr. Whitbread.—We wish now to put in lord Melville's examination before the commissioners of naval inquiry, which was put in upon oath.

Then William Mackworth Praed, sergeant at law, was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What have you in your hand?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I have the examination of the right honourable lord viscount Melville, which was taken before the commissioners of naval inquiry, on the 5th November, 1804.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it signed by lord Melville?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville depose upon oath to that evidence?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—Lord Melville was sworn, and deposed upon oath to the contents of this paper.

Mr. Whitbread.—We put in the paper, and at some time of the trial undoubtedly the whole will be read to your lordships; but unless the counsel wish to have it read now, I should point your lordships to only one question and answer.

Then William Mackworth Praed, sergeant at law, was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Before lord Melville was examined before the commissioners of naval inquiry, had any notice been given to his lordship of the points upon which it was intended to examine him?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—Certainly not, any further than that a letter had been written before to the noble lord, with respect to some part of the subject upon which we were then making our inquiry, and to which letter an answer had been received. I only speak of this from having seen the letter in the office, and the answer of his lordship to it.

Mr. Plumer.—Then, excepting that letter which, I believe, desired a production of the accounts, no intimation whatever was given to the noble defendant, of the points upon which it was intended to interrogate him?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I think I may say certainly not otherwise than as the precept, to which perhaps reference should be had, will show. Perhaps, I ought rather to refer to that altogether. I believe it required nothing more than the noble lord's attendance any day that would be convenient to him. I am not quite sure whether it was a precept or a letter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the questions submitted to lord Melville in writing?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—The questions were written down, and then read over by the secretary to lord Melville, and his answers taken down by the secretary, who sat at his right hand.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had lord Melville an opportunity of seeing the depositions he had given?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—The course has always been, and was observed with regard to lord Melville, that the question is first written down, the answer taken, the answer read, the question and answer then read over, and at the close of the examination the whole examination is read over again, and then the examinant is desired to attend at some future day to hear the examination read over, or on the same day, if it is a short examination, and then sign it. That course was observed by lord Melville; the questions were read over distinctly, and the answers also. The whole was read over on the first day, and on the subsequent day, when it was in the form in which I now hold it. The whole was read over to lord Melville by the secretary, one of the commissioners holding the fair copy, and after that had been so read lord Melville signed it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had the persons opportunity given to them of altering or correcting the answers they had given before their subsequent signing it?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—The witnesses have been at all times permitted to make such alterations as they thought proper on the first day of examination, but upon the second day no alteration has been permitted to be made in the transcript; but if any thing suggested itself to the witness by way of alteration or correction, it has been written down upon the examination so transcribed, and then those alterations have been signed by the party so proposing them, and also by the commissioners then present.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville avail himself of the latitude granted by the naval commissioners to amend his deposition?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—He did not. If he had, it would appear upon this paper.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether he availed himself of the opportunity given of correcting his deposition before it was signed?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—Certainly upon the first day the noble lord availed himself of shaping the answers in such manner as appeared eligible to himself. I do not recollect that there was any thing in particular that he desired to make any alteration in; he did not in fact make any alteration in the second examination as transcribed here, but in the course of the first examination, the turn of expression was sometimes changed by the noble lord, as he dictated to the secretary; but I am not aware that there is any material alteration from the original impression of his mind as he delivered it to us.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had the noble lord the same opportunities given him to make any alteration he might think fit which were given to other witnesses?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—Undoubtedly he had.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the answers that were taken down from the noble lord, and that appear in that paper, were the answers that he gave instantly, immediately upon the question being put to him, of which he had had no previous notice?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—Undoubtedly they were.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you in fact recollect that the answer first given to any question put at any subsequent time, was corrected, even in the expression or words of it?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I can take upon myself to swear, that in the course of dictating to the secretary, some words were altered in the phraseology, but I am not aware of any alteration in any thing material.

Mr. Plumer.—But do you remember, in point of fact, that any alteration of any kind did take place?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—No otherwise than as the phraseology might be altered in the course of dictating to the secretary.

Mr. Plumer.—After it had been taken down, was any alteration made in any answer?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—After it had been transcribed, I am not aware that any alteration was made.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish to ask whether the questions which were put to my lord Melville had been written down prior to his lordship's attendance?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I cannot take upon me to say with positiveness, that every question which was put to lord Melville was written down; I rather think that they all had been written down, but as it frequently occurs in the course of examination that some answer leads to a further question, it is impossible for me to say now, but that some such question might have been introduced, in consequence of a preceding question, and the answer of lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—How long before this examination had the questions been written down?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I cannot take upon me to say how long they had been prepared.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it the day or the week before?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I cannot speak as to that point, because our course has been to meet in the morning prior to the attendance of a witness, and read over the questions together; but with regard to framing those questions I cannot say, not having framed those questions myself, nor heard from any of the commissioners when they were prepared—at what time they were prepared.

Mr. Plumer.—Had you seen them at the preceding meeting?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I cannot say that I had: I can speak positively that I saw them the same morning lord Melville attended, but cannot speak to having seen them at any prior time.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville, when he attended upon the commissioners, express a wish to have further time for consideration of the answer he was to give to the questions?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—By no means; no such application was made.

A Lord.—Was lord Melville allowed to see the questions proposed to him, between the first and the second examination?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—Certainly not, nor was any application, that I am aware of, made for that purpose.

A Lord.—Whether, according to the course of your proceedings, you ever do grant time, unless it is asked?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—We have. In some cases of this sort some objection has been made, concerning the propriety of a person's disclosing matters, conceived to be committed to him in confidence. There was an instance in the case of Mr. Antrobus, we gave him time to advise with counsel in order to be satisfied whether we had, or not, a right to enforce an answer to the question; and another instance with regard to Mr. Trotter; he requested time for a similar purpose, and we granted it.

A Lord.—What interval was there between the first and second examination?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—There was not a second examination, it was a second attendance merely for the purpose of signing the first examination; I think it was an interval of three or four days, but I am not sure.

A Lord.—Had lord Melville an opportunity of seeing his answers during that interval?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—If it is meant to ask, whether any application was made for the purpose, I do not know of any; and if lord Melville had made an application I think it could not be granted, and for this reason, if the commissioners had been sitting and lord Melville had come, I have no doubt he would have been permitted to see them; if not, the secretary would no doubt have refused him, and referred him to the board.

A Lord.—Whether you ever granted time to persons who were to be examined upon any other grounds, than where it happened that there was a doubt about your own right, to put the questions?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I cannot answer it with certainty; it does not occur to me at present that instances of that sort of wish for delay have occurred; but I can say that in the present case no such delay was asked for.

A Lord.—After the first attendance, was the witness furnished with a copy of what he deposed before the second attendance?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—No; it has been applied for, but has been constantly refused; and the reason of the board I apprehend to be this, that if we had granted such copies, the witnesses would have opportunities of talking with other people upon the subject of their examination, and might feel impressions which might lead to an alteration of their evidence, not arising from their own knowledge, but from communication with others.

A Lord.—Would the witnesses examined before you have been allowed to take copies of the answers they had given to the questions?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—The general rule has been not to permit that practice. In some cases, persons have desired to take down a particular question with a view to give a more satisfactory answer afterwards; but, in general, it has been refused, and for the very same reason for which we have refused to grant copies.

A Lord.—Was it known to lord Melville or the commissioners, before the examination of lord Melville took place, that the examination would involve his private affairs?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—No such intimation was given on the part of the commissioners; what was in the breast of the noble lord himself, with respect to the tendency of this examination, it is impossible for me to say.

A Lord.—Was it known to the commissioners, before the examination, that the examination would involve lord Melville's private affairs? or did that only come out in the course of the examination?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—It was certainly known to the commissioners, that the questions which they should put to his lordship, would tend to disclose some pecuniary concerns of his lordship, or would oblige his lordship to rest upon the defence which was taken, namely, that he did not choose to disclose certain circumstances, on account of the clause in the statute; but as the questions went to discover from his lordship what use had been made of the money, and whether that use had been converted to his own advantage, necessarily these questions must lead to the disclosure of some things which might be of a private nature, inasmuch as the advantage made of the money, if any such had taken place, would be private.

A Lord.—Had any of the witnesses who were examined on the first day, and had given in their answers, an opportunity given to them of examining those answers they had so given, before the second day, when they were called upon to sign it?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I have no recollection of any such application having been made; and have said before, that if any such application had been made, I think it would have been refused by the secretary, if any such application had been made to him; whatever might have been said by the board, if an application had been made to them.

A Lord.—Was any such notice given to the party examined on the first day that he might have an opportunity of having recourse to his own answers?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—The usual course has been, before the evidence taken down has been read over for the last time on the first day, to call the attention of the examinant to the answers he has given, and to request, that if he saw any thing which he wished to alter, that he would do it. I will not charge my memory positively, that that took place in the case of lord Melville, but I should rather think that it did.

A Lord.—The question is, whether the secretary gave notice to the examinant the first day, that he might have that opportunity on the second day?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—No; the secretary has never given any such notice that I know of.

A Lord.—Is that paper an exact copy of the original examination of lord Melville?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I have no doubt it is an exact copy; for the original evidence, as taken upon the first day, was in the hand of one of the members of the board while this was read over by the secretary, and upon all occasions the transcript has been so compared since I have been a member of that board.

A Lord.—Whether you can recollect any instance in which the fair copy of the examination was not an exact copy of the original rough draft, taken at the time of the examination?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I apprehend I am aware of the allusion; I think it alludes to an examination at the first institution of the board, when I was not a member of it; there was one occasion in print perfectly well known, in which there had been something introduced by one of the clerks, different from the original evidence; it was observed when it was read over, and checked in the way I have described, and it was altered according to the wish of the examinant, before he signed it.

A Lord.—Whether we are to conclude from the evidence you have given, that the noble viscount, previous to his first attendance, had no intimation from the commissioners, either of the specific questions to be put, or the general scope and purpose of the examination?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—He had certainly no intimation of the sort from the commissioners, but we had been for some time in the course of the examination into the mode of conducting the business of the treasurer of the navy; and Mr. Trotter had attended us frequently, and the noble lord had had that letter written to him, to which we received the answer I before mentioned; but, for greater certainty I apprehend, the better course will be to refer to the letter which was written to the noble lord, requiring his attendance.

A Lord.—I understand that, after the first examination, the noble viscount was not allowed to revise and re-consider the answers he had given?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—That is rather an assumption than a question: I ask your lordship's pardon. It is stated that the noble lord was not allowed to revise the questions and his answers. I have already said, and again repeat, that no application, to my knowledge, was ever made by the noble lord to revise them; on the contrary, if the noble lord had applied to revise them, I rather think, and for myself can speak, he would have been permitted, during the sitting of the board to revise them, and prior to the transcript being made, which was signed; I can speak for myself, that I think he would have been permitted to have made the alterations, if any had been proposed.

Then the witness delivered in a paper, which was read, and is as follows:

“The examination of the right honourable lord viscount Melville, taken upon oath the 5th November 1804.

“It appearing by accounts laid before us, that the sums standing in your name, as treasurer of the navy, at the Bank, at the following periods, were less than the sums with which you stood charged, exclusive of the money advanced to your sub-accountants, and that the deficiencies were as follows, viz.

|                      |   |        |    |    |
|----------------------|---|--------|----|----|
| “ 31st December 1786 | - | 56,000 | 0  | 0  |
| _____ 1787           | - | 53,100 | 0  | 0  |
| _____ 1788           | - | 48,600 | 0  | 0  |
| _____ 1789           | - | 53,800 | 0  | 0  |
| _____ 1791           | - | 19,988 | 9  | 8  |
| _____ 1792           | - | 26,476 | 19 | 8  |
| _____ 1793           | - | 27,025 | 17 | 9  |
| _____ 1794           | - | 28,758 | 7  | 9  |
| _____ 1795           | - | 30,316 | 16 | 1  |
| _____ 1796           | - | 75,413 | 5  | 0  |
| _____ 1797           | - | 58,640 | 14 | 10 |
| _____ 1798           | - | 54,140 | 15 | 0  |
| _____ 1799           | - | 54,140 | 15 | 0  |

“To what cause are such deficiencies to be attributed?—Although I take it for granted the sums are stated by the question accurately, I could not on memory state that they are so. I desired Mr. Trotter, so far as I was concerned, to give you every information he could; and it was only in consequence of a conversation with him, immediately after the receipt of your letter to me, of date the 26th of June, that I learnt from the manner he kept his private accounts, it was impossible for him to give me the accurate information I required: the same reasons render it impossible for me to give you an answer to the question you put. I am aware that I am not bound to answer it under the provision of the act establishing this commission; but I should not have dwelt on that objection, if there had been nothing but personal considerations to operate against my doing so; but for the reasons I hinted to you in my letter of the 30th June last, as I am not bound, so I would not feel myself warranted to give the explanations which your question points at.

“Upon what ground does your lordship decline answering that question?—Upon the ground that I have already stated, under the 5th clause of the act 43rd Geo. 3, cap. 16.

“Was any part of such sums in your hands?—They certainly came into my hands, but did not remain there.

“Did Mr. Alexander Trotter, while paymaster of the navy, lay out or apply, or cause to be laid out or applied, any of the money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy since 1st January 1786, for your benefit or advantage?—From the manner in which Mr. Trotter kept my accounts it is impossible for me to answer that question, and I object to answer this question upon the ground I have stated in answer to the first question.

"Did you direct or authorize him to do so?—To the best of my recollection I never did.

"Did you, between 1st January 1786, and 31st May 1800, derive any profit or advantage from the use or employment of money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy, under the act 25th Geo. 3, cap. 31?—The same reasons which induced me to make the answer I have done to the first question, must induce me to repeat the same answer to this.

"Does your lordship object to answer this question under the provision of the 5th section of the Act 43rd Geo. 3, cap. 16?—I do, and upon the grounds stated in the answer to my first question.

"During the time you acted as treasurer of the navy, between 1st January 1786, and 31st May 1800, was any of the money applicable to naval services advanced by you, or by your direction, for any other public service than that of the navy?—I decline to answer that question, under the provisions of the 5th section of the act 43rd Geo. 3, cap. 16.

"Was any money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy, applied by your lordship, or by your direction, for any other public service than that of the navy, with the knowledge or consent of the navy board?—No, certainly not.

"Was there any official note or record made of the money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy having been advanced by your direction, for any other public purposes than that of the navy, or of the repayment of such money?—No; there was certainly no official note.

"Did you authorize the paymaster, in or about the year 1786, to draw the money applicable to naval services, from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private banker?—I cannot precisely fix the time, but I am certain that I did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge any money drawn from the Bank for public purposes in his private banker's hands, during the period it was not demanded to the purposes for which it was drawn.

"What circumstances induced you to give such permission to the paymaster?—An opinion, in which I still adhere, that if the whole monies necessarily drawn from the Bank in pursuance of orders from the competent boards, were lodged in the hands of a respectable banker, under the control of the paymaster of the navy, that it would add more facility to the conduct of the business of the office, in the multitude of small payments to be made, than if the money were deposited, according to the constitution of the office, in an iron chest.

I likewise had it in contemplation, that in the receipt of these various small payments, made to such a variety of persons, they would be less liable to be imposed upon by that mode of transacting the business, than if they were each to receive drafts for such small sums upon the Bank, at such a distance from the office, after its removal to Somerset-place.

"As the paymaster of the navy does not disburse any part of the public money, except for the payment of Exchequer fees and other contingencies, does your lordship think it necessary, that the paymaster should have in the iron chest, or at a private banker's, any of the money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy?—I do not think it necessary; but for the reasons I have given, I think it expedient. The whole money drawn from the Bank, and placed in the hands of the sub-accountants, pass through the hands of the paymaster of the navy; but though this is my opinion, I know many very competent persons entertain a different opinion.

"Did you give permission to the paymaster to withdraw the money from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private banker, with a view to his deriving any advantage or emolument therefrom?—If it is meant to ask me, whether I ever gave any direct authority to the paymaster to use the money in the manner above-mentioned, I should certainly answer, no; but I have no hesitation in saying, that I believed and understood he did, and never prohibited him from doing so. And I believe it was so understood by others, at different times, when the establishment of the Navy-pay-office was under consideration, when certainly no competent provision was made for the person exercising that trust of great extent and responsibility.

"As the money applicable to naval services was directed to be lodged in the Bank, by the act of 25th Geo. 3rd, cap. 31, and not to be drawn from thence, without specifying the services for which it is drawn; by what authority did you give permission to the paymaster of the navy to draw the money out of the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of private bankers?—I take it for granted it always was drawn under the heads of service pointed out in the act of parliament; and when I talk of permission, I mean it under the explanation contained in the answer to a former question, in which I suppose the money drawn under competent authority.

"Do you know of any instance of a treasurer of the navy having made good any loss which had arisen from over-payments, or other misapplications of the public money?—No, I do not.

"Did you derive any profit or advantage from the use or employment of money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy, between 19th August, 1782, and 30th April, 1783; or between 1st February, 1784, and 31st December, 1785, during which periods you held the office of treasurer of the navy?—I decline answering this question, under the 5th clause of the act 43rd Geo. 3rd, cap. 16, and for the reasons given in my first answer.

"Did you consider the addition granted by the king's sign manual, upon your appointment to the office of treasurer of the navy, making your salary 4,000*l.* a year clear of all deductions, to be in full satisfaction for all wages, fees, and other profits and emoluments, previously enjoyed by former treasurers?—Certainly I did, with the exception of coals, candles, and some such small contingencies.

"When was it first discovered that Mr. Jellicoe was deficient in the balance of public money, with which he stood charged as deputy paymaster of the navy?—I do not recollect the precise period, but the first thing that gave me any suspicion that there was a danger of deficiency, was, by observing in the reports occasionally made to me, that his balance remained stationary, so far at least as never to get below a sum I think of between twenty and thirty thousand pounds; this led me to have a particular conversation with him, when he confessed to me, that for a considerable number of years he had been embarrassed, from some advance or engagements he had come under with a Mr. Cort; that from the high opinion I had of him in consequence of the character of former treasurers of the navy, and my own observation, I had no reason to doubt the fidelity of his representation, and it was my belief, that if he had lived to superintend the business himself, and to bring the profits of the patent Mr. Cort had obtained to their proper bearing, that the loss might have been repaired. Upon this, however, I do not pretend to give any positive opinion, as it appeared, after his death that his embarrassment had existed, and a balance became due at least as early as 1782.

"How many years before the death of Mr. Jellicoe was it, that you suspected he was deficient in his balance?—I cannot mention the precise time, but it was certainly more than one or two years.

"Was any inquiry made, upon the discovery, into the real state of his balance?—Certainly, it was minutely inquired into.

"Does it any where appear what was the exact state of his deficiency at that time?—I cannot state it from memory, but I dare say it does appear.

"MELVILLE."

"C. V. M. POLE.

"EWAN LAW.

"JOHN FORD.

"HENRY NICHOLLS.

"WM. MACKWORTH PRAED."

Mr. Whitbread.—We now wish that the letter of lord Melville to the naval commissioners, dated 30th June, 1804, be read.

Mr. Plumer.—Would it not be better first to read the letter to which this is an answer?

Mr. Whitbread.—We have not got that letter here; we have no objection to reading it when it arrives. The date of the examination just now read, is the 5th of November, 1804; the date of the letter about to be read is the 30th of June, 1804.

Then the letter was delivered in and read, and is as follows:

"Wimbledon, 30th June, 1804.

"(Received 2nd July.)—(Read 2nd.)

"Treasurer's Balances,

"No. 38.

"Gentlemen;

"I have received your requisition, of date the 26th instant. It is impossible for me to furnish you with the account you ask. It is more than four years since I left the office of treasurer of the navy, and at the period of doing so, having accounted for every sum imprested into my hands, I transferred the whole existing balance to the account of my successor. From that time I never considered any one paper or voucher that remained in my hands as of the smallest use to myself or any other person, and consequently being often in the practice, since I retired to Scotland, of employing occasionally some time in assorting my papers, and destroying those that were useless, I am satisfied there does not exist any one material by which I could make up such an account as you specify. But, independently of that circumstance, I think it right to remind you, that during a great part of the time I was treasurer of the navy, I held other very confidential situations in government, and was intimately connected with others. So situated, I did not decline giving occasional accommodation, from the funds in the treasurer's hands, to other services not connected with my official situation as treasurer of the navy. If I had materials to make up such an account as you require, I could not do it without disclosing delicate and confidential transactions of government, which my duty to the public must have restrained me from revealing. I have the honour to be,

"Gentlemen,

"Your most obedient humble Servant,

"MELVILLE."

"To the Commissioners of

"Naval Inquiry."

Mr. Plumer.—Your lordships will have observed, that this letter is the answer to a letter which had been written by the commissioners to lord Melville. The honourable managers, I am persuaded, and your lordships will have no objection, that when the original letter is produced, it may take its place before this, in order that the letter may be intelligible.

Mr. Whitbread.—Certainly, that letter having been read, which was dated on the 30th of June 1804, and lord Melville's deposition having been read, which was dated on the 5th of November 1804, it will be proper that a letter of the 28th of March 1805, to the naval commissioners, should, in justice to lord Melville, also be read.

Then the said letter was read, and is as follows:

"Admiralty, 28th March, 1805.

"(Received 29th).—(Read 29th.)

"Gentlemen;

"Having read your Tenth Report, and observing particularly the following paragraph, in the 141st page:

'However the apprehension of disclosing delicate and confidential transactions of government might operate with lord Melville, in withholding information respecting advances to other departments; we do not perceive how that apprehension can at all account for his refusing to state, whether he derived any profit or advantage from the use or employment of money issued for the services of the navy. If his lordship had received into his hands such monies as were advanced by him to other departments, and had replaced them as soon as they were repaid, he could not have derived any profit or advantage from such transactions, however repugnant they might be to the provisions of the legislature for the safe custody of the public money.'

"I think it necessary to state the following observations, in order to place in their just view the grounds on which I declined answering your questions, and which you appear not to have accurately understood.

"When you first called upon me for information, I stated to you, that I had not materials on which I could frame such an account as you required me at that time to prepare; and, in a communication with Mr. Trotter, before my examination on the 5th November last, I learnt, for the first time, that in the accounts which he had kept respecting my private concerns, he had so blended his own private monies with what he had in his hands of public money, that it was impossible for him to ascertain with precision, whether the advances which he had occasion to make to me, in the course of his running private account with me, were made from the one or from the other of the aggregate sums, which constituted his balance with the house of Messieurs Coutts.

"This circumstance, which, I understood, Mr. Trotter had himself distinctly communicated to you, made it impossible for me to return any other answer than I did to the general question which you put to me, 'Whether Mr. Trotter had applied any of the money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy, for my benefit or advantage.' And to this circumstance I uniformly referred in my answers to other questions respecting the manner in which Mr. Trotter applied the money in his hands.

"When you put the question to me, 'Whether I did direct or authorize Mr. Trotter to lay out or apply, or cause to be laid out or applied, any of the money issued for carrying on the current service of the navy, to my benefit or advantage?' my answer was, 'To the best of my recollection I never did.' That answer I now repeat.

"Had you proceeded to inquire whether I had ever any understanding, expressed or implied, with Mr. Trotter respecting any participation of advantages derived from the custody of the public money? or whether I at any time knowingly derived any advantage to myself from any advances of public money?—I should have had no hesitation in declaring, as I now do declare, that there never was any such understanding, nor any thing like it, between Mr. Trotter and myself; that I never knowingly derived any such advantage; and that whatever emolument accrued to Mr. Trotter, in the conduct of the pecuniary concerns of the office, was, so far as I am informed, exclusively his own.

"With respect to any advances which Mr. Trotter might make on my private account, I considered myself as debtor to him alone, and as standing, with regard to them, in no other predicament than I should have done with any other man of business, who might be in occasional advance to me, in the general management of my concerns entrusted to him.

"It is impossible for me to ascertain, from any documents or vouchers in my hands, or now existing, what the extent of these advances may have been at any particular period. The accounts which you have inserted in your report, I never saw, till I saw them in the report itself: they are no accounts of mine, nor am I a party to them. They contain a variety of sums, issued nominally to me, which never came into my hands; and they give no credit for the various sums received by Mr. Trotter, on my private account, from my salary as treasurer of the navy, and from other sources of income, of which he was in the receipt. Nor do they take any notice of the securities of which he was in possession, for the repayment of any balance at any time due to him from my private funds.

"With respect to the sums of naval money advanced to me, and applied to other services, I do not feel it necessary to make any additional observations, except to declare that all those sums were returned to the fund from which they were taken, having in no instance been withdrawn from it for any purpose of private emolument or advantage.

"Before I conclude, I wish to correct an inaccuracy, which I observe in one part of my evidence.

"In Appendix, No. 7, page 192, the question is put to me—'Did you derive any profit or advantage from the use or employment of public money, issued for carrying on the current service of the navy, between the 19th of August 1782 and the 30th of April 1783, or between the 1st of February 1784 and the 31st of December 1785, during which periods you held the office of treasurer of the navy?'—which question I there answer by a reference to an answer given to a similar question put to me before.

"This answer is inaccurate, in so far as it contains a reference to Mr. Trotter's mode of blending his funds, in his private account with Messieurs Coutts.

"Mr. Trotter was not paymaster till the year 1786.

"The circumstances, therefore, relative to Mr. Trotter's account, which precluded my returning an answer to your former question, do not apply to the periods specified in that last mentioned.

"And I can therefore have no difficulty in declaring, that during those periods I did not derive any advantage from the use or employment of money issued for carrying on the service of the navy.

"Having stated these facts, it is almost unnecessary for me to add, that I am ready at any time to verify them by my oath.

"I am, gentlemen,

"Your most obedient

"Humble servant,

"MELVILLE."

"To the Commissioners of Naval Inquiry."

Mr. Whitbread.—A copy of the letter first written is now in court.

Mr. Plumer.—We have no objection to its being read from this book.

Then the following entry was read from a book, entitled, "Precept Book."

"To whom issued. Subject.

"Right Honourable Lord
Viscount Melville.

"Requiring to be furnished with an account of monies (exclusive of your salary as treasurer of the navy) received by you, or any person on your account, or by your order, from the paymaster of the navy, between the 1st of July 1785, and 31st of December 1800, specifying the times when such monies were received, and also the times when, and the persons by whom; the same were returned to the Bank or the paymaster."

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I believe there was no letter written to lord Melville; but that letter which was received by the board from lord Melville, of the 30th of June, was in consequence of that precept, of which the account has been read from the book. I am not aware of any letter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any note or letter sent to lord Melville, requiring his attendance?

Mr. Sergeant Praed.—I am not aware that there was any note or letter sent but the precept. Subsequent to that time there was a letter written to lord Melville, desiring him to appoint some time when it might be convenient for him to attend.

Mr. Plumer.—That is the letter which I desire to have read.

Mr. Whitbread.—This letter, which is about to be read, is the answer of the commissioners of Naval Inquiry to the last letter of lord Melville, dated 28th March 1805.

A Lord.—I desire to know what article the honourable managers are now upon?

Mr. Whitbread.—We are on the first and tenth articles. It was out of candour to the noble lord, that the whole of the evidence of lord Melville was read now; but we wish to point your lordships' attention only to that specific part which applies to the first and tenth articles.

Then the letter was delivered in and read, and is as follows:

"Great George-street

"My Lord, "2nd April, 1805.

"We have received your lordship's letter of the 28th of last month, by which you intimate that we appear not to have accurately understood the grounds on which you declined answering our questions, and submit to us some observations in order to place those grounds in their just view, and also express a wish, before you conclude, to correct an inaccuracy in one part of your evidence, and a readiness to verify by your oath the facts stated in that letter. If it be the object of this communication, that we should again require your lordship's attendance, for the purpose of being examined touching these matters, and that we should make a supplemental report upon the result of that examination, and such other examinations as we might thereupon judge necessary, there can be no disinclination on our part (as far as we are concerned in the proceeding) to meet your lordship's wishes; but it appears to us that the inquiry, which is the subject of the tenth report, has attained that period, when it would not become us to adopt such a measure, merely upon the suggestion of any of the parties to whose conduct that report relates.

"We were occupied several months in investigating the mode of conducting the business of the office of treasurer of the navy. Those who were examined by us had the fullest opportunity of stating and explaining all things which related to the management of that department, or to the share which they respectively had in it, and of correcting, at any time during the progress of the inquiry, any mistakes which might inadvertently have been made. Our opinions and observations upon the irregularities and abuses which we discovered, were formed and drawn up with the utmost care and deliberation, and they are now submitted to the three branches of the legislature, as the act by which we are appointed requires. If it could be made to appear, upon a representation to them, that any thing has been omitted on our part, that any misunderstanding or error had occurred, and that a farther inquiry is adviseable, upon these or any other grounds, it would be for them to direct such farther inquiry, and to decide by whom, and in what manner it should be prosecuted; but, in the present circumstances, it appears to us, that we cannot, with propriety, resume it.

"We have the honour to be,

"My lord,

"Your lordship's

"Most obedient

"Humble servants,

"CH. M. POLE.

"EWAN LAW.

"JOHN FORD.

"HENRY NICHOLS.

"W. MACKWORTH PRAED.

"Right Honourable Lord Viscount Melville."

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—We wish now to call your lordships' recollection to the evidence of Mr. Swaffield, who has been in the Navy pay-office for sixty years, that there was an iron chest kept for the public purposes of the office, in which cash was deposited. It is in the evidence of lord Melville, that an iron chest was a part of the constitution of the office; with that iron chest a public account was kept by Mr. Douglas, lord Melville's paymaster, which public account we now desire permission to put in.

Then Archibald Douglas, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know the hand-writing in the book now before you?

Mr. Douglas.—Perfectly well.

Mr. Whitbread.—What does the book purport to be?

Mr. Douglas.—"The right honourable Henry Dundas, Treasurer of the Navy, his iron chest, in the Office Cash-room."

Mr. Whitbread.—Whose hand-writing is that?

Mr. Douglas.—It is the hand-writing of my late father, Andrew Douglas.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then John Winter, jun. esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that book?

Mr. Winter.—I do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has that book been in your possession for any time?

Mr. Winter.—It has been in my possession ever since I found it among the papers delivered, by the widow of the late Mr. Douglas, to the committee.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where were those contained?

Mr. Winter.—In a box of papers, in the house of Mrs. Douglas.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it in the same box in which the banking books, produced yesterday, were found?

Mr. Winter.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you sure it was the very same box?

Mr. Winter.—I have no doubt about it.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, we wish it to be read.

Mr. Plumer.—I can hardly suppose the honourable manager to be serious, in desiring any entry in that book to be read, or that he can have brought himself to believe that it is competent evidence to be submitted to any tribunal whatever.

The book in question is a private book of an individual deceased, found amongst his private papers in that box; which was kept in the attic story of his house, delivered to his representative, and by her delivered to the honourable manager who now produces it. It is as much a private document belonging to that individual, as any other paper he possessed. Being paymaster does not make all the papers that an individual keeps for his own information to be evidence. And, my lords, I am quite at a loss to know what circumstance there is to discriminate the book in question from any other private books that gentleman possessed. Will its title differ it? The honourable manager has stated, that the Iron Chest Account did, in point of fact, exist. What evidence is there that any such account did, in point of fact, exist at this time? But suppose it did, what evidence is there to prove that this was that account? What evidence is there to prove that the noble defendant ever saw, heard of, or read one single item contained in that book? Then, my lords, on what possible principle is it, that a book, contained amongst the private papers of an individual, is to charge any body else after the death of that individual, in any court of law, civil or criminal? This is a proposition so perfectly clear, that I will not detain your lordships by arguing it any farther.

Mr. Adam.—My lords, I shall add but very few words to what my friend has said.

Your lordships will observe from the testimony of Mrs. Douglas, especially on her cross-examination, that this is a book which was kept in the private repository of an individual; that it came to her as executrix; that it has no official mark about it; that it is done completely behind the back of the defendant; and that to admit it would be admitting the memorandums of another person, in his private repositories, and in his private book, to be given in evidence to affect this party, when there is not the possibility of having any explanation given of this book, even if it were possible for your lordships to permit it to be given in evidence. Were the party alive who wrote it, it could not be considered in any respect whatever other than as a memorandum made at the time, to refresh his memory as to what was the transaction at the time; and it appears to me, that the mere statement of this question embraces the argument, and that it would be a waste of your lordships' time to add another word.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the managers for the House of Commons do contend, before your lordships, that this book is admissible evidence upon the issue your lordships are trying. It is proved to have been found among the papers that were in the possession of Mrs. Douglas;—to have been found, not, as the learned counsel observes, in a private repository of her husband's papers, but to have been found in a box specially appropriated by him to keep the papers that related to the treasurerships of which he had been paymaster. It is found in company with the banking books your lordships received in evidence yesterday;—it is found in company with the other documents that relate to the treasurerships of lord Melville, of which Mr. Douglas was paymaster.

My lords, I beg your lordships to recollect who Mr. Douglas was. Mr. Douglas was the appointed paymaster of lord Melville, and, in that character, was to have the receipt and distribution of all the money issued to him as treasurer of the navy. He was acting, your lordships must see by the evidence now before you, with the fullest power that a man in such a situation could act. By reference to the power of attorney read before your lordships yesterday, you will find that he had power “to transact, to do, perform, and execute all such matters and things as either “then or thereafter, in any manner should appertain to the duties of the office and place “of treasurer of the navy.” Having this full power, your lordships have in evidence that he acted under it. It has been proved, that on the 6th of November, 1782, Mr. Douglas received from the Exchequer, on account of lord Melville, then treasurer of the navy, 45,000*l.*; that he received on the 22nd of November in the same year, 50,000*l.*; that on the 19th of December, in the same year, he received 93,830*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* It has been proved before your lordships, by the banking books of lord Melville (found in the same place of deposit), that of those sums Mr. Douglas, as paymaster of the navy, had deposited in the Bank, 40,000*l.* on the 6th of November, leaving a balance of 5,000*l.*; on the 22nd of November, 47,000*l.*, leaving 3,000*l.*; and on the 19th of December, 90,830*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* leaving also a balance of 3,000*l.*, making together the sum of 11,000*l.* received at the Exchequer, but not placed in the Bank.

My lords, we produce this book to your lordships to show that he placed these sums, amounting to 11,000*l.*, in the Iron Chest. This account we now produce to your lordships, to show what the Iron Chest Account was, as we produced the banking book to your lordships, to show what the banking account was. Your lordships perceive, that by the constitution of the office, before the act passed in 1785, there was no impropriety in the treasurer of the navy keeping the money out of the Bank. He might keep it at the Bank, at the banker's, or in an iron chest; all that was required, after he received an additional salary in consideration of giving up other profits and emoluments, was, that he should not make use of the money for his private advantage. At that time the treasurer of the navy, or his paymaster for him, might, without breach of duty, detain money from the Bank. Your lordships have it in evidence that they did so,—that Mr. Douglas did detain on the 6th of November, 5,000*l.*; and on the other days 3,000*l.* each, making together 11,000*l.*—Mr. Douglas, as the paymaster of lord Melville might, without any impropriety, and according to the constitution of the office, deposit that money in the Iron Chest; and we shall prove, in point of fact, that he did so, by this account of lord Melville kept by his paymaster, as the banking books were kept by his paymaster; for when it is said that it does not appear that lord Melville ever read any entry in this book, or ever saw it, I would ask, does it appear that lord Melville ever read or saw his banking book? Certainly not. This is an account kept by a person authorized by lord Melville to keep it: it is, therefore, lord Melville's account. It is not Mr. Douglas's but lord Melville's account of the appropriation of the money he received from the Exchequer, and which was not deposited at the Bank, but in an Iron Chest; and we produce it, in order to show the amount of the money deposited in the Iron Chest, and the manner in which it was used.

Lord Chancellor.—You have shown that there was an Iron Chest in which, from time to time, were deposited such sums of money as were not taken credit for at the Bank; and that when there was an Iron Chest to deposit such money in, it was the duty of the paymaster,—and not only his duty, but the uniform practice of the office at that time,—before the act of parliament, to keep an Iron Chest Account, which Iron Chest Account would comprehend in it all such sums as were lodged in that Iron Chest, as contra-distinguished from those sums which were paid into the Bank, to the credit of the treasurer of the navy; because it is proper we should know distinctly what the facts are.

Mr. Giles.—I apprehend that the facts your lordship now states have been proved by Mr. Swaffield; if your lordships think that fact is not sufficiently proved, we will give your lordships the evidence. I am contending that this account ought to be received in evidence upon the supposition of that being the fact.

Lord Chancellor.—You must show that this is a regular official book, not a book Mr. Douglas might have kept for his own private memorandums. You must establish, before you ask of us to look at it, that it is a regular official book kept by the representative of the treasurer of the navy in that office.

Mr. Giles.—That is the way in which I offer it; I consider it as much a regular account as the accounts of the money kept at the Bank, produced and read yesterday.

Lord Chancellor.—Who has ever seen that book as an existing book? or who knows (if that is not the identical book which existed at that time) that there was such an official book in the office at that time?

Mr. Giles.—I do not apprehend we can call before your lordships any witness who has seen this book; but we shall call a witness who will prove there was an Iron Chest in the office, which, according to the constitution of the office, was a place for depositing money; and then there must have been some account kept of the money there deposited, and we offer this as an account of the money so kept in that Iron Chest.

Lord Chancellor.—But though there must be an account kept of the money in that office chest, non constat that this is that account; and therefore I think your evidence is not yet sufficient.

VOL. XXIX.

Mr. Giles.—I submit that this book—coming out of the custody of Mrs. Douglas,—found among the official papers of Mr. Douglas,—and not out of his private repository, but in a box containing papers relating to the treasurership of the navy,—imports that it is an official book kept by Mr. Douglas. We do not propose to read any entry in the book which relates to any private transaction of Mr. Douglas; we propose to read entries in the book which import there was so much money deposited in the Iron Chest. If it was an account current between lord Melville and Mr. Douglas, I should not propose to read it. But it is lord Melville's account current with the Iron Chest.

We will call Mr. Swaffield back, if your lordships please, to give a more particular account of the way in which money was kept in the Iron Chest.

Lord Chancellor.—For what purpose do you propose to produce this book?—Is it for any other purpose than to show that there was an Iron Chest deposited in the office of the treasurer of the navy, and that the paymaster in that office had a book in which he entered from time to time accounts of the sums so deposited in it?—Do you produce the book for any other purpose than that?

Mr. Giles.—We produce it for the purpose of showing that the money was deposited by the paymaster in the Iron Chest; that he kept an account of the money so deposited in the chest; and the effect that evidence is to have upon your lordships' mind and judgment must rest with the Court; but we produce it for the purpose of reading those entries.

Mr. Plumer.—The honourable manager has distinctly stated that he produces the book for the purpose of substantiating a fact, namely, That on such a day Mr. Douglas did, in fact, deposit a sum of money in the Iron Chest. I am sure the honourable manager would not wish to have the book presented to your lordships for any other purpose than that which he has distinctly stated.

Now with respect to the custody of this book, the place where it is found I submit renders it equivocal whether it was a public or private book, for it might be equally in his custody. The inference is, when found in private possession, that it is private property. Where was it found?—In that box.—If it was a public paper it ought to have been deposited in a public office; but it is the paper of a private individual, relative to a particular subject, and that is all that is proved. But your lordships are reminded of the company with which it is found, and the place in which it is found. Supposing there had been found a book in which Mr. Douglas had written a narrative of any money he had received and paid, would that be evidence?—Consider, my lords, the hardship of this being held to be evidence. This is now twenty-four years after the transaction—offered as evidence of a specific fact, when, if the witness were here, we might interrogate him to all the particulars explaining it. I am sure your lordships will see that this book has no one character of having ever been officially treated, and I will not trouble your lordships any further upon the subject.

Mr. Giles.—We are about to offer Mr. Swaffield to give an account of the Iron Chest, and to state what accounts were kept respecting it.

Then George Swaffield, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—According to your recollection, prior to 1785, was there an Iron Chest for depositing cash in the office of the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Swaffield.—There was.

Mr. Giles.—Was such money as was received at the Exchequer, and not put to the credit of the treasurer of the navy, deposited in the Iron Chest in the office?

Mr. Swaffield.—I can only say, that that Iron Chest was for the purpose of locking up the money.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know that, in the regular course of the office, there was any account kept of the money so deposited in that Iron Chest?

Mr. Swaffield.—I never saw such an account.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know by whom the money was so deposited in this Iron Chest?

Mr. Swaffield.—I believe the paymaster in general deposited his money there.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know it?

Mr. Swaffield.—I do.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know whether the money which was from time to time received at the Exchequer, or any part of it, was deposited in that Iron Chest?

Mr. Swaffield.—I do not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—It appears now, that the witness cannot state to your lordships, that he knew of any account being kept by the paymaster of the money deposited in this Iron Chest. But I contend that to make this account evidence, it is by no means necessary that we should show by other evidence that the paymaster was in the habit of keeping an account of the money so deposited in the Iron Chest; because as it was the duty of the paymaster, when he received the money at the Exchequer, to keep an account of the money so received, and also to keep an account of such part of that money as was deposited at the Bank, in the banking books; it follows of course that he ought equally to have kept an account of the remainder of the money deposited in the Iron Chest. This purports to be that account, that is, to be the account of the treasurer of the navy, of the money deposited by the paymaster in the Iron Chest. It is an account which of course from its nature must be kept by the paymaster only, for his is the hand that deposited the money in the Iron Chest, and kept the key of the chest, and of course he is the only person who can know what money is there placed, and delivered out of it; and that which we tender now to your lordships is in the hand-writing of the paymaster, Mr. Douglas, in a book found in company with those books which contain the banking accounts, and is as much an account of money deposited by the paymaster in the Iron Chest, as the banking account is the account of money deposited in the Bank.

Other honourable managers will state their reasons more forcibly than I have done, but I contend this is evidence which ought to be received in this cause.

Mr. Solicitor General.—My lords, the learned counsel who has objected to this evidence, has introduced his objection, by telling your lordships, that he can hardly imagine the managers are serious in offering it. My lords, the managers, who conceive that they have imposed upon them a most serious and important duty, have too much respect for your lordships and too much respect for the body which they represent, to offer to your lordships any evidence that they do not conceive to be legal evidence, and proper to be received. My lords, it is under that impression that the evidence now tendered to your lordships is offered; and before I make the very few observations which I mean to make upon it, it may be proper for me to state to your lordships that we are in possession of evidence, and shall in a future stage of these proceedings prove that that which appears to be the balance due from lord Melville to the public, upon this Iron Chest account, as it is called, is a balance admitted and adopted by his lordship, and acted upon in all his subsequent proceedings. According to the course which we have taken, we could not prove that fact to your lordships before we tendered the evidence which is now in question. I take for granted, however, that your lordships will give us that credit which every court of justice in the kingdom is in the habit of giving to counsel, and will believe, that we are in possession of that evidence, which we undertake at a future stage of the cause to produce. I shall therefore consider this case as if we had established that fact, which we hereafter certainly shall establish, namely, that my lord Melville has admitted, and that his subsequent accounts proceed upon the admission, that he was indebted to the public at the period when this account ends in the sum of 7,600*l.*, the exact amount of the balance stated on the foot of this account. Taking that fact with the addition of the facts which I am about to bring to your lordships recollection, we contend that we have a right to have this evidence received.

The objections that have been made to it, have proceeded upon a supposition, that facts exist which are inconsistent, as we imagine, with the evidence before your lordships; namely, that this book is a private book, found among the private papers of Mr. Douglas. Permit me to remind your lordships, that we have proved that Mr. Douglas was the paymaster for lord Melville; that he was authorized by a power of attorney from lord Melville to do all acts for him in the execution of his office; and that keeping the accounts of the treasurer of the navy is a part of the duty of the paymaster, the treasurer of the navy not himself receiving sums of money, and having indeed no accounts at all to keep. The paymaster's accounts are the treasurer of the navy's accounts. I am, indeed, not quite sure, that the character which we ascribe to the evidence we produce before your lordships is fully understood: we offer this account to your lordships as the account of lord Melville, a servant of the public, respecting the public money. We conceive that the paymaster's accounts are the treasurer's accounts; that the treasurer of the navy has no accounts but those of the paymaster; and if we are right in that (and we have certainly heard no suggestion to the contrary; we have proved the fact as far as our evidence has gone, and there is no evidence that the treasurer himself receives or pays any thing on the part of the public) then this is the account of the treasurer of the navy; it is his account of the public money, exclusive of that paid into the Bank. It is his account of the money kept in the Iron Chest belonging to the office. Upon these grounds, we submit that this is evidence which ought to be admitted.

Lord Chancellor.—I understand you to state, that lord Melville admitted a balance against himself, similar to the balance to be found in the book; but that does not go the length of proving, that lord Melville saw that book at any time.

Mr. Solicitor General.—No; what we say is, that lord Melville has admitted in his subsequent transactions, that that sum of 7,600*l.* was due from him to the public, due on the day on which the balance was struck in that account.

I ought to have made another observation, and that is, as to the purpose for which we produce this evidence. I am sure your lordships will be satisfied, that, in any thing which I, on behalf of the managers, offer to your lordships, it cannot be my intention, in the slightest degree, to show any disrespect to your lordships; but, my lords, the managers conceive that they are not bound to state to your lordships for what distinct purpose it is that they offer any evidence to your lordships, otherwise than that they offer it for the purpose of charging the defendant with the crimes imputed to him in the Articles of Impeachment. To no other extent do we conceive that we are bound to state to your lordships what our purpose is; and, least of all, do the managers conceive, that, by the admission, of one single manager,—what has been misconceived to be the admission of one single manager,—that the evidence is produced for only one specified purpose—the managers will be bound to confine that evidence to such specified purpose.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—I will trouble your lordships with one or two observations.

It appears to me, that the objection proceeds upon the idea that your lordships are now to consider the effect of the evidence, rather than whether it is or not admissible. The effect will be matter of subsequent consideration by your lordships; the only point to which your attention should now be directed, is, whether or not it can be received. I submit, that upon every principle of evidence, it ought to be received. It has been said, this is a private paper. It has nothing of the character of a private paper; the person to whom it belongs, the place in which it was found, and the title of it, all conspire to show that it is not a private paper, but a paper of a public officer.

To see whether it is evidence or not, it is only necessary to look at the situation of Mr. Douglas. He was, to all intents and purposes, the treasurer of the navy; that is, he acted upon all occasions for the treasurer of the navy—he did the whole business for the treasurer of the navy, so holding himself out to the public; and, in that way, lord Melville was regarded by the public as responsible for his conduct; for the conduct of Mr. Douglas was that of the noble defendant. One of the duties of the treasurer of the navy, which duty is executed as all other duties are by the paymaster, is, that of keeping the Iron Chest. It is clear, without the assistance of evidence, that there must be some Account of the Iron Chest. It is impossible that the sums of money, which are, from time to time, taken out of the chest in which they are deposited, and applied to all the various purposes which the service of the navy requires, could be taken out, unless there was some account kept of the purposes for which they were taken out, and the manner in which the sums were replaced by other sums received from the Exchequer, which they must have been. The only person who could have kept that account, is the person who had the care of the chest, which must be Mr. Douglas.

This appears to be in the hand-writing of Mr. Douglas. The noble lord had given him the control and management of this Iron Chest. Will your lordships then refuse to look at any papers written by the person who had the management of this Iron Chest, and from whose accounts alone it is that your lordships can possibly see what sums were put into, and were taken out of, this Iron Chest? This was found in the same box with all the other official papers; and if the objection is good for any thing, the same objection applies to every paper found in that box. This account was found in the place where your lordships would expect to find it, in the possession of that person whom the noble defendant appointed to have the management of his concerns. It appears to me impossible, that your lordships can refuse to admit it in evidence. Whether in the result this shall be brought home to the noble viscount, so as to criminate him, is another question. We offer it for the purpose of showing your lordships, that Mr. Douglas, being authorized by the noble viscount to manage this fund, did, in fact, manage it; that will not of itself establish criminality, unless we can superadd to it other evidence, for the purpose of showing that the noble viscount knew perfectly well the application which it appears Mr. Douglas made of this fund.

What is stated by my honourable colleague, is extremely strong. Your lordships will give us credit that we can offer other evidence upon this subject; we do not offer this as in itself sufficient evidence to bring the charge home to the noble viscount, but if we connect that other evidence with it which has been stated, then it brings it home completely to the noble viscount. However your lordships have not now to decide, what will be its effect, taken by itself or connected with other evidence;—but, the question is, whether your lordships will hear the account given by an officer appointed by the noble viscount, of that trust which the noble viscount committed to him.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, if originally I presumed to express considerable doubt whether the honourable managers meant to press the reception of this evidence, I have with extreme concern and astonishment, observed not only that the honourable managers persevere in pressing the reception of it, but that the learned and honourable managers should still state their perseverance in pressing the reception of that evidence after what has passed respecting it. I did understand your lordships to have distinctly called upon them, for the purpose of authenticating the evidence in question, that they should, if they could, give it the character of an official paper. For that purpose Mr. Swaffield was again called into the box, in order to know whether a paper of this description had ever previously existed; whether it did belong (as they imagined) to the office, that the paymaster should have an account denominated the Iron Chest Account. And yet when their own witness, called again into the box, has negatived, after an experience of sixty years, the existence of an account of that sort, yet still, they again repeat to your lordships the arguments that this paper is to be considered as an official paper, belonging to an official man, and in that character to be presented.

My lords, the whole argument of both the honourable and learned managers is founded on a fallacy. It assumes facts in the cause. There is not one fact upon which they proceed, established by the evidence. It is not proved that this is any more than a private document belonging to that individual. Does the circumstance of his having had a public office make every paper he kept public? Does it make every paper he kept relative to his office a public paper? Is every paper found in the custody of Mr. Douglas, to be evidence against all his superiors? Is it to be stated, that the papers kept by every subordinate officer are, after his death, to be evidence against his principal? We object to this paper as not being evidence to any purpose, because it has not that character which will make a paper of one man evidence against another. A written declaration whether in a book, or on a paper, of an individual deceased, with respect to what he did with public money after it came into his possession is no more than a verbal declaration. Suppose it had been a letter written by him found in this same box, would that letter have been evidence? Supposing it had been a memorandum of what he had done, would that be evidence? and how is this distinguished from a letter or memorandum? Is every declaration made by Mr. Douglas to be evidence against the noble defendant? I beg leave to refer to all those principles I troubled your lordships with upon a former occasion. They apply decisively to negative the reception of this evidence, this not having belonging to it any of those characters, that rendered it proper to receive the documents, which your lordships have before permitted to be given in evidence.

The honourable manager who spoke second, tells your lordships what evidence he shall hereafter give upon the subject. At present you must decide upon the admissibility of this book, by the evidence you have now before you. But, supposing you had the evidence that the honourable manager proposes to give, what is it but this—that lord Melville has admitted a certain balance, corresponding with the balance stated in this book? Does that make all the antecedent history, reducing the balance to that sum, evidence? What became of the original money received from the Exchequer before it was reduced to the balance, the noble defendant has finally admitted. What is the intermediate history of it, he has not admitted. How does the taking up a certain balance admit any thing respecting the mode in which the sum was reduced to that balance? I am persuaded your lordships will see that the proposed evidence can make no difference as to the admissibility of this book.

Another argument is this: the honourable and learned manager says, we denominate it the account of the treasurer. They have denominated it so, but have not in fact proved it to be so. If you had proved that the treasurer had ever seen or authenticated it as his account, then you would be fairly warranted in calling it his account; but will the honourable manager's declaration, that it is so, make it to be so? It is nothing more than an account in the hand-writing of the paymaster, and found amongst the private papers of that individual. Unless, therefore, your lordships are prepared to say that every paper found in the possession of every public man, is therefore of itself to be evidence for every purpose, I submit that the present document does not stand distinguished by any one piece of evidence that has been produced, either to give it the character of an official paper, or to bring it home to the knowledge of the noble defendant within your lordships' bar; and, consequently, upon every principle applicable to the law of evidence, it is nothing but a written declaration, not upon oath, and consequently can never be received in any court of justice whatever.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, I contend for the right of the Commons to make farther observations. I do not mean to say that right is at all denied, but I stand in this particular situation;—there is on my left a great deal of legal knowledge and information, which has spoken to your lordships as the organ of the House of Commons. It has laid down before your lordships—and I am sure those learned persons would not lay down that which they did not believe to be law, or give me information which they thought false—that this book which is now offered to your lordships is legal evidence: on the other hand, there are learned persons, who are the defenders of lord Melville in this case, whose duty it is, as it has been stated by one of themselves, to prevent the introduction of any evidence before your lordships, which may affect him criminally;—not only has the learned gentleman asserted that such is the plan upon which he proceeds, but your lordships know, that from the commencement of this trial to the present time, they have objected to various papers being introduced before your lordships, which have been established as good evidence. Under these circumstances, can I hesitate for a moment to suppose, that the information which I receive from this side, is that which is really and truly the law? and that the evidence we propose to produce before your lordships is such as your lordships ought to accept?

Now, upon the common sense of the case, I may be allowed to say a few words; taking it for granted that the law is with us.—An account must be kept of the money in the Iron Chest—we can show your lordships that various deposits of money, to a large amount, in cash, were made in this Iron Chest;—that those deposits were from time to time increased; and is it possible that the person who so deposited that money, upon an increase taking place, should not enter, in some book or other, what was the amount of the money so put into the Iron Chest? On the other hand, when an escort was prepared to conduct the money to the out-ports, as can be proved to your lordships, there was money taken out of the chest;—then must there not have been an account kept of that? And who kept that account? Was it not a public account? Mr.

Douglas was the person who kept the account—and that is the account which we contend before your lordships ought to be received by this Court.

Then George Swaffield, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—Who kept the key of the Iron Chest?

Mr. Swaffield.—The paymaster had always those keys in his possession.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Lord Chancellor.—Unless any noble lord shall think that this matter ought to be farther considered in the Chamber of Parliament, I will deliver my opinion.

I am of opinion, this entry in the book ought not to be received. I am persuaded, that the honourable managers offered it to the Court from a sense of duty and justice; and I persuade myself that every one of your lordships feels, as I do, the greatest possible regard for their dignity and learning; but it is the office and duty of the House, as a court of justice, to pronounce upon the legality of the evidence which is offered to it; and I am anxious, in the few words I mean to deliver, to make it manifest that the House has administered, as it always will administer, consistent justice; and, that this evidence, now rejected, may not appear to have received any sanction from the principles upon which the evidence yesterday was received. When Mr. Andrew Douglas was shown to have acted under a power of attorney, proceeding from lord Melville,—when he received money, and gave his certificate of that receipt at the Exchequer,—when it appeared that he could not have received that money under any other authority or sanction, and that the certificate he gave, was the universal and public course by which the receipt of such money was to be manifested:—These facts, so combined, were received by the House, as sufficient proof that such public money was issued from the Exchequer, and received by the person having a power of attorney, authorising him to receive it. But it was at the same time expressly declared, that it only proved that fact; and the House have not forgotten (what has been just now stated) the abundant difference between the fact, and the effect of it after it is carried forward by other evidence. But this is a book which cannot be received on any principle of justice, because it could only be offered as an official document—as a book in a public office, in which the person acting there under the authority of lord Melville, kept a specific account; and if it had been a book receiving from the evidence that character, although you might not have been able to establish that lord Melville had actual access to it, yet access to it must then have been presumed, from the nature of his office, and it would have been evidence to be read against him; not to prove any application by lord Melville of any money found in that book, but to show that in fact such an account had been kept by his deputy, of money for which he was civilly responsible as a public accountant.

If indeed it could have been shown that lord Melville had seen the book, and had adopted the balance which is to be found upon the face of it, and that evidence had been given in the first instance; then, whether the book had been public or private, his lordship's adoption of its contents as truth, would have rendered it evidence against his lordship. But the honourable managers did not profess to be possessed of any such proof, but only that the noble lord had admitted a balance, similar to that which the House would have found recorded in the book, if it had been received. I am, therefore, most clearly of opinion, that this book is not admissible, and cannot be read.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, Mr. Dodd, the witness whom I called some time ago, and who was not then attending, is now come; and, with your lordships' leave, we will pursue the inquiry which his absence interrupted. Your lordships will recollect it related to a bill of one thousand pounds, drawn by Mr. Newbigging, on lord Melville, in favour of sir William Forbes and Co., which found its way into the house of Moffatt and Kensington, bankers, in London; Mr. Dodd was a clerk in that house.

Then Mr. Thomas Dodd was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Whether you were a clerk of Messieurs Moffatt and Kensington, in November, 1782?

Mr. Dodd.—The firm of the house was Wickenden, Moffatt, Kensington, and Bowler, at that period. I was clerk at that time.

Mr. Giles.—What book is that which you now hold in your hand?

Mr. Dodd.—This is the bill-book of that house, which I then kept.

Mr. Giles.—Were they bankers in London?

Mr. Dodd.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Is there any entry in that bill-book, in your hand-writing, which enables you to state, that a bill of a thousand pounds, payable by the lord advocate of Scotland, was paid on that day, the 22nd of November?

Mr. Dodd.—Here is an entry, made by me on the 20th of November, showing that a bill so drawn was paid in on that day, due the 22nd, for 1,000*l.* in my writing; but this book does not show that it was then paid; another book will show that, which is called the Goldsmith's book.

Then Mr. Thomas Dodd was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Adam.—Was the bill presented to you, of which you read the entry?

Mr. Dodd.—This entry was made from the bill itself by me, as all entries in this book were.

Mr. Adam.—Was the bill presented to you by the person bringing it to the house?

Mr. Dodd.—It was entered by me amongst fourteen or sixteen other bills received at the same time from sir William Forbes and Company; it is entered amongst them under the date of the 20th of November, in my hand-writing.

Mr. Adam.—Am I to understand that it was given to you among a number of other bills that had been brought in, and were lying in the house?

Mr. Dodd.—It was brought in that day by the post, in all probability; that was the usual mode of their sending their bills.

Mr. Adam.—Who gave you the bill?

Mr. Dodd.—The custom of the house was, to put all bills that were paid in, in a certain box, with the name of the party, who had paid them in, written on the outer bill; and this appears to be one of the number which I have entered.

Mr. Adam.—After the bill was entered by you, in whose custody did that bill remain?

Mr. Dodd.—It was usual to take all bills that were accepted, after being entered, into the counting-house, to be locked up in a strong box; but if they were unaccepted, they were delivered out to the clerk to take them for the purpose of acceptance; but I cannot say whether this was an accepted bill or not; it appears it was due two days afterwards, the 22nd of the same month.

Mr. Adam.—Then all you know about the bill is, that it came to the house by some means or other, and was laid before you to be noted in that book?

Mr. Dodd.—Nothing more.

Then Mr. Thomas Dodd was re-examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Did the bill come to your house to be paid, or to receive payment of it?

Mr. Dodd.—To receive payment of it?

Mr. Giles.—Will the time when, and the manner in which that house received payment of the bill, appear by the Goldsmith's book, to which you have referred?

Mr. Dodd.—Yes, it will.

Mr. Giles.—Read the entry.

Mr. Dodd.—November 20th, Lord Advocate of Scotland, per I. Biggin and Co. 22nd November, 1,000*l.*

Mr. Giles.—Now I propose to call Mr. Scott, the person who kept the Goldsmith's book, to which this witness refers.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. George Scott was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Is there any entry in that book, in your hand-writing, by which you can state the date and the mode in which that bill was paid?

Mr. Scott.—It is entered here; K 12, 24th October, 1,000*l.*

Mr. Giles.---What does that entry relate to?

Mr. Scott.---A bill on the lord advocate of Scotland.

Mr. Giles.---Is there any reference to the folio of your bill-book?

Mr. Scott.---There is, it is 699.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Thomas Dodd was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.---What is the folio of your bill-book, in which that entry appears?

Mr. Dodd.---It is 699.

A Lord.---You have used in the entry, the words "lord advocate of Scotland," were those words upon the face of the bill?

Mr. Dodd.---It is impossible for me to recollect at this time, I was in the habit of copying at the time what was written upon the bill, and I have no doubt that the bill was so addressed.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.---My lords, I now propose to enter upon a head of evidence, which is rendered necessary by your lordships being of opinion that the Iron Chest Account Book, which we have offered, cannot be received in evidence. Not being permitted to show by that book, the amount of the money which was placed in the iron chest, and not deposited at the Bank, I am under the necessity of supplying this, by producing other documents to your lordships, to show what proportion of the money, received by the treasurer of the navy, at the Exchequer, was not deposited at the Bank. This I shall do by the public official books of the Navy-pay-office, which will prove the amount of the treasurer's official balance; and I shall then show by the banker's book, how much of that balance was in the Bank; it will of course appear that the remainder was not in the Bank.

Then George Fennell, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.---What books are those you now produce? are they the public books of the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Fennell.---They are; this purports to be the certificate-book of the navy branch.

Mr. Giles.---Can you, by reference to this book, state the balance in the treasurer's hand, on the 30th of April, 1783?

Mr. Fennell.---I can, as it appears by the books; the treasurer's balance under the head of navy, on the 30th April, 1783, is 42,201*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*

Mr. Giles.---State the balance under the other two heads?

Mr. Fennell.---The treasurer's balance on the same day, under the head of pay or wages, the pay branch is 37,856*l.* and under the head of victualling 9,351*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* making together a total of 89,408*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*

||

Mr. Giles.---Your lordships now have the treasurer's balance, according to the office-book of the Navy-pay-office, amounting to 89,408*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* It will appear by the banking-book, which was in evidence before your lordships yesterday, that the treasurer had in the Bank on that day, only 66,408*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* which is 23,000*l.* less than the office balance, so that there was 23,000*l.* not at the Bank.

Then the following entry was read from the banking-book.

"By balance carried to new account, 66,408*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

Mr. Giles.---Now we mean to prove to your lordships that this 23,000*l.* was not at this time applied to naval service, by showing that it afterwards came into the Bank, and from private sources, unconnected with naval services.—Your lordships will permit me to recall to your remembrance the 5,000*l.* in November, the 3,000*l.* in November, and the 3,000*l.* in December, which it appears, already in evidence before your lordships, had not been paid into the Bank, but were received from the Exchequer. The first sum which we insist before your lordships to be a part of this 23,000*l.* and to have come into the Bank, is a sum of 1,000*l.* It was paid in, in bank-notes, on the 24th June, 1783, to the account of the treasurer of the navy, as appears by the entry in the treasurer's banking-book.

Then the following entry was read from the banking-book.

"The 24th June, 1783, bank-note 1,000*l.*"

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.---The next payment, made on the 2nd of July, 1783, was 5,000*l.*; and I shall give your lordships more particular and distinct evidence of the sources from whence this sum came. I shall show your lordships that this 5,000*l.* came from the house of Mure and Atkinson; that they drew a draft for it upon their bankers, Messieurs Smith, Payne, and Smith; and that the notes given for that draft were paid into the Bank, on account of the treasurer of the navy.

Then Mr. Henry Callander was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.---Were you acquainted with the house of Messieurs Mure and Atkinson, and did you hold any situation in it?

Mr. Callander.---I was acquainted with the house.

Mr. Giles.---Did you hold any situation in it?

Mr. Callander.---Formerly; but not of late years.

Mr. Giles.---In the year 1783?

Mr. Callander.---I was not in the house then.

Mr. Giles.—Were you acquainted with the hand-writing of Mr. Dixon?

Mr. Callander.—Perfectly.

Mr. Giles.—What situation did Mr. Dixon hold in that house?

Mr. Callander.—The book-keeper of Messieurs Mure.

Mr. Giles.—Did he draw upon their bankers?

Mr. Callander.—He did, for the house.

Mr. Giles.—Is the signature to the draft, you now hold in your hand, the signature of Mr. Dixon?

Mr. Callander.—Most undoubtedly.

Mr. Giles.—What is that draft?

Mr. Callander.—It is a draft on Messieurs Smith and Payne, payable to the lord advocate, for the sum of 5,000*l.*; it is dated the 2nd of July.

Then the draft was read, and is as follows.

“No. 5,620. George-street, Mansion House, July 2nd, 1783.

Messieurs Smith, Payne and Smith,

Pay to the lord advocate, or bearer,

Five thousand pounds,

For Mure and Co.

5,000*l.*

JOHN DIXON.”

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. John Hayne was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Were you clerk to Messieurs Smith, Payne, and Smith, in the year 1783?

Mr. Hayne.—I was.

Mr. Giles.—Look at that draft; can you state whether you paid that draft for Messieurs Smith, Payne and Smith?

Mr. Hayne.—I cannot.

Mr. Giles.—Can you, by reference to any books of that house, know whether you paid that draft?

Mr. Hayne.—I can know my own hand-writing, when it is produced.

Mr. Giles.—Look at that book now before you, and state whether that is your hand-writing?

Mr. Hayne.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—Does that enable you to state whether you paid that draft or not?

Mr. Hayne.—This draft is entered by me; but the bank-notes were paid and entered by another clerk, who is since dead.

Mr. Giles.—Is that draft entered by you, as a draft that was paid?

Mr. Hayne.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—Will it appear by any book belonging to that house, in what bank-notes that draft was paid?

Mr. Payne.—It appears by this book, what notes were paid, and no other I presume.

Mr. Giles.—Is the entry, by which the numbers and dates of the notes appear, your hand-writing?

Mr. Hayne.—The notes paid are not in my hand-writing.

Mr. Giles.—In whose hand-writing is that part of the entry which is not in your hand-writing?

Mr. Hayne.—That is the payment of the notes which was made by a gentleman in the house who is since dead; I believe it was made by him, but will not swear that.

Mr. Giles.—Is the description of the notes entered by you?

Mr. Hayne.—No, they are not.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, I shall not pursue this, as the entry of the bank-notes was not in the hand-writing of the witness. We of course have not the witness who made the entry here, he being represented to be dead, but I will now put in the banking-book of the treasurer of the navy, where it will appear that on the 2nd of July 5,000*l.* was paid into his account at the Bank in bank-notes, unless upon my producing the bank-notes which were paid in, and from which this entry is made, if they appear to have the same numbers and dates as are in that book, your lordships should be of opinion that it will be competent for me to read the entry at length.

Then the following entry was read from the banking-book.

“Old account, right honourable Henry Dundas, Bank 1782, 1783.

July 2nd, bank-notes, Clifford 5,000*l.*”

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—I will now produce the bank-notes for that 5,000*l.* paid in to the account of the treasurer of the navy.

Then Mr. Thomas Rippon was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Look at those bank-notes, is that your hand-writing at the back of them?

Mr. Rippon.—It is not.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know whose hand-writing it is?

Mr. Rippon.—I do; it is the hand-writing of a person of the name of John Clifford, who, at that time, was the senior clerk in the drawing office at the Bank.

Mr. Giles.—Is he dead?

Mr. Rippon.—He is dead.

Mr. Giles.—Whose hand-writing is the entry in the bank-book, of the receipt of the 5,000*l.*?

Mr. Rippon.—The entry is made by the same person, John Clifford.

Mr. Giles.—Owing to the death of these two persons, it will be impossible to carry that further than it is now stated. The next sum I propose to prove to have been paid in, on the treasurer's account at the Bank, is the sum of 1,400*l.* which appears by the banking-book to have been paid in bank-notes.

Then the following entry was read from the banking-book.

“July 12, 1783, ditto—Clifford, 1,400*l.*”

Mr. Giles.—What does “ditto” refer to?

Mr. Rippon.—Bank-notes.

Mr. Giles.—Now I proceed to another sum of 6,000*l.* which appears, by the banking-book, to have been paid in to the treasurer’s account at the Bank, and came from the house of Mure and Atkinson.

Then the following entry was read from the banking-book.

“July 11, 1783, ditto”---(that is bank-notes), “Clifford, 6,000*l.*”

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Henry Callander was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.---Do you know the hand-writing and signature of that draft?

Mr. Callander.---I do.

Mr. Giles.---Whose hand-writing is it?

Mr. Callander.---The late Mr. Atkinson’s.

Mr. Giles.---That is a draft upon Smith, Payne and Smith, the bankers of Mr. Atkinson, is it not?

Mr. Callander.---Yes.

Then the draft was read, and is as follows:

“11th July, 1783, pay to the right honourable Henry Dundas, six thousand pounds.

Mure, Atkinson, and Mure.

Messieurs Smith,
Payne and Smith.”

Mr. Callander.---Messieurs Smith, Payne, and Smith, were the bankers of the house.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Daniel Dyke Edgar was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Were you a clerk in the house of Messieurs Smith, Payne and Smith, in the year 1783?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.---Do you know any thing of the payment of the draft you now hold in your hand?

Mr. Edgar.---No more than by the waste-book.

Mr. Giles.---Is the waste-book in your hand-writing?

Mr. Edgar.---Yes.

Mr. Giles.---Can you refer to the entry in the waste-book respecting that draft?

Mr. Edgar.---Yes.

Mr. Giles.---Can you state from that entry, when you paid that draft?

Mr. Edgar.---I made a payment of 6,000*l.* on the 11th of July, as appears by the waste-book, in six bank-notes of 1,000*l.* each: the entry is in my own hand-writing.

Mr. Giles.---Read the whole of the entry.

Mr. Edgar.---B 261 to 276; that should be sixty-six I apprehend, they are following numbers.

VOL. XXIX.

Lord Chancellor.---Read the whole entry.

Mr. Edgar.---Letter B 261 to 276.---There is put against that, the draft 6,000*l.*, from Mure and Company.

Mr. Giles.---Look at these notes, and see whether they are the notes you gave in payment of that draft?

Mr. Edgar.---The numbers are not entered correctly; but I verily believe these are the notes that were paid.

Mr. Giles.---Is there any one of these notes which you can state to have been paid by you on that day, in payment of that draft?

Mr. Edgar.---B 261, B 262, B 263;---they are not entered so in the book; they are put short, B 261 to 276.

Mr. Giles.---Can you state by that entry, that you paid any one of these notes, and how many, in payment of that draft?

Mr. Edgar.---One of the notes is entered wrong, instead of 276, it should be 267.

Mr. Giles.---Can you state that you paid any of these notes?

Mr. Edgar.---Yes; B 261 for 1,000*l.*—B 262 for 1,000*l.*—B 263 for 1,000*l.*—B 264 for 1,000*l.*

Mr. Giles.---Then there are four of the notes I understand you to have spoken to?

Mr. Edgar.---Yes.

Mr. Giles.---Read the other two notes.

Mr. Edgar.---B 266 1,000*l.*---there is on 265---and B 267 1,000*l.*

Then Mr. Daniel Dyke Edgar was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.---Whether you have any remembrance of the transaction itself, except from the entry in the book?

Mr. Edgar.---None, but from the entry as it appears on the book.

Mr. Plumer.---Is there any thing upon the face of the notes, that enables you to say, that these are the identical notes that you paid?

Mr. Edgar.---No, there is nothing.

Lord Chancellor.---What dates are those notes? are they all of the same date?

Mr. Edgar.---We do not enter the dates in the waste-book.

Mr. Giles.---The notes themselves are dated 7th July, 1783; and I propose to prove that these notes were paid into the Bank on the 11th of July.

Mr. Plumer.---Is there any circumstance which enables you to state now, whether the first of these numbers might not be 271 or 270, leading in a series to 276?

Mr. Edgar.---It appears, by the entry, to begin with B 261.

Mr. Plumer.---But as there must be a mistake, either in the commencement or in the termination, I wish to know whether there is any circumstance that enables you to know where the mistake is?

Mr. Edgar.---I cannot, but from the entry as it stands in the book.

Mr. Plumer.---Can you say whether the mistake was one way or the other way?

Mr. Edgar.---I cannot.

Mr. Plumer.---Whether, judging from the entry alone, you would suppose, that the notes are in a regular series, ending with 276?

Mr. Edgar.---Yes; but the error lies in entering 276 instead of 266; I apprehend so.

Lord Chancellor.---The question is---Why do you apprehend so, any more than that the error should be at the beginning of the series?

Mr. Edgar.---It is the usual mode of entering them, when they are following numbers.

Lord Chancellor.---The notes presented to you now appear to be in an interrupted series.

Mr. Edgar.---It is an error in the entry, I apprehend.

Lord Chancellor.---These do not follow in a regular series---there is no 265, therefore they do not follow in a regular series.

Mr. Edgar.---The notes that have been presented to me do not.

Mr. Plumer.---Then I understand, that the notes presented to you do not correspond in the precise numbers, nor are they in a regular series?

Mr. Edgar.---No.

Mr. Giles.---The witness does not identify them all; but there are four that correspond, and to which he speaks.

Lord Chancellor.---Can you swear positively that 261, 262, 263, and 264, which you now hold in your hand, are the identical notes paid by you?

Mr. Edgar.---I cannot swear positively, because the numbers are not taken down, one, two, three, four.

Mr. Giles.---Can you swear that any one of these notes was paid by you for that draft?

Mr. Edgar.---The 261 was paid by me, as the entry appears.

Mr. Plumer.---Have you any reason for saying that identical note was paid by you, other than from the correspondence of the figures with the entry in your book?

Mr. Edgar.---Only from the number; I have not the date of the bank-note, only the letter and the number.

Mr. Plumer.---And the sum?

Mr. Edgar.---The sum is all carried out together, 6,000*l*.

Mr. Giles.---I have read the entry in the banking-book, in which it appears, that 6,000*l*. was entered to the credit of lord Melville that day in bank-notes.

Mr. Plumer.---Does any thing from the entry show that each of the notes was for a thousand pounds?

Mr. Edgar.---By the entry, B 261 to 6, six single notes, make six thousand pound notes.

Mr. Plumer.---Have you any other way of knowing that each note was for a thousand pounds, excepting that the sum total for the six notes was six thousand pounds?

Mr. Edgar.---No, I have not.

Mr. Giles.---Have you any doubt that these notes you have spoken to, are the notes you paid on account of that draft?

Mr. Edgar.---No doubt upon my mind at all; I am well satisfied I paid 6,000*l*. on that day, for the 6,000*l*. draft.

A Lord.---Whether Bank of England notes, bearing the same number and letter, but of a different date, and issued on a different day, might not have come into your hand as well as those bearing the date which appears upon the face of these notes?

Mr. Edgar.---I think it is possible it might be so, we do not take the date, but only the sum in the waste-book.

Mr. Giles.---Is there any other book kept at Messieurs Smith, Payne and Smith's, by which the dates of these notes might be ascertained?

Mr. Edgar.---I apprehend yes.

Mr. Giles.---What is that book?

Mr. Edgar.---The bank note book I apprehend. I have left the house a great many years. I think we could trace all the numbers.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.---My lords, we will produce that bank-note book to-morrow morning. There is another sum of 2,000*l*. which stands under nearly similar circumstances.---With your lordships' permission I will now go to the proof of that.

Then Mr. Henry Callander was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.---Do you know in whose hand-writing the signature to that draft is?

Mr. Callander.---I do.

Mr. Giles.---Whose hand is it?

Mr. Callander.---It is the signature of Mr. Dixon, for Mure and Co.

Mr. Giles.---What is the draft?---read it.

Mr. Callander.---"31st July, 1783, Messrs. Smith, Payne and Smith, pay to Mr. Henry Dundas or bearer, two thousand pounds.

For Mure and Co.

JOHN DIXON."

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. John George Payne was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.---Can you state at what time, and in what manner, that draft for 2,000*l*. was paid by the house of Smith, Payne and Smith?

Mr. Payne.---This draft was for 2,000*l*. the entry is for 4,476*l*. 10*s*. 10*d*.

Mr. Giles.---Is that entry your own hand-writing?

Mr. Payne.---It is my own hand-writing.

Mr. Giles.---Can you state whether the draft you hold in your hand was included in that sum?

Mr. Payne.---By a reference to the cash-book and the ledger, it appears that this draft of 2,000*l*. composed a part of the transaction of the 4,476*l*. 10*s*. 10*d*.

Mr. Plumer.---What is the denomination of this book?

Mr. Payne.---The Waste-book.

Mr. Giles.---Can you state from this entry, or any other entry in your own hand-writing, whether you paid any other draft on that day?

Mr. Payne.---It is impossible for me to swear that this is the draft that I paid.

Mr. Giles.---Did you pay any draft for 2,000*l.* drawn by Mure and Atkinson, on that day?

Mr. Payne.---There was no other draft on that day, payable to the same name of 2,000*l.*

Mr. Giles.---Are you now speaking from the book, and the entry in your own writing before you?

Mr. Payne.---The entry here is in my hand-writing, I have referred from this entry to the cash-book and ledger, I there found that there were two drafts.

Mr. Giles.---Were the cash-book and ledger kept in your hand-writing?

Mr. Payne.---No.

Mr. Giles.---Can you state from that entry, what bank-notes you paid on that day, in respect of a draft for 2,000*l.* drawn by Mure and Atkinson, upon the house of Smith, Payne and Smith?

Mr. Payne.---I paid two drafts at the same time; what particular notes went to the payment of those drafts, it is impossible for me to say.

Mr. Giles.---Can you state what bank notes you paid in respect of the two drafts?

Mr. Payne.---They are here.

Mr. Plumer.---With great submission, I rather think it will appear as to the payment of the drafts in question, he knows nothing, but from an entry in the book, which is not in his own hand-writing. The book before him, which is in his hand-writing, is silent upon the subject of that draft, and would not enable him to speak of its being paid at all.

Lord Chancellor.---Is that entry in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Payne.---Yes.

Lord Chancellor.---Let it be read.

Then the entry was read, and is as follows:

|            |          |                |
|------------|----------|----------------|
| C. 172..   | £. 1,000 |                |
| K. 959.... | 1,000    |                |
| K. 869.... | 1,000    | £. 4,476 10 10 |
| H. 409.... | 1,000    | Mure & Co.     |
| B. 77....  | 400      |                |
| R. 37....  | 50       |                |
| C. 16....  | 20       |                |
| Mo....     | 6 10 10  |                |
|            |          | £. 4,476 10 10 |

Mr. Giles.---Looking at these notes, can you state whether these are two of the notes that you paid, in respect of these drafts of Mure and Atkinson, on that day?

Mr. Payne.---They are the same numbers; but it is impossible for me to say that they are the same notes which I entered.

Mr. Giles.---Are they the same letters and sums?

Mr. Payne.---They are the same numbers.

Mr. Giles.---Do not the sums and the letters appear in the waste-book, as you have entered them?

Mr. Payne.---Yes.

Mr. Giles.---Do they correspond with the notes which I have put into your hand?

Mr. Payne.---They correspond with the entry in my hand-writing.

Then Mr. John George Payne was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.---Have you any recollection of the transaction in question, except from the entry in the book before you?

Mr. Payne.---Assuredly not.

Mr. Plumer.---Is that the only book in which there is any entry on this subject, in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Payne.---This is the only book in which there is any entry upon the subject, in my own hand-writing.

Mr. Plumer.---Is there any notice taken in that entry in the book, which is in your own hand-writing, of the draft which you have in your hand?

Mr. Payne.---No.

Mr. Plumer.---Then from the entry alone, could you say that that payment of 4,476*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* comprehended the draft in question, judging from that book alone?

Mr. Payne.---I can have no knowledge from this, that it comprehended this draft.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.---Your lordships had it in evidence yesterday, that two bank notes could not be issued of the same number, the same date, and the same sum.

Mr. Plumer.---There is no date here.

Then the following entry in the banking-book was read:

"June 31, 1783.

Bank-notes, Clifford—2,000*l.*"

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

FIFTH DAY.

Saturday, May 3, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.---Gentlemen, Managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the Lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Whitbread.---My lords, the Commons have to trouble your lordships in the first instance this morning with correcting what appeared to be a confusion, or indeed a mistake, in describing an entry made in the book of one of the bankers whose clerk was summoned before your lordships, with regard to a certain quantity of bank-notes; by which it appeared, that, owing to an error in the entry of the clerk, those bank-notes were not accurately described. Now, I have great satisfaction in informing your lordships, that there is no mistake whatever in the entry; but that the entry as it stands, and as it was read to your lordships in figures, but not as it was explained in language, is perfectly and circumstantially correct.

Your lordships will recollect, that there were certain bank-notes to the amount of 6,000*l.* in notes of 1,000*l.* each, which were tendered to your lordships. Your lordships will also recollect, that when the clerk, in whose hand-writing those bank notes were entered, appeared; in reading the last of them, he read, that they were entered as from 261 to 276. Now, the figures do stand so; but, upon a more strict examination, they do not imply that which the clerk said they did; for the entry stands in figures thus—261; then comes the figure 7, and then the figure 6; which read at length, and without the interpretation given by the clerk, might certainly import that which he stated in his confusion yesterday. But upon a more strict examination, and cool recollection,—for your lordships will easily conceive, that witnesses, before such a tribunal as this, may be flurried,—upon a cool recollection and revision of the entry, it turns out that 261 is the first number of the notes; that the figure 7 denotes, that these bank-notes were from 261 to 267; the figure 6, which he connected with the 7, and thereby read 76, is a figure standing alone, and importing that of those bank-notes there were six; so that 261 to 7 denote the numbers of each note, it is afterwards described by the figure 6 that there were six of them, and then comes the aggregate of 6,000*l.*

To go further, the witness could not tell how one bank-note, namely 265, had been disposed of; but, by turning to another entry in the same book, it will be proved, that the note 265, which was one of the parcel, was paid away to another commercial house a day or two before, of the name of Walpole. The whole entry of bank-notes is thus explained; and I hope so clearly, as not to admit the possibility of a doubt, that these were the bank-notes which were so issued. I am particularly anxious that no mistake should take place; and I own I felt great satisfaction this morning, when I found that the matter could be so explained. I beg to call in Mr. Edgar again.

Then Mr. Daniel Dyke Edgar was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry in that book of the 11th of July, 1783, and read so much of it as is in your own hand-writing.

Mr. Edgar.—“B 261, to 7—6—6,000,” which means 6,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you mean by that, six notes of a thousand pounds each?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you mean that, the number 261, and the figures following that afterwards 6, 7, denote that they are of one series, 261 to 267?

Mr. Edgar.—There is a mistake, for 261 to 7 would make 7 notes. It appears by other books that the numbers paid for this were 261, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7.

Mr. Plumer.—Before the witness speaks of other books, I beg to know whether those other books are in his own hand-writing?

Mr. Edgar.—The note of 1,000*l.* omitted here, is in my own hand-writing.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether those figures 261, with the addition of the figure 7, were not meant to comprehend the notes between 261 and 267?

A Lord.—I cannot help thinking that the question now put is a leading question, and that the witness ought simply to be asked what the figures do mean.

Lord Chancellor.—What do the figures commencing 261, and the figure 7 following that 261, denote?

Mr. Edgar.—They should denote six notes; but they do not.

Lord Chancellor.—What is it that they do denote?

Mr. Edgar.—They denote seven instead of six.

Mr. Whitbread.—How do you account for the seventh note, which you say is there denoted?

Mr. Edgar.—No. B. 265, was not paid with those notes.

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish to refer the witness to another entry in the same book, to account for that note, No. 265.—Have you any entry in your own hand-writing that connects itself with No. 265?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes, the entry is in my own hand-writing.

Mr. Whitbread.—What became of that note?

Mr. Edgar.—It was paid to Walpole and Company, bankers, in Lombard-street.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that 265 also a note of 1,000*l.*?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

Lord Chancellor.—Read as much of that entry as is in your own hand-writing.

Mr. Edgar.—The whole is in my own hand-writing; it is the same date of the 11th of July, 1783; it was for sundry drafts brought in by Walpole and Company, to the amount of 1,661*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* that this 1,000*l.* bank-note was paid.

Then the entry was read, and is as follows:

|                  |       |                   |
|------------------|-------|-------------------|
| K. 981 .....     | £. 10 |                   |
| K. 025 21st June | 100   |                   |
| B. 64 .....      | 500   | £.1,661 5 4 sund. |
| 105 .....        | 50    | WALPOLE.          |
| B. 265 .....     | 1,000 |                   |
| Mo. ....         | 1 5 4 |                   |
|                  |       | £.1,661 5 4       |

Mr. Whitbread.—It is now in proof before your lordships, that this number 265 is accounted for by the payment to Walpole and Company. Now, I wish the witness to refer again to the entry of the 11th July, and then I will put these notes into his hand, and wish he should be asked whether those notes supply the remainder of the seven notes that were so paid out the same day. Do you find number 261, number 264, number 266, number 267, with the letters, corresponding in sums, letters, and numbers with those contained in the entry in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

Then Mr. Daniel Dyke Edgar was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I wish to go back to a question to which the witness did not seem to me to finish his answer—in describing what the mistake is in the first entry of the 11th of July, of which he speaks—I wish the witness would state what that mistake is.

Lord Chancellor.—Proceed to explain the mistake which you said belonged to that first entry.

Mr. Edgar.—By entering the 261 to 7 in this method of entering it is supposed that these are all following numbers, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, but in the entry 5 is not among them.

Lord Chancellor.—Put the notes aside, and confine yourself to the entry as it appears upon the face of it. Look at that entry, and say what is the mistake you have before alluded to upon the face of that entry?

Mr. Edgar.—The mistake lies in 265 not being in this entry. It is usual, when the numbers are running from one to ten, or what not, to put them down one to ten; to call them ten numbers, as those are called six: but the bank-note B. 265, was not certainly paid to this draft; all the rest I have no doubt are right, because they correspond with my entry.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether, judging from the entry alone, without reference to any other entry, or to the notes which you have since been shown, you would not collect from that entry, that there had been seven successive notes, and not six following in progressive numbers? does not the entry import that?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Would it not also import that they were in progressive numbers?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—How came you, yesterday, to represent that the numbers were in a series from 261 to 276; whereas you say now, that the figures seven and six, are not to be considered as seventy-six, but as a 7 and a 6?

Mr. Edgar.—The entry terminates with the figure 7; and that 6 should have had a dot between it, to import 6 thousand pound notes.

Mr. Plumer.—Does it, upon the face of it appear to terminate with 7, or, is that the construction you put upon it to-day, contrary to your construction yesterday?

Mr. Edgar.—There is a distance between the 7 and 6, sufficient to put another figure between; there should have been a dot at the end of the 7; but, in reading it yesterday, I read that 76, whereas it should have terminated at 7, part of the number of the last thousand pound bank-notes, that the 6 here imports six one thousand pound notes.

Mr. Plumer.—If nothing but that entry had been presented to you, without any opportunity of referring to any entry in any other book, or to notes, would you have put the construction upon the entry which you are now giving, or that which you put upon it yesterday?

Mr. Edgar.—I should have supposed, looking upon the entry as it stands, that I had paid the person a thousand pounds too much.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you now mean to state, after all that has passed since you were examined yesterday upon the subject, that any thing that has been shown to you, brings back to your recollection any thing upon the subject, or only that it is by comparing these notes with the entry, that you draw that conclusion from it. Had you any distinct memory of it, beyond that which your entry itself imports?

Mr. Edgar.—No. I could not have answered it, but from reference to the books.

Mr. Plumer.—You have referred to another entry, relative to a sum of 1,661*l*. I desire to know whether that entry imports that there was money or drafts to that amount paid into the house, by Walpole and company, or, that it was paid out of the house?

Mr. Edgar.—It was paid to some clerk of Walpole's, who goes round to receive monies.

Mr. Plumer.—Am I to understand you that that bank-note, B 265, which is one of the notes described in that latter entry, relates to a bank-note that was paid by the house in which you were a clerk, to a clerk in the house of Walpole and Company?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Am I to understand that the first and the second entry relate to two things entirely different; one to notes received, the other to notes paid by your house?

Mr. Edgar.—They are two distinct articles; but they are paid out, one to Walpole, and the other to Mure; the six thousand pound is paid to Mure's draft; the thousand pound note is paid out to Walpole's house.

Mr. Whitbread.—The managers for the Commons feel, that the cross-examination of the learned counsel has so completely established the case, that they have no farther question to ask.

A Lord.—Which of these two entries, being both on the same day, stands first in the book?

Mr. Edgar.—The 1,000*l.* paid to Walpole and Company.

A Lord.—When you said, that looking at your entry only, you would have considered that you had paid a thousand pounds too much, whether you would have come to that conclusion if you had adverted to the figure 6, following the figure 7, and you would have still thought that you had paid a thousand pounds too much; because if it had gone on to 276, you would have paid sixteen notes?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes, if it was stated B 261, it would have made sixteen notes; but there should be a dot at 7; 7 and 6 are not connected in that respect; the 6 only denotes that there were six thousand pound notes paid.

A Lord.—Looking at your entry now, and seeing the 6 following the 7, in the manner that you have explained to us, would you collect from the entry now, that you had paid a thousand pound too much?

Mr. Edgar.—It does appear so upon the entry; to look at it as it stands, I should conclude that I had paid the person a thousand pound too much.

A Lord.—If upon considering your entry, beginning at 261, and ending at figure 7, you might think you had paid a thousand pound too much, whether you would still continue to think so, if you took into consideration the 6 following the 7?

Mr. Edgar.—I still should suppose that I had paid a thousand pound too much, unless I had referred to the books for the number 265.

A Lord.—In looking at your entry from 261, and finding the figure 7; do you find that the figure 6 follows the figure 7, with such an interval, or in any other manner, as enables you to give the explanation which you give of it?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes; the 7 and the 6 stand separate, considerably.

A Lord.—Was it usual, when you entered notes in series, as those notes are in series, for you to make a figure at the end of the series, to denote the number of notes?

Mr. Edgar.—No.

A Lord.—If it was not your usual mode, when you entered notes in series, or when you entered notes in the manner you have stated, to add at the end of it a figure, to denote the number of notes that you had received, or that you had paid; how came you, in this instance, to add the figure 6, after the termination of the series by the figure 7?

Mr. Edgar.—That figure 6 has no connexion with the bank-notes.

A Lord.—You have told the Court you conceive that the figure 6 does denote the number of the bank-notes, and that it has no connexion with the 7, and that the 7 stands properly in its place before the 6, the one being the termination of the notes, and the other to denote the number of notes paid.

Mr. Edgar.—The 6 has no connexion with the number on the bank-notes, or with the number of the notes; it implies that six one thousand pound notes were paid to that draft.

A Lord.—You consider that that figure 6 denotes the number of the notes that were paid?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

A Lord.—How would your entry have stood if you had been aware at the time that you were making it, that the note 265 had in an early part of the day been paid to Walpole?

Mr. Edgar.—It would have stood thus: B 261 to 4, then 6 and 7, and 5 would have been omitted.

A Lord.—Although it was not your practice to express the number of notes, yet if such a circumstance had taken place, in this case would it have been the course to have put the figure 6, to denote the number of notes?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

A Lord.—Can you refer to any other entry in your book that you have here, in which, in consequence of any inaccuracy, which otherwise would be apparent upon the face of the entry, you could have corrected it by the number of notes you received and paid?

Mr. Edgar.—We have a bank-note book here, where the notes appear to be in the house the night before.

A Lord.—Is there in that book, in your hand-writing, any other entry of notes similar in value, and following one another in series, as paid away on any day?

Mr. Edgar.—It would take a great deal of time to look for these numbers to see for any other numbers.

A Lord.—Why, when it was not your practice, as you have stated to the Court, to put at the end of notes following in series, or any how, a figure to denote the number of notes paid away, or that you received, how happened it that in this particular instance you put the figure 6, to denote that six bank-notes had been received?

Mr. Edgar.—I beg pardon of the Court, if I did say so; it is usual to put 5, 6, 8, 10, or whatever the numbers are.

A Lord.—When you pay away the notes, whether you do not intend always so to describe them, as that they should be distinguished from all other notes?

Mr. Edgar.—If they are not in a series of numbers, we always take the numbers down.

A Lord.—But, if they do follow in series, should they not be so described, as that those notes should be distinguished from all other notes?

Mr. Edgar.—It was not the practice of the house to do it in that mode, but to carry them on as here, from 1 to 10, and so on.

A Lord.—What do you consider to be a sufficient description to distinguish one note from another?

Mr. Edgar.—Entering it from No. 1 to 5, or 10, or whatever number it may terminate with.

A Lord.—Do you consider the number of a note to be sufficient to distinguish it from all other notes, without the addition of the date?

Mr. Edgar.—No; it is not sufficient.

A Lord.—Do the dates of those notes appear upon the face of the entry that you have referred to?

Mr. Edgar.—No.

A Lord.—Then if the date be necessary to identify a bank-note, as well as the number, as you have not entered the dates, how do you know that the notes presented to you are identically the same notes that appear in your entry?

Mr. Edgar.—I cannot take upon me to swear that these are the identical notes.

A Lord.—Having looked at and attended to both the entries in your own hand writing, can you take upon you to say from the entry, as it relates to the payment of the notes, beginning 261, that there was a payment of six thousand pounds on that day?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

A Lord.—Can you take upon you to swear that, taking into consideration both the entries?

Mr. Edgar.—I paid six thousand pounds certainly, to this draft of Mure's of six thousand pounds.

A Lord.—Taking both your entries into consideration, you can swear that you paid at the second time B 261, 262, 263, 264, 266, and 267?

Mr. Edgar.—I verily believe that it is so.

A Lord.—The question is, having both the entries before you, can you swear to that fact?

Mr. Edgar.—I can swear that I paid six thousand pounds against the draft of six thousand pounds.

A Lord.—Look at the entry in your book of the payment to Mure and Atkinson; does it not appear, by that entry, that No. 265 was paid to Mure and Atkinson?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes, it does appear so.

A Lord.—Look at the entry in your book of the payment to Walpole; does it not appear, from that entry, that 265 was paid to Walpole?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

A Lord.—Have you any other knowledge of the fact than what you derive from those two entries?

Mr. Edgar.—In the bank-note book, the evening preceding this transaction.

A Lord.—Is that bank-note book you allude to, your own writing?

Mr. Edgar.—No.

A Lord.—Have you, from any other entry in your own hand-writing, or from your own recollection, any knowledge of the fact, but what you derive from those two entries?

Mr. Edgar.—No.

A Lord.—Having stated that the one entry imports that No. 265 was paid to Mure and Atkinson, and that the other entry imports that No. 265 was paid to Walpole, will you take upon yourself to swear in which of those entries the mistake exists?

Mr. Edgar.—It appears to me very clear, that the mistake lies in the entry of the payment made to Mure.

A Lord.—You having stated in your examination to-day, that the evidence which you had given yesterday, with regard to this figure, was founded in mistake; did that mistake occur to yourself, or was it suggested to you by any other person?

Mr. Edgar.—I discovered the mistake yesterday; in looking over the notes, and comparing them with the book, I found it immediately, and I did not know of the mistake before.

A Lord.—Upon looking at the draft which was to be paid to Mure and Atkinson, and looking at the entry which you say was an entry of what was paid, can you take upon you to say, whether six thousand pound, or seven thousand pound was paid?

Mr. Edgar.—Six thousand pound.

A Lord.—Taking all the circumstances which you have been communicating, that you were acquainted with, into consideration, are you satisfied that the explanation you have now given to the House is correct?

Mr. Edgar.—I am satisfied that there was no more paid to the house of Mure and Atkinson than six thousand pound.

A Lord.—You were understood to have sworn yesterday, positively, that these notes were the identical notes which you had paid; you are now called upon to explain how it is, that to-day you say, you cannot give the same evidence, you cannot swear to the identity of the notes?

Mr. Edgar.—I cannot recollect that I swore to the identity of the notes; if I did so, I was wrong; I could not swear to the identity of the notes, having no marks upon them.

A Lord.—Was that entry which refers to a payment of 6,000*l.* made all at one time?

Mr. Edgar.—Yes.

A Lord.—Can you say you have any recollection that you put the figure 6, following the 7, at the conclusion of the series, in order to denote, that, by mistake, the entry would exhibit the payment of a larger sum than you had made.

Mr. Edgar.—It was made at the time.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the witness who made the entry in the bank-note book, is unfortunately dead.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know the hand-writing in that book?

Mr. Edgar.—I do not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Thomas Ryle was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the house of Smith, Payne, and Smith?

Mr. Ryle.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that book you have in your hand?

Mr. Ryle.—A bank-note book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 7th of July, 1783, relating to six bank-notes of a thousand pound each, that were paid out of the house on that day. Is that entry in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Ryle.—No.

Mr. Whitbread.—In whose hand-writing is it?

Mr. Ryle.—William Cunningham's.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is William Cunningham living or dead?

Mr. Ryle.—He is gone abroad; I believe he is dead.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you swear that that is the hand-writing of William Cunningham?

Lord Chancellor.—Have you ever seen William Cunningham write?

Mr. Ryle.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you believe that to be his hand-writing?

Mr. Ryle.—I do.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Your lordships have been long occupied with the evidence relating to the 6,000*l.* which (as we have now shown) was paid on behalf of Mure and Atkinson, to lord Melville's treasurership account at the Bank.

My lords, I shall now call Mr. Callander, to prove, that there was a money connexion between lord Melville and the house of Mure and Atkinson; and I shall give in evidence several drafts drawn by lord Melville upon the house of Mure and Atkinson, which coming out of their custody, must be taken to have been paid by them.

Then Mr. Henry Callander was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Are the papers you hold in your hand, part of the papers of Mure and Atkinson?

Mr. Callander.—They are.

Mr. Giles.—Do you hold them for their assignees?

Mr. Callander.—They are held for their assignees.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any drafts drawn by lord Melville upon the house of Mure and Atkinson?

Mr. Callander.—I hold in my hand a draft dated Edinburgh, drawn by Henry Dundas upon Richard Atkinson; and, I believe it may save trouble if I add, I do not apprehend that any draft of his lordship's was ever drawn upon the house: they are all upon Richard Atkinson.

Mr. Giles.—Was Mr. Atkinson a partner in that house?

Mr. Callander.—Certainly.

Mr. Giles.—Are you acquainted with the hand-writing of lord Melville?

Mr. Callander.—Certainly not.

§

Mr. Plumer.—If the honourable manager will show the drafts to us, we will admit every one that appears to be lord Melville's hand-writing.

Several drafts being admitted by the counsel, they were read, and are as follow:

Ed. 10th Aug. 1781.

"300*l.* Sterling.

P<sup>d</sup> 20th Aug.

Pay to Mr. John Spottiswoode, or order, the sum of three hundred pound sterling, on account of

HENRY DUNDAS.

Richard Atkinson, esq.

London.

(Indorsed)

Received JOHN SPOTTISWOODE.

(Witness) JOHN JOLLY.

Ed. 22nd Nov. 1781.

"300*l.* Sterling.

Pay to Mr. Newbigging, or order, three hundred pounds sterling.

HENRY DUNDAS.

To Richard Atkinson Esquire.

Fenchurch Street.

(Indorsed)

I. NEWBIGGING.

Pay Sir Robert Herries and Co. or order, value in account.

W. FORBES, J. HUNTER, and Co.

Received for Robert Herries and Co.

H. GOLDICOTT.

Ed. 17th January 1782.

"500*l.* Sterling.

Pay to Mr. James Newbigging or order, five hundred pounds sterling.

HENRY DUNDAS.

To Richard Atkinson Esquire.

Fenchurch Street, London.

(Indorsed)

I. NEWBIGGING.

Pay Messieurs Wickenden, Moffatt, and Co. or order, value in account.

W. FORBES, JAMES HUNTER, and Co.

Received,

Wickenden, Moffatt, Kensington, and Boler.

(Witness) J. BEETE."

Ed. 12th Sept. 1782.

"200*l.* Sterling.

Pay to William Bell or order, two hundred pounds sterling, to account of

HENRY DUNDAS.

Richard Atkinson Esquire.

Fenchurch Street London.

(Indorsed)

Pay to Messieurs Mansfield, Ramsay, and Co. or order, value received.

WILL. BELL."

May 22d, 1781.

"Messieurs Smith, Payne, and Smith.

Pay the lord advocate or bearer, three hundred pounds.

MURES, ATKINSON, and MURE.

300*l*.

(Indorsed)

HENRY DUNDAS.

Pay to Thomas Coutts Esquire, and Company, or order, value in account.

MANSFIELD, RAMSAY, and Co.

Received for Thomas Coutts and Co.

J. WILD."

Edin. 19th Sept. 1782.

"On demand, pay to Messrs. Bell and Rannie of Leith, or their order, five hundred pounds sterling.

HENRY DUNDAS.

To Richard Atkinson Esquire,

Fenchurch Street, London.

(Indorsed)

Pay to Messrs. Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, or order, value received,

BELL and RANNIE.

Pay to Thomas Coutts Esquire, and Company, or order, value in account.

MANSFIELD, RAMSAY, and Co.

Received for Thomas Coutts and Co.

J. WILD."

Edin. 23d Sept. 1782.

"300*l*. Sterling.

Pay to William Bell or order, three hundred pounds sterling.

HENRY DUNDAS.

To Richard Atkinson Esquire,

Fenchurch Street, London.

(Indorsed)

Pay to Messrs. Mansfield, Ramsay, and Co. or order, value received.

WILL. BELL.

Pay to Thomas Coutts Esquire, and Company, or order, value in account.

MANSFIELD, RAMSAY, and Co.

Received for Thomas Coutts and Co.

J. WILD."

Edin. 9th Oct. 1782.

"500*l*. Sterling.

Pay to Sir William Forbes, I. Hunter, and Company, five hundred pounds sterling, to account of

HENRY DUNDAS.

To Richard Atkinson Esquire,

Fenchurch Street, London.

(Indorsed)

Pay to the order of Messrs. Wickenden, Moffatt, and Co. value in account.

W. FORBES, J. HUNTER, and Co.

Received for Wickenden, Moffatt, and Co.

G. SCOTT."

VOL. XXIX.

Edin. 14th Oct. 1782.

"500*l*.

On demand, pay to William Bell, or order, the sum of five hundred pounds sterling.

HENRY DUNDAS.

To Richard Atkinson Esquire,
Fenchurch Street, London.

(Indorsed)

Pay to Messrs. Mansfield, Ramsay, and Co. or order, value received.

WILL. BELL.

Pay to Thomas Coutts Esq. and Company, or order, value in account.

MANSFIELD, RAMSAY, and Co.

Received for Thomas Coutts and Co.

J. WILD."

Mr. Giles.—I believe these drafts amount to 3,700*l*.

Then Mr. Henry Callander was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Adam.—At what time did you come into the counting-house of Messieurs Mure and Atkinson?

Mr. Callander.—In the year 1765.

Mr. Adam.—How long did you continue there?

Mr. Callander.—About seven years.

Mr. Adam.—Whether you know, or knew, that there was any intercourse between lord Melville and Mure and Atkinson's house, upon the subject of colonel Dundas, lord Melville's brother?

Mr. Callander.—Not any knowledge whatever.

Mr. Adam.—Do you know the origin of any of those transactions to which these bills relate?

Mr. Callander.—Not in the slightest degree, but from the books of the house.

Mr. Adam.—Your lordships will observe, that the first bill is the 10th of August, 1781, for 300*l*. Is this the first bill that has been submitted to your inspection?

Mr. Callander.—It certainly is.

Mr. Adam.—Did you go to America upon the business of Messieurs Mure and Atkinson?

Mr. Callander.—Yes, in the year 1776.

Mr. Adam.—When did you return from thence?

Mr. Callander.—In the winter of that year.

Mr. Adam.—Did you continue connected in business, or in the knowledge of the business, of Messrs. Mure and Atkinson after that time?

Mr. Callander.—Not otherwise than by the books which I have seen and perused; I was in the habit of corresponding with Mr. Atkinson upon the public business entrusted to his care.

Mr. Adam.—Did you know the circumstances of that mercantile house in 1783?

Mr. Callander.—I certainly think I did.

Mr. Adam.—Was that mercantile house in good credit in 1783?

3 I

Mr. Callandar.—I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that they were.

Mr. Giles.—I must beg to interpose a question here, whether the witness knows any thing of the circumstances of the house, but what he collects from the books?

Mr. Adam.—I submit to your lordships, that the question I put is perfectly regular?

Mr. Giles.—I contend before your lordships that the question I interposed is perfectly right, and that I am entitled to know whether the witness derived his knowledge from that source which renders his evidence legal.

Lord Chancellor.—Solvency is a fact; the question was, whether the house of Mure and Atkinson was, at that time, a house in good credit?

Mr. Callandar.—I believe they were.

Lord Chancellor.—How long did they continue to be a house in good credit?

Mr. Callandar.—For many years subsequent to that period.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—The managers now call back Mr. Oliver, the clerk of Messieurs Drummond. The learned counsel for the defendant, asked him some questions about interest, of which he was to inform himself, and we now call him before your lordships for the purpose of their asking him those questions.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—When did interest first begin to be charged upon lord Melville?

Mr. Oliver.—From the 29th of April, 1784.

Mr. Plumer.—How much was the total of interest charged from that period, down to 1800, without going into the particulars?

Mr. Giles.—I wish it to be understood what the witness is speaking from, when he states the amount of interest.

Lord Chancellor.—From what documents are you now speaking?

Mr. Oliver.—I selected from the ledger the different charges made for interest.

Mr. Giles.—The managers do not object to that being stated, as from the ledger, provided it be understood that the witness is now speaking from the ledger.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any knowledge upon the subject, except what you collect from the books?

Mr. Oliver.—Many of the interest accounts were made out by myself.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you settle those accounts with lord Melville?

Mr. Oliver.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—Were the accounts sent to lord Melville?

Mr. Oliver.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—What do you mean by being made out?

Mr. Oliver.—The calculation upon the sums advanced.

Mr. Plumer.—Calculations in the books?

Mr. Oliver.—Calculations upon paper, of the different advances from period to period, and at the end of each year charges were made.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you speak of calculations made at the time, in the course of your business, as a clerk of that house?

Mr. Oliver.—As a clerk of the house during the time I was in that department.

Mr. Plumer.—You did make a calculation of interest then?

Mr. Oliver.—I did.

Mr. Plumer.—Are those papers upon which you made that calculation of interest now in existence?

Mr. Oliver.—I believe in court, along with the rest of my lord Melville's vouchers.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you delivered that calculation to the solicitor employed by the managers?

Mr. Oliver.—I believe all the calculations were with the vouchers.

Mr. Plumer.—In whose possession are the vouchers and those calculations?

Mr. Oliver.—They were delivered to Mr. Kaye, yesterday morning.

Mr. Giles.—They are here, and will be produced, if the learned counsel wishes for them.

Mr. Plumer.—Then they will speak for themselves.

Mr. Giles.—I desire it may not be understood, that the managers for the Commons admit that these calculations are to be received as evidence, without the production of the books from which the witness took them.

Mr. Plumer.—When those calculations are produced it will be time enough to debate that question.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—It is now proposed to call Mr. Fennell, the accountant of the Navy-pay-office; and it may be necessary to recall the attention of your lordships to the proof which was given yesterday of the difference between the official and the Bank balance on the 30th April 1783, which difference amounted to 23,000*l.* Your lordships will observe that this is an ex-treasurer's balance, for lord Melville has been proved to have been then out of office. He went out on the 11th of April 1783, and on the 30th of that month, the difference between the official and the Bank balance was 23,000*l.* On the part of the Commons, we have by the Bank books proved the payment since that time into the Bank account, of the several sums of 1,000*l.* 5,000*l.* 1,400*l.* 6,000*l.* and of 2,000*l.*, amounting altogether to 15,400*l.*, which being deducted from 23,000*l.*, will still leave a deficiency or difference of 7,600*l.*

Then George Fennell, esq. was again called in and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—What was the balance in the treasurer of the navy's hand on the 31st of July 1783?

Mr. Fennell.—It appears by the certificate books, and the cashier of the victualling's journal.

Mr. Giles.—Are the books you are now about to refer to, public official books in the Navy-pay-office.

Mr. Fennell.—Two of them are, for the navy branch.

Mr. Giles.—Is this one of them?

Mr. Fennell.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—What was the balance on the navy branch?

Mr. Plumer.—What is this book? how is it made? and how are the balances in it ascertained?

Mr. Fennell.—It is the certificate book of the Navy branch, made out by one of the clerks.

Mr. Plumer.—Who is the clerk who made it out?

Mr. Fennell.—The clerk who made out the certificate, was John Slade, jun. at that time.

Mr. Plumer.—Is that gentleman living or not?

Mr. Fennell.—He is living, and now on service at Chatham.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any knowledge upon the subject of the balances, except what you collect from the entries of this John Slade, jun. who is now at Chatham?

Mr. Fennell.—No, none whatever but from those books.

Mr. Plumer.—And how Mr. Slade knew what the balances were that are entered in the book, you do not know?

Mr. Fennell.—Not particularly.

Mr. Plumer.—I understood you to call them certificate books; are not the certificate books signed by the paymaster? and are those books so signed?

Mr. Fennell.—The certificate books are not signed by the paymaster.

Mr. Plumer.—And these are not signed, are they?

Mr. Fennell.—They are not signed by any one.

Mr. Plumer.—Are the certificate books transmitted to the Navy-office?

Mr. Fennell.—No; but copies from them are made out and signed by the paymaster, and sent to the Navy-board.

Mr. Plumer.—This book is not a copy of a certificate book made out and signed by the paymaster?

Mr. Fennell.—No, it is not.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you mean to say that those books signed by the paymaster and sent to the Navy-board are copies of the whole of this book?

Mr. Fennell.—They are certificates, made out generally from the first to the fourteenth of every month, and afterwards from the fifteenth to the end of the month, except in the pay branch in which the accounts are made up monthly, the Navy and Victualling twice a month.

Mr. Plumer.—Do the certificates so signed by the paymaster, contain every entry to be found in that book?

Mr. Fennell.—They do, and should generally, except the memoranda of the balances.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether those books, which are transmitted to the Navy-office by the paymaster, are previously examined and checked by the paymaster?

Mr. Fennell.—I can only say, I suppose they are.

Mr. Plumer.—Are these so?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot speak positively to that.

Mr. Plumer.—When you spoke of balances on a former day, was it collected entirely from the book before you, or had you any other means of knowledge of the balances?

Mr. Fennell.—I spoke from the book before me.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it this same book?

Mr. Fennell.—This book, and a book of a similar nature.

Mr. Plumer.—Not a book made by yourself?

Mr. Fennell.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—Not signed by any body?

Mr. Fennell.—Not signed by any body.

Mr. Plumer.—Not examined by any body?

Mr. Fennell.—That I cannot speak to.

Mr. Plumer.—And those were the materials from which you swore to the balances on a former day?

Lord Chancellor.—Had you any other materials from which you spoke?

Mr. Fennell.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it in your own office and department?

Mr. Fennell.—It is in my office to have these books under my custody.

Mr. Plumer.—Is the business, to which the entries relate, done in your department?

Mr. Fennell.—They were made in a separate branch of the office.

Mr. Plumer.—Not in the accountant's branch?

Mr. Fennell.—There was no accountant's branch at that period.

Mr. Plumer.—Were you employed officially in any one of the branches to which the entries relate?

Mr. Fennell.—I was.

Mr. Plumer.—In which?

Mr. Fennell.—I was employed in one of the branches, but not in making up the certificates.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you in stating the balances, speak from books which you were not concerned in making up?

Mr. Fennell.—I was not concerned in making them up.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any knowledge whatever on the subject of these balances, except what you collected from the books?

Mr. Fennell.—None.

Mr. Giles.—Was the book you have in your hand, one of the public office books, during the treasurership of lord Melville?

Mr. Fennell.—It was.

Mr. Giles.—Have you made out the accounts of lord Melville's treasurership, from that book, and others of the same description?

Mr. Fennell.—They are made out from this book, and others of a similar description.

Mr. Giles.—Without going into any further evidence, the managers on the part of the Commons contend before your lordships that these books are evidence against lord Melville, as being the public office books of his treasurership.

Lord Chancellor.—Are you aware the witness has said, that the book in question, from which you propose to ask him the amount of the treasurer's balance, upon the 31st of July, 1783, is in the hand-writing of John Slade, jun. who now is at Chatham? that there is a copy of the same book, which has been made out and signed by the paymaster, and transmitted by him to the Navy-board? yet you do not produce that book, signed by the paymaster, nor call the clerk, though he be living, who made that entry.

Mr. Giles.—We do not produce the certificate transmitted to the Navy-office, because we conceive we should then be producing the copy of this entry.

Lord Chancellor.—Signed by the paymaster, the deputy of lord Melville?

Mr. Giles.—Yes, my lord, signed by the paymaster, not as the original document, but for the purpose of communicating certain information to the Navy-board, and therefore, not being an entire copy of this book. There are certain parts of this book, of which the treasurer of the navy must inform the Navy-board; and the certificate of the paymaster is made, in order to communicate that information. The certificate is prepared by copying a part, but not the whole of this book, and it is then transmitted to the Navy-board, with the paymaster's signature, for the information of that board. But I contend that this, which is the original official book, kept in the Navy-pay-office, by officers appointed by and under the control of lord Melville, is as much evidence against lord Melville, as the books of every merchant in the city are evidence against him, though kept by his clerks, and not proved to have been inspected by him. Could it be contended, that the books of such merchant would not be evidence against him, because the clerk, who made the entry, was living, and not produced? If I show it to be the book of the merchant, kept by his authority, it is sufficient to entitle me to read it against him. Here I prove this to be an official book, kept in lord Melville's office by his clerks, and an original document. I contend, therefore, that this book is evidence, and I insist upon it, not from the difficulty of supplying other evidence (because I know I can prove the fact by other means), but for the sake of establishing the general rule, that those public books, which are kept in the Navy-pay office, by a clerk appointed by, or acting under lord Melville, are evidence against him, without either calling or proving the hand-writing of that clerk, but merely producing the book, and proving it to be one of the public documents, so kept in the office which lord Melville superintended. The point appears to me perfectly clear; and I cannot illustrate it better than by reference to the common case of a merchant, whose books are kept by his clerks; and there can be nothing more settled, than that such books would be evidence against him.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—It is extremely important, that your lordships should decide this point; namely, whether these books are now to be received in evidence, because the book, to which your lordship has referred, will not so completely answer the purposes of justice, as those now offered: the managers are therefore driven to take your lordships judgment, whether these books now presented are not the proper books your lordships should proceed upon. I humbly conceive that, upon consideration, your lordships will see that these are the proper books; and for this plain reason, because the others are, in point of fact, copies made from these books: these are the original books; and if any books are received as evidence, they must be original books, and not copies.

It has been suggested, that the person who made these books, Mr. Slade, is not here: I conceive that the character of these books does not render it necessary that the person who made them should be called: if that were so, books from the public offices could scarcely ever be produced. In a variety of cases, it may be necessary to produce office books, after the entries are made, which those books contain, I think it can scarcely be contended, much less decided, that your lordships would not receive office books, after the death of the persons by whom the entries in those books were made. I have always understood,—and I state it with deference to your lordships much better judgment,—that books kept in public offices are evidence; books kept in offices of less importance, the books of the Bank would be received without calling the clerks, by whom the entries were made, because those are public books, and it is necessary to keep them for a length of time, longer than the persons can live who made the entries. But there is another ground upon which I conceive it impossible the learned counsel for the defendant can contend, that these books are not to be received. It was stated by the witness, in answer to a question of your lordship's, that the accounts of lord Melville are made up from these books; then lord Melville, by signing those accounts, has given credit to these books, and made them, as I conceive, evidence in any court against himself.

Upon these two grounds; in the first place, that these being the books of a public office, bear with them a character derived from that circumstance, which makes them evidence in any court; and secondly, that these books having furnished the materials, from which the account of the noble defendant has been made up, he has by that account given them credit;—I trust your lordships will receive them. If the copies should be presented to your lordships, they will want one material circumstance which these possess, that, in these books, balances are struck. We propose to show your lordships the ascertained balances, and they cannot be proved from the books to which your lordships have referred.

Mr. Solicitor General.—My lords, I shall add but very few words to what your lordships have already heard; and I should not indeed trespass upon your lordships' time, for a single moment, if it were not on account of the extreme importance of the question which is now brought before you.

My lords, if these public books, of a public office, are not to be received as evidence in a court of justice, the necessary consequence must be, that it will never be possible, either to convict a public officer of misconduct in his office, or to charge him civilly with sums which he has received. The Commons conceive, not only that the evidence offered to your lordships is proper, but that it is the best evidence that could be given; that the certificates, as they have been called, or rather the extracts, written out and signed by the paymaster, are an inferior kind of evidence, and ought not to be admitted by your lordships, if the originals can be, as in this case they are, produced. The books offered, are books kept in the office, by the proper officer. I do not say they are conclusive evidence, because, undoubtedly, a person attempted to be charged upon the evidence of these books, may, if possessed of the means of doing it, show that there is some error in them; but these books are kept for no purpose but that of showing what is the state of the public money paid into the office; what are the receipts, what the payments, and what the balances, at certain times: those are the only purposes for which they are kept.

With respect to the certificates, which your lordship has heard are signed by the paymaster, they are in truth copies or extracts, taken from these books and sent to the Navy-board; they are signed, not for the purpose of giving authenticity to them as originals, but, for the mere purpose of ascertaining, that they are true and accurate copies or extracts from those public documents, the books which are now offered in evidence. If your lordships were to receive those extracts in preference to the evidence now before you, you must decide that a copy of a public record is evidence of a superior nature to the record itself.

With respect to the objection that Mr. Slade is not produced as a witness, we have proved that he was the proper officer to make the entries, and we have proved that the entries were made by him; and I have never understood that it was necessary, in order to prove the hand-writing of a party, that you should call him, himself, as a witness; but, on the contrary, that the proper medium of proof was the testimony of some other person, acquainted with his hand-writing. If we were to call Mr. Slade, it would be to show that these entries were made by him, in the execution of the duty imposed on him as a public officer. Have we not done that already, by showing that he was a public officer, and that the entries were made by him? In addition to all that we have shown that lord Melville's accounts, as treasurer, were made up from these books; that he has himself adopted them; that he has made them his own books; that he has stated his own accounts from them; and after all this, can it possibly be contended, that the evidence ought not to be received? I will not add a word more upon the subject, and indeed I feel that I ought rather to apologise to your lordships, for having said so much, than for not saying more.

Lord Chancellor.—What is that book?

Mr. Fennell.—It is called the certificate book for the Navy-branch.

Lord Chancellor.—Who appoints Mr. Slade?

Mr. Fennell.—The treasurer of the navy.

Lord Chancellor.—Who appointed Mr. Slade in this instance?

Mr. Fennell.—I believe he was appointed to the office prior to the treasurership of lord Melville.

Lord Chancellor.—Was he continued by lord Melville?

Mr. Fennell.—Certainly.

Lord Chancellor.—Does the paymaster of the treasurer of the navy, when he is furnished with a copy of that book which you have in your hand, from time to time sign it, and transmit it to the Navy-board?

Mr. Fennell.—He does.

Lord Chancellor.—Is there in the Navy-office at this time any such copy so signed by the paymaster?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot speak certainly, but I believe there is.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you mean that the paymaster signs a copy of that book, or only certificates that are extracted from that book for his signature?

Mr. Fennell.—To the best of my knowledge and belief it is an exact copy, except the memoranda, at the foot of each, which regards the balances.

Lord Chancellor.—The balances are constituted by casting up the book, are they not?

Mr. Fennell.—The general balance is struck on the book, and the memoranda divides it into different parts.

Lord Chancellor.—Does the paymaster sign any balance which is copied from that book into the other book sent to him?

Mr. Fennell.—The general balance he does.

Mr. Giles.—Will your lordships permit the witness to read for your information (not as evidence) that part of the book which is not copied?

Mr. Fennell.—I have before me the certificate between the first and thirty-first of July 1783, in lord Melville's first treasurership. In the Navy-branch the balance appears to be 16,734*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.* the memoranda at the foot is "whereof in Bank 7,201*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* money, and premiums 18*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*;—in Mr. Slade's hands 5,515*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* Exchequer fees 3,999*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*" making together the general balance I have just read.

Lord Chancellor.—When the paymaster has transmitted to him a copy of that which you have been now reading, does he subscribe that general balance?

Mr. Fennell.—He does.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know whether in this instance he did so?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot speak to this particular instance, it is in the course of office so to do.

Mr. Giles.—I believe the witness has misunderstood; that which the witness has last read is not that which is copied.

Lord Chancellor.—Is that which you have last read any part of the certificate that is transmitted to the paymaster for his signature?

Mr. Fennell.—No.

A Lord.—Is that memoranda any thing more or less than the result of what you before stated?

Mr. Fennell.—It is the particular disposition of the general balance.

A Lord.—What were the duties of the office of Mr. Slade?

Mr. Fennell.—He was a clerk in the Navy-branch.

A Lord.—What are the duties of a clerk in the Navy-branch?

Mr. Fennell.—They are various.

A Lord.—For what purpose was that account, you have now in your hands, kept by Mr. Slade?

Mr. Fennell.—It is the treasurer's cash account, the account of receipts and payments.

A Lord.—Is that account kept for the purpose of enabling the paymaster to certify to the other branch?

Mr. Fennell.—Certainly.

A Lord.—How often are these certificates transmitted from the treasurer to the Navy-office?

Mr. Fennell.—For the Navy and Victualling branches, they are transmitted twice a month; for the Pay-branch, once a month.

A Lord.—Is that the book from which extracts are made, for the information of the particular departments?

Mr. Fennell.—This book contains the particulars transmitted to the Navy-board for their information.

A Lord.—And these accounts contain accounts from time to time, being parts only, as I understand you, of that general entire account?

Mr. Fennell.—The parts of a general account.

A Lord.—Was any other clerk, but Mr. Slade, employed to make out certificates?

Mr. Fennell.—The certificates are written by other clerks, besides Mr. Slade, in this book?

Mr. Plumer.—Will your lordships permit me to ask a question? Whether the particulars, making up the general balances, constitute a part of the account, made out to be signed by the paymaster, and sent to the navy-board?

Mr. Fennell.—They do not.

Mr. Plumer.—Then these do not form any part of the account sent to the treasurer and paymaster?

Mr. Fennell.—They do not.

Mr. Plumer.—The paymaster's certificate, which is transmitted twice in a month, does it contain all the accounts up to the time when it is sent?

Mr. Fennell.—It does.

A Lord.—Except the memoranda of the balances?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes; except the memoranda of the balances, as I before stated.

A Lord.—From what materials in the office does Mr. Slade make up that book, and strike those balances?

Mr. Fennell.—I apprehend from materials furnished him by the chief clerk in the office, who pays bills and receives money, and also by the gentleman who attends the Exchequer receipts.

A Lord.—Is there kept, in the office, any copy of that certificate which is transmitted by the treasurer to the Navy-office?

Mr. Fennell.—None other but this book.

A Lord.—If you had occasion to turn to any items in the account, should you refer to that book, which lies before you as the original, or to those other certificates you have before stated?

Mr. Fennell.—To this book.

A Lord.—Supposing any accident were to happen to that book, now before you, in what manner could the account be supplied?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not know any other way, than by obtaining copies from the accounts transmitted to the navy board; that would be the most simple way; there may be other materials in the office, from which an account might be made, but that I cannot speak positively to.

A Lord.—When there is a necessity, from time to time, to make up the treasurer's account, what materials are to be found in this book for that purpose?

Mr. Fennell.—The receipts and the general payments.

A Lord.—Are those materials, exclusive of the memoranda, containing the particulars of the balances?

Mr. Fennell.—They are exclusive of the memoranda of the particulars of the balances?

A Lord.—Are the memoranda of those particulars resorted to and collected from the book?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes, in making up the treasurer's account.

A Lord.—It has been stated that these certificates are made up from the book; whose business is it to make up those certificates?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not know that it has been the particular business of any one gentleman, or clerk, in the navy and pay branches; but I know that for these thirty years past, it has been the custom in the victualling branch, for the chief clerk in that branch to make up the certificate.

A Lord.—Is the certificate made up by the same person who keeps the book? If it should happen that in making the transcript, which the certificate purports to be, of a part of the entry, it should be found there was an error in the book in making the calculation, would that error be copied in the certificate, or the certificate be made out correctly?

Mr. Fennell.—The copy from the beginning would be examined with it, I conceive; and if there was any error, it would be corrected.

A Lord.—If an error was discovered in the making the transcript, and that error was not copied in the certificate, but the certificate was made correct, would that correction be made in the book, so as to make it tally with the certificate?

Mr. Fennell.—I apprehend it would.

A Lord.—Whose duty would it be to compare the book, for the purpose of that correction being made?

Mr. Fennell.—I apprehend the gentleman who made out the particular branch, and his principal.

A Lord.—You cannot speak with any certainty, whether it is ascertained that, in all cases, the certificate is an exact transcript of the book itself?

Mr. Fennell.—It is the course of office, that it should be an exact transcript, except the memoranda before mentioned.

A Lord.—If the certificate contained any mistake in making that transcript, might not that mistake be set right, by resorting to those books which you call Office-books?

Mr. Fennell.—It would.

A Lord.—I submit to your lordships, that the managers may proceed.

Lord Chancellor.—The counsel for lord Melville have a right to answer the observations of the managers, if, after the explanation which has been given, they still think it their duty to the noble lord to resist this evidence.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to be permitted to put a question to the witness.

A Lord.—The regular way would be for the learned counsel to suggest the question to any peer.

A Lord.—The question is this—whether the paymaster has not materials of his own, by which he can make out the certificate, and correct this book, if this book is not sufficient material for him for that purpose?

Mr. Fennell.—The paymaster, I conceive, has an account; of his own balances certainly he must have, and his own balances with those of the sub-accountants, must make a general balance, which he signs to.

A Lord.—Are those materials of such a nature, that he might make out the account which he certifies, without having resort to that book?

Mr. Fennell.—He could not, without the assistance of the different pay clerks.

A Lord.—With that assistance, could he make out the accounts which he transmits, and certifies, without having recourse to that book?

Mr. Fennell.—I think he could.

A Lord.—Do you know of any instance of any account transmitted to the Navy-office, that does not proceed upon that book now before you for its foundation?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not.

Lord Chancellor.—Mr. Plumer, you may now be heard, if, after all this explanation, you are of opinion this evidence can be resisted.

Mr. Plumer.—From the way in which that is put to me, I should conceive that I shall not be considered to neglect the duty I owe to the noble lord, the defendant, if I forbear giving your lordships any farther trouble upon the subject.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, managers for the House of Commons, you may proceed.

Mr. Giles.—I call Mr. Fennell for the purpose of showing, that the difference between the official and the Bank balance, on the 31st July, 1783, was 7,600*l.* being 15,400*l.* less than the 23,000*l.* which we proved to have been the difference, on the 30th of April preceding. Of what branch have you now got the certificate book before you.

Mr. Fennell.—The Navy branch.

Mr. Giles.—What was the treasurer's balance in that branch, as it appears on the book, on the 31st July, 1783?

Mr. Fennell.—7,201*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—The book now is the evidence, and not the testimony of the witness; and therefore I beg he will read the entry himself, in order that your lordships may know what it is.

Lord Chancellor.—Read the entry to which you are referring.

Mr. Fennell.—It is called "in Bank."

Mr. Plumer.—The witness is going to read, not that which I understand your lordships to have decided to be evidence, namely, the entries of receipts and payments in the book, but the memoranda which are taken from other entries in the book. I beg to know from whence those memoranda are taken.

Lord Chancellor.—From whence are those memoranda taken?

Mr. Fennell.—They can be taken no other-wise than from the information of the different accountants, including the paymaster.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it from verbal or from written information, from the sub-accountants and the paymaster, that those balances are put down?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot speak distinctly to that.

Mr. Plumer.—Do not you know that each sub-accountant keeps a book containing his receipts and payments?

Mr. Fennell.—He does keep a book.

Mr. Plumer.—Does the paymaster likewise?

Mr. Fennell.—I apprehend he does; he must, in fact.

Mr. Plumer.—Must not each of these subdivisions that constitute these memoranda be entered in the books of the paymaster and the other sub-accountants?

Mr. Fennell.—I apprehend they must appear in their separate books.

Mr. Plumer.—Are not those the books from whence those separate memoranda are taken?

Mr. Fennell.—I apprehend they are.

Lord Chancellor.—Is it the course of office to enter all those memoranda in that book?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes, it has been the custom of the office to enter the memoranda at the foot of each certificate for each branch.

Mr. Plumer.—May I be permitted to ask respecting these memoranda, whether there is not a distinction?—Your lordships will find, there are now in existence different books, kept by each subordinate officer, in which is contained an account of his receipts and payments. There is a book, therefore, in the possession of each subordinate officer, from which it will be known, at any one period, what is the balance in his hand. Each of these books contains an original and true account, which is the result of the balances, and is therefore clearly the best evidence, being kept by the person whose department it is, who knows the fact, and has made the entry in his own book upon the subject. Now the utmost that this book, lying before the witness, can amount to is this: it is nothing but a copy from other books, made by this clerk in office, which other books are the official and proper books, that represent the balance in the hands of each individual. It appears to me, with great submission, that the most correct and the best evidence, as to what balance each individual had in his hands at any time, is the official account such individual kept at that time; and not that secondary intelligence which any other clerk in the office has derived from the former, and which at most is only second-hand information, and derivative knowledge from the principal in whose department that business lies.

Mr. Adam.—Will your lordships permit me to state the manner in which I understand his? and if the statement is not satisfactory,

I will not trouble your lordships with any argument upon it. Your lordships observe, that this account contains receipts and disbursements; that there is a general balance struck, which amounts to sixteen thousand and odd pounds; that general balance so struck, constitutes the whole of the account; but there is, at the bottom of the account, under the word "whereof," a distribution of that general balance into different parts. The first head of that distribution is, Money to the Bank—the second head is, Small Payments—the third head is, Mr. Slade's Balance—and the fourth head is, Exchequer Fees. Now, this subdivision of the balance is not taken by an application to the Bank, because, upon the occasion, the sub-accountants are asked what their balances are—they give their balances from their own books; and in this case, the balance given in by Mr. Slade is 5,500*l*. Now, if that balance is erroneous, and less, that will swell the balance at the Bank—if it is more, it will diminish the balance at the Bank. The use that is meant to be made of this book is, not merely to give in evidence the general balance; but the object is, to give in evidence the minute parts of which this balance is composed. And we submit, that although the best evidence, which the nature of the thing will admit of, with regard to the general balance, is this book, against the admission of which we do not now contend, yet that it is not the best evidence with respect to the component parts of the general balance; but that you must have recourse to the books of the sub-accountants, from which this statement is taken. If there is any thing in that objection, it will have its proper weight with your lordships.

A Lord.—If it shall appear to your lordships, that the arguments of the counsel shape themselves against the conclusiveness of this book, and not against its admissibility, I think the managers might proceed.

Lord Chancellor.—If lord Melville's counsel still think, after what has been said by the witness, that they can shake the admissibility of this book, they have most undoubtedly a right to be heard upon that point before your lordships come to any decision; but I should rather suggest to them, whether, upon reconsidering the matter, they would press for a decision?

Mr. Plumer.—Certainly I will not give your lordships any farther trouble. Does there appear any date annexed to the balance in the Bank?

Mr. Fennell.—It purports to be the balance in the Bank on the 31st July, 1783.

Mr. Plumer.—There is no date to the entry, I believe.

Lord Chancellor.—Read the entry itself.

Mr. Fennell.—"Between the 1st and 31st July, 1783."

Mr. Plumer.—The date at the top of the receipts is between the 1st and 31st of July; but there are among the receipts and payments different dates given, and, at the foot of the account, the balance is stated without any date to that balance.

Lord Chancellor.—Is that entered in the ordinary official course, ending consequently with the last date?

Mr. Fennell.—It is.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether there is not a posterior date in the same page—the date of September, 1783?

Mr. Fennell.—There is, but I have but this moment observed it. I apprehend that is an error in the date.

Mr. Plumer.—What is that posterior date that you apprehend to be an error? and why do you apprehend it to be so?

Mr. Fennell.—It is the 10th of September, which is certainly subsequent to the 31st of July, on which day the account purports to end.—“10th September, 1783. By issue to the paymaster to carry on payments and recalls, 10,000*l*.”

Mr. Plumer.—To whom should that have been issued?

Mr. Fennell.—The chief clerk of the Pay branch would have paid that.

Mr. Plumer.—Would it not have appeared from the book of the chief clerk of the Pay branch, whether that was accurate or not? Must not that have been taken from the book of the chief clerk of the Pay branch?

Mr. Fennell.—No, it is not.

Mr. Plumer.—From what is that taken?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot speak precisely what kind of memorandum is given to the clerk who makes out this certificate.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish the witness to read the next entry.

Mr. Fennell.—The next entry is the 22nd.

Mr. Plumer.—The 22nd of what month?

Mr. Fennell.—As it stands here, it appears the 22nd of September, 1783.

Mr. Plumer.—What is that entry?

Mr. Fennell.—“By issue to the paymaster, to carry on payments and recalls, 10,000*l*.”

A Lord.—I wish that the whole page may be read.

Another Lord.—And after that is read, I should wish that the first item in the next page may be read.

Lord Chancellor.—Read that page first, and then the other.

Then the whole of the entries in that page of the book were read, and are as follow :

|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  |         |       |  |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--|--|---------|-------|--|
| " 31st July, 1783. Dr. Between 1st and 31st July, 1783, viz.                                                                                                                                   |  |  |         |       |  |
| To balance of the preceding account, dated 30th June, 1783.....                                                                                                                                |  |  |         |       |  |
| 1783, July 10. To received of the treasurer of the navy, to carry onrecalls in this treasurership.....                                                                                     |  |  | £.      | s. d. |  |
| 22. To received of ditto to ditto .....                                                                                                                                                        |  |  | 26,929  | 13 9  |  |
| 31. To abatements made and bills taken in towardsclearing the following interests, viz.                                                                                                    |  |  | 10,000  | 0 0   |  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  | 10,000  | 0 0   |  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  |         |       |  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  | 17,193  | 10 0  |  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  |         |       |  |
| Lieut. R. Gillingham                                                                                                                                                                           |  |  | £.      | s. d. |  |
| W.A.Brandrith                                                                                                                                                                                  |  |  | 1,071   | 4 11  |  |
| P. Stuart                                                                                                                                                                                      |  |  | 1,080   | 0 0   |  |
| W. Haygarth                                                                                                                                                                                    |  |  | 639     | 11 4  |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 50      | 0 0   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 450     | 0 0   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 200     | 0 0   |  |
| William Williams, in the pre-sent treasurership .....                                                                                                                                      |  |  | 600     | 0 0   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 900     | 0 0   |  |
| Thomas Roberts, in the presenttreasurership .....                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 74      | 6 4   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 711     | 4 1   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 270     | 0 0   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 25      | 0 0   |  |
| Captain William Lloyd, in the presenttreasurership .....                                                                                                                                   |  |  | 12      | 7 7   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 127     | 2 5   |  |
| Captain William Cumming .... ditto                                                                                                                                                             |  |  | 865     | 3 3   |  |
| Ditto                                                                                                                                                                                          |  |  | 134     | 16 9  |  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  |         |       |  |
| To received of Mr. Watson, for rope supplied hisbrigantine Aurora, in distress, by the boatswainof his majesty's ship Minerva, as per board's let-ter of the 31st March, 1783..... |  |  | 7,210   | 16 8  |  |
| To cash received towards clearing Captain HenryLloyd's imprests .....                                                                                                                      |  |  | 12 17 7 |       |  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  | 5 9 11  |       |  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                |  |  | 54,158  | 17 11 |  |

|                                                                                 |        |       |     |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|-------|-----|
| By perfect bills paidas per list of parti-culars .....                  | £.     | s. d. | Cr. |
| Imprest ditto, paidas per ditto .....                                       | 1,497  | 5 2   |     |
|                                                                                 | 17,193 | 10 0  |     |
|                                                                                 |        |       |     |
| 1783. By perfect bills sick and hurt, paidas per ditto.....                 | 230    | 13 10 |     |
|                                                                                 |        |       |     |
| Sept. 10. By issued to the paymaster, to carryon payments and recalls ..... | 10,000 | 0 0   |     |
|                                                                                 |        |       |     |
| 22. By issued ditto to carry on ditto ..                                        | 10,000 | 0 0   |     |
|                                                                                 |        |       |     |
|                                                                                 | 37,424 | 3 10  |     |
|                                                                                 | 16,734 | 14 1  |     |
|                                                                                 | 54,158 | 17 11 |     |
|                                                                                 |        |       |     |
| Whereof,                                                                        | £.     | s. d. |     |
| In Bank .....                                                                   | 7,201  | 7 11  |     |
| Money and premiums                                                              | 18     | 7 6   |     |
| Mr. Slade's hands ..                                                            | 5,513  | 13 1  |     |
| Exchequer fees ....                                                             | 3,999  | 5 7   |     |
|                                                                                 | 16,734 | 14 1  |     |

Then the witness read the first item of the next page, 31st July, 1783, as follows,
"7,201*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*"

A Lord.—The reason why I desired the first item, in the second page, to be read, was this, that your lordships find the preceding account consisted of sums of money, one as low as the 22nd of September. Your lordships will find the next balance carried forward, the same sum, but carried forward as upon the 31st July.

A Lord.—Can you account for the circumstance of the accounts having been kept in this manner, in the months of July and August?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot account for the entry of the account I have just read, except an error. It is manifest to me that it is an error, because I read two sums on the debit side of the treasurer of this account, for July 1783, as money received of the treasurer of the navy, 10,000*l.* each, which answers to the 10,000*l.* on the other side, dated in September. They should have been, as I conceive, dated exactly on the same day, the month only is altered.

A Lord.—How soon after the period, when the account purports to bear date, is it made out? for instance, how soon after the 31st July, would that account in the course of office have been made up?

Mr. Fennell.—In the course of office, certainly, before there was another certificate day; that is before the 14th of the following month.

A Lord.—Read the two sums on the credit side, which correspond with the two sums on the debtor side.

The witness read from the book last delivered in, the following entries:

| Dr.                                                                                                               |                | Cr.                                                                                                 |                |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------|
| July 10, Received ofthe Treasurer ofthe Navy to car-ry on Recalls inthis Treasurer-ship ..... | } £.10,000 | Sept. 10, By is-sue to the Pay-master to car-ry on Pay-ments and Re-calls ..... | } £.10,000 |
| 22nd.—The same sum to the same purpose.                                                                           |                |                                                                                                     |                |

Mr. Giles.—What is the meaning of the words, "in Bank?" Does it mean in the hands of the treasurer?

Mr. Fennell.—It is the mode in this branch of expressing the treasurer's balance.

Mr. Giles.—What was the balance in the Pay-branch, on the 31st of July, 1783?

Mr. Fennell.—56*l.* paymaster's or treasurer's balance—172*l.* 0*s.* 3½*d.* Mr. Jellicoe's. 403*l.* 5*s.* 9½*d.* Mr. Taylor's.—6,571*l.* 9*s.* 10½*d.* Mr. Lynch's.—4,723*l.* 16*s.* 5½*d.* Mr. Malpas'.—making together 11,926*l.* 12*s.* 4½*d.*

Mr. Giles.—Now refer to the Victualling-branch.

Mr. Fennell.—The balance for the Victualling branch, to the 31st July, 1783, is not made up.

Mr. Giles.—What book is that you have before you?

Mr. Fennell.—The certificate book for the Victualling-branch.

Mr. Giles.—Does the aggregate balance appear by that book?

Mr. Fennell.—From the 1st July only, to the 30th September, 1783. It being an ex-treasurership account, it is not made up monthly.

Mr. Giles.—This is an ex-treasurership account, and when the account is become so they usually make up the balances once in three months. They made up the account of the Navy, and the Pay branches on the 31st July: but the Victualling-branch was not made up till the end of the quarter in September. I will now call the chief clerk of the Victualling-branch who will state what the balance was at the Bank on the 31st July, 1783.

Mr. Plumer.—You have said the balance for that month is not made up, is the balance made up for the succeeding month?

Mr. Fennell.—No; not in this book.

Mr. Plumer.—Are any balances made up in that book for the Victualling-branch?

Mr. Fennell.—None between the 1st July and the 30th September.

Mr. Plumer.—Should the balances be made up monthly, according to the course of the office?

Mr. Fennell.—It has not been customary to do so when the treasurership becomes an ex-treasurership.

Mr. Plumer.—Is there any distinction of that kind in the accounts as they refer to the Victualling-branch? they do not appear to be unfinished in the other branches?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not know the reason why they are not made parallel to each other.

Mr. Plumer.—As they are made up in the other two branches, can you state why they are not made up in this particular branch?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot state the reason why they are not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then George Swaffield, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Were you chief cashier of the Victualling-branch of the Navy-pay-office, in the month of July, 1783?

Mr. Swaffield.—I was.

Mr. Giles.—What was the treasurer's balance, in that branch on the 31st July, 1783?

Mr. Swaffield.—There was no account made up for that month.

Mr. Giles.—Can you, by reference to your journal, ascertain the balance on that day?

Mr. Swaffield.—No.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any book with you, by reference to which you can ascertain the balance on that day?

Mr. Swaffield.—I cannot.

Mr. Giles.—What was the balance the last day of June, 1783?

Mr. Swaffield.—At the end of June the last balance was in the whole 20,045*l.* 8*s.* 10½*d.*

Mr. Giles.—What proportion of that sum was the balance of the treasurer?

Mr. Swaffield.—9,351*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. Giles.—Can you, by referring to your journal, and looking at your receipts and payments in July, state what the balance was on the last day of July?

Mr. Swaffield.—I cannot.

Mr. Giles.—Can you, by reference to your journal, state what sum you received in the month of July, on account of the treasurer?

Mr. Swaffield.—On the 11th of July, I received 1,400*l.*, and on the 12th of the same month I received of him 5,600*l.*

Mr. Giles.—If these two sums are deducted will that make the treasurer's balance on the 31st July?

Mr. Swaffield.—It will.

Mr. Giles.—What will that make the treasurer's balance at that period?

Mr. Swaffield.—It will make the treasurer's balance on the 31st of July, 2,351*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*

Then George Swaffield, esq. was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Adam.—Whether, in making out the balances there have not frequently been errors which have been a considerable time existing before they have been detected?

Mr. Swaffield.—Not at this time that I recollect.

Mr. Adam.—At any other time?

Mr. Swaffield.—Yes, since I was under the necessity of keeping my money at two banks, part in the Bank of England, and part in the bank of Coutts and Co. I charged myself on one occasion with 5,000*l.*, which, in fact, I had not received from the treasurer.

Mr. Adam.—How long have you been in the office?

Mr. Swaffield.—I have been in the office sixty years.

Mr. Adam.—Were you in the office at the time Mr. Grenville was paymaster?

Mr. Swaffield.—I was.

A Lord.—Do you know of any other error than that which you pointed out just now?

Mr. Swaffield.—No other but one of the same kind. By having balances at two bankers, I upon another occasion charged myself with 10,000*l.* more than I received from the treasurer of the navy.

A Lord.—Were these errors soon afterwards rectified?

Mr. Swaffield.—I believe, in one of them, it was near twelve months before I discovered where the error was.

A Lord.—Are both these errors rectified?

Mr. Swaffield.—They are.

Mr. Giles.—Your lordships now have as the office balance of the treasurer, on the 31st of July 1783,—7,201*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* in the Navy-branch, 36*l.* in the Pay-branch, and 2,351*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* in the Victualling-branch,—making a total of 9,608*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* for the official balance.

I shall now show your lordships by the banking book which is already in evidence, that the Bank balance of the treasurer on the 31st of July 1783, was only 2,008*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* being 7,600*l.* less than his official balance.

The following entry was read from lord Melville's banking-book, denominated "Old Account.—1783, 31 July, By balance to New Account 2,008*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—The difference then between the balances your lordships see was 7,600*l.* in July, it having been 23,000*l.* in April. I have proved the payments of sums amounting to 15,400*l.* into the Bank, by which the difference between the balances was so reduced, and having in part ascertained the sources from whence these payments came, I now propose to ask Mr. Fennell, who has examined the books of the Navy-pay-office, whether either of these sums of which the 15,400*l.* is composed, was paid in to the account of the treasurer of the navy from any public source whatever, or whether the treasurer has debited himself with the public for either of these sums.

Then George Fennell, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Has the treasurer debited himself in his public account with either of the sums of 1,000*l.* on the 24th of June 1783—5,000*l.* on the 2nd July 1783—1,400*l.* in the same date—6,000*l.* on the 11th July, and 2,000*l.* on the 31st. Have you examined the official books of the Navy-pay-office in order to ascertain that fact?

Mr. Fennell.—I have.

Mr. Giles.—If either of these sums had been received from any public source, would he have so debited himself?

Mr. Fennell.—He would have debited himself in these books before me.

Then George Fennell, esq. was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Specify in what official books that debit would have appeared?

Mr. Fennell.—The official books for the Navy-branch and the Victualling-branch. There are no receipts and issues out to the Pay-branch from the Exchequer, or from individuals, as there are in the Navy and Victualling.

Mr. Plumer.—These are all the books in fact?

Mr. Fennell.—They are all the books in which such entries would, or ought to be made.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—I have now to call your lordships' attention to lord Melville's second appointment, which took place on the 2nd January, 1784. He then became again trea-suror of the navy, and opened a new account at the Bank for that treasurership, which will be distinguished hereafter by calling it the new account, as the first treasurership account will be distinguished by calling it the old account.

Then Mr. John Gimingham was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—What is that book you hold in your hand?

Mr. Gimingham.—The treasurer's bank-book.

Mr. Giles.—Is it the old account, or the new account?

Mr. Gimingham.—The new account, 1784. "The Right Honourable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1784."

Mr. Giles.—I am about to show your lordships, by reference to this account and the old account, that transfers were made from the second treasurership to the first treasurership; that four transfers were made, amounting together to 6,000*l.*, which reduced the deficiency upon the first treasurership from 7,600*l.* to 1,600*l.* These transfers were made without any authority from the Navy-board, without which authority the treasurer could not legally make them. The first transfer is of 2,000*l.* on the 13th of March, 1784.

Then the following entries were read:

"The old account, right honourable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1782."

"13th March, 1784, right honourable Henry Dundas, new account, 2,000*l.*"

Read from a book intitled, "New Account, 1784, Right Honourable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1784," the following entry:

"1784, March 31, Dundas, old account, 2,000*l.*"

Read from old account, "24th April, 1784, right honourable Henry Dundas, new account, 1,000*l.*"

Read from new account, "30th April, 1784, the right honourable Henry Dundas, 1,000*l.*"

Read from old account, "17th June, 1784, the right honourable Henry Dundas, new account, 1,500*l.*"

Read from new account, "30th June, 1784, the right honourable Henry Dundas, old account, 1,500*l.*"

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—The debits are not entered on the particular day, but they are entered all on one day, the day the book goes to be settled. The next is in another of the banking books, and I must call another clerk to prove it.

Then Mr. Charles Lemage was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Are you a clerk in the Bank?

Mr. Lemage.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know that book, and have you written in it?

Mr. Lemage.—I have.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know whether that is a banking book of the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Lemage.—It is.

Read from a book, intitled, "Old Account, the right honourable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1784," the following entry:

"1785, March 1, honourable H. Dundas, N. A. J. R. 1,500*l.*"

Read from new account, before delivered in: "1785, April 1, by Dundas, 1,500*l.*"

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Now I will call Mr. Rippon, a Bank clerk, who will show the manner in which the entries of vouchers are made.

Then Mr. Thomas Rippon was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—In what mode do the Bank have the vouchers written off, in the banking book of the persons who keep cash with them, with respect to dates?

Mr. Rippon.—When vouchers are written off, the transaction is dated on the day on which that is done, without regard to the day on which it is paid; that is the uniform practice.

Mr. Giles.—What do the letters N. A. J. R. mean?

Mr. Rippon.—March the 1st, the right honourable Henry Dundas, N. A. which are the initials for new account—J. R. are the initials of the person so writing in the credit, 1,500*l.*

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Having shown there were 6,000*l.* transferred from the new treasurership to the old, I shall show that the effect of that has been, to reduce the deficiency or difference between the balances of the first treasurership to 1,600*l.*

Then George Fennell, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—What was the balance of the treasurer of the navy, upon his old account, on the 31st March, 1785?

Mr. Fennell.—It is not stated in the certificate book for March, 1785.

Mr. Giles.—Why is it not?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not know, there appears to be no variation in the treasurer's balance from the 31st of December, 1784, till the 30th of June, 1786.

Mr. Giles.—What was the treasurer's balance on the 30th of December, 1784?

Mr. Fennell.—The treasurer's balance on the 31st of December, was 701*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*

Mr. Giles.—Did that continue unvaried?

Mr. Fennell.—It continued unvaried till the 31st of March, 1786.

Mr. Giles.—What branch is that?

Mr. Fennell.—The Navy branch.

Mr. Giles.—Turn to the next—the Pay-branch.

Mr. Fennell.—The treasurer's balance in the Pay-branch, on the 31st of March, 1785, was 1,056*l*.

Mr. Giles.—What was it in the Victualling?

Mr. Fennell.—In the Victualling branch the treasurer's balance on the 31st of March, 1785, was 851*l*. 4*s*. 4*d*.

Mr. Giles.—That will give the official balance of the treasurer on the 31st of March, 1785, to be 2,608*l*. 12*s*. 3*d*.—I shall now show your lordships that the bank balance on that day was 1,008*l*. 12*s*. 3*d*. being 1,600*l*. less than the official balance.

Then the following entry was read :

“ Old Account,—Right Honourable Henry Dundas, Bank.

“ 1785, March 31.—By balance to New Account 1,008*l*. 12*s*. 3*d*.”

Mr. Giles.—Now I have reduced the difference between the official balance and the Bank balance of lord Melville's first treasurer-ship, to 1,600*l*. and there we shall leave it. It remained in that state till after the death of Mr. Douglas, and the appointment of Mr. Trotter to be paymaster.

The next evidence I have to offer relates to the second treasurer-ship. The transfers proved to have been made from the second treasurer-ship to the first would leave a deficiency in the second treasurer-ship of 6,000*l*. and, if that were the only deficiency, it might be sufficient to show your lordships what was the difference between the official and the bank balance of that treasurer-ship, after the transfers had been made; but between the periods of two of these transfers, there was a draft drawn for 2,000*l*. in favour of Mr. Swaffield, which draft I shall call Mr. Swaffield to prove was never given to him. It was a draft drawn upon the Bank, payable to him or bearer; but not on his account, or ever given to him; and that draft is dated the 24th August, 1784.

Then the following entry was read :

“ New Account, 1784,—The right honorable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1784.

“ 1784, August 30th, Swaffield 2,000*l*.”

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then George Swaffield, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Did you receive a draft for 2,000*l*. upon the bank, or the produce of such draft, in the month of August, 1784?

Lord Chancellor.—What papers are those you are referring to?

Mr. Swaffield.—They are copies of accounts with which I have furnished the managers.

Lord Chancellor.—It is more regular to refer to the original.

[The witness refers to the book.]

Mr. Plumer.—Is that in your own hand-writing.

Mr. Swaffield.—All this is in my own hand-writing.

Mr. Giles.—Look at the 24th of August, 1784?

Mr. Swaffield.—I received no money of the treasurer of the navy on that day.

Then George Swaffield, esq. was cross-examined, as follows :

Mr. Plumer.—In August 1784, by whom was the detail of the business of the treasurer's office managed?

Mr. Swaffield.—Mr. Douglas, he was then the treasurer's paymaster.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the detail of business managed by Mr. Douglas?

Mr. Swaffield.—So far as respected the victualling, it was certainly managed by me.

Mr. Plumer.—Which department is this particular payment in?

Mr. Swaffield.—In the Victualling branch.

Mr. Plumer.—Who would have been to issue the money to you in that branch?

Mr. Swaffield.—Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Plumer.—Did Mr. Douglas draw all the drafts upon that subject?

Mr. Swaffield.—Mr. Douglas at times was very much afflicted with the gout, and had not the power of drawing.

Mr. Plumer.—Who drew, when he could not draw.

Mr. Swaffield.—I did.

Mr. Giles.—Who signed the draft?

Mr. Swaffield.—I did.

Mr. Giles.—Did you in the month of August, 1784, or at any other time, draw a draft payable to yourself, which you did not give credit for to the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Swaffield.—I did not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Now I will show your lordships the state of the treasurer's official and Bank balances, on the 31st of March, 1785, in the new account; and your lordships will see that the difference, or deficiency, amounts exactly to 6,000*l*. which was transferred from that account to the old, together with this 2,000*l*. draft, making together 8,000*l*.

Then George Fennell, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—State the treasurer's balances on the 31st of March, 1785, in the second treasurer-ship.

Mr. Fennell.—It was 22,192*l*. 19*s*. 7*d*. in the Pay branch; 5,972*l*. 16*s*. 4*d*. in the Victualling branch, on the 31st of March, 1785; and 15,352*l*. 10*s*. 9*d*. in the Navy branch.

Mr. Giles.—That will amount to 43,518*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. I shall now show what the Bank balance was on that day, and your lordships will find the difference to be 8,000*l*. deficiency.

Then the following entry was read from the new account 1784, before delivered in.

"The right honourable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1784.

"1785, April 1st.—By balance to new account, 35,513*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*"

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Now I propose to show your lordships another draft, drawn on the 25th May, 1785, for 2,000*l.* in favour of Mr. Swaffield, which is under precisely the same circumstances as the last.

Then the following entry was read from the new account, 1784.

"The right honourable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1784.

"1785, May 31, Swaffield, 2,000*l.*"

Then George Swaffield, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Look at your account with the treasurer of the navy, and state whether you received a draft, or the produce of a draft, on the 27th of May, 1785, for 2,000*l.*?

Mr. Swaffield.—On that day I received 5000*l.*

Mr. Giles.—Did you also receive a draft for 2,000*l.* on that day?

Mr. Swaffield.—I did not.

Mr. Giles.—I will show your lordships, by reading an entry in the Bank book, that 5,000*l.* was also paid to Mr. Swaffield's name, in addition to the 2,000*l.*

Then the following entry was read:

"New Account, 1784,

"31st May, 1785, Swaffield, 5,000*l.*"

Then George Swaffield, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Whether, independent of the entries contained in the books you produce, you are able from your memory to give any account at all of the transactions of that period?

Mr. Swaffield.—I am not.

Mr. Giles.—Have you, since the date just referred to in May, 1785, settled your accounts at different times with the paymaster of the navy, on the account of the treasurer, without being called at any time to render an account of these two sums of 2,000*l.* and 5,000*l.*?

Mr. Swaffield.—I have not.

Mr. Plumer.—Were what accounts you have since settled with the treasurer of the navy, in writing?

Mr. Swaffield.—In writing; in my own hand, in this book.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you mean to state that you have ever settled any account yourself with the noble defendant?

Mr. Swaffield.—I do not recollect that I have.

Mr. Plumer.—Having stated that you sometimes drew drafts when Mr. Douglas was not in a condition to draw for himself—did you on that day, or the day before, pay a sum of 2,000*l.*?

Mr. Swaffield.—I did not.

A Lord.—You state that, occasionally, you drew drafts in your own name, though, in fact, you were only authorized by Mr. Douglas so to do—whether, when you drew those drafts, they were entered in the book as paid to the individual in whose favour you drew the draft, or whether they were entered as paid to you?

Mr. Swaffield.—I do not remember that I ever drew a draft of that kind in my own name.

A Lord.—As you did not settle your accounts personally with Mr. Dundas, with whom did you settle them?

Mr. Swaffield.—I settled them in my own books, and, of course, knew the balance at the end of every month.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—I will now show, that on this 25th of May, 1785, there is 2,000*l.* entered to the credit of lord Melville in Drummond's house, as received of Andrew Douglas.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Read an entry of the 25th of May, 1785.

Mr. Oliver.—The title of the account is, "The right honourable Henry Dundas, May the 25th, 1785, received of Andrew Douglas, 2,000*l.*"

Mr. Plumer.—Has the witness examined this period with any book?

Mr. Oliver.—Yes, I have.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Having shown this additional 2,000*l.* I will now show the difference between the balances on the 31st of May, that the deficiency was 2,000*l.* more, making 10,000*l.*

Then George Fennell, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—What were the treasurer's balances on the 31st of May, 1785, in the Navy branch?

Mr. Fennell.—The balance then was for the Navy branch, 54,773*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.*—for the Pay branch the 31st of May 1785, 19,832*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*—and for the Victualling branch, on the 31st May 1785, 13,352*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*

Mr. Giles.—Making together 87,959*l.* 7*s.* 0*d.* for the official balance. The Bank balance will be found in the banking book to be 10,000*l.* deficient.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then the following entry was read:

"New Account, 1784."

"The right honorable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1784."

"31st May 1785.—By balance to new book, 77,959*l.* 7*s.* 0*d.*"

Mr. Giles.—Your lordships observe there is just 10,000*l.* less than the official balance. I will proceed to show your lordships that this deficiency continued the same in June and July; but it will here be necessary to introduce another account which was opened at the Bank. The act of parliament for regulating the office of the treasurer of the navy passed in July 1785, and accordingly we find that there was at that period an account opened by Mr. Douglas for lord Melville at the Bank. I mention this particularly, because it is a circumstance that had escaped notice for a considerable time after this matter was first inquired into, and some documents have been incorrectly drawn up, owing to the clerks in the Navy-pay-office not being aware that this account had been so opened by Mr. Douglas. I proceed to show your lordships that the deficiency continued, to the month of July, to be 10,000*l.*

Then George Fennell, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles—State the official balance on the 31st July 1785.

Mr. Fennell—For the Navy branch, 31,602*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.*—For the Pay branch, the 31st of July 1785, 6,200*l.*

Mr. Giles—For the Victualling branch?

Mr. Fennell—The 31st July 1785, 13,752*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*

Mr. Giles—Making together, 51,555*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. John Gimingham was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles—Do you know whether these are the banking books of the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Gimingham—They are both the treasurer's books.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles—One of them is the first book, in which the account of July, 1785, was opened; and the other is confined to the new account.—That the attention may not be confounded by the several bank accounts we are obliged to refer to, I wish to state them distinctly to your lordships, and to observe, that the first account opened by lord Melville at the Bank, is called the old account, and it relates to the first treasurership only. Then came the second treasurership, and an account was immediately opened with that, which is called the new account. The act of parliament passed in July, 1785, and then another concurrent account was opened for the second treasurership, and was called the act of parliament account. In January, 1786, Mr. Trotter came into office as paymaster, and then another act of parliament account was opened, which was called the act of parliament new account. These are the only Bank accounts to which your lordships attention will be called. At present, in order to shew the treasurer's Bank balance on the 31st July, 1785, we must refer to the concurrent accounts, viz. the new account and the act of parliament account. The adding of the balances of these two accounts together, will give the real Bank balance of the second treasurership on that day.

Then the following entry was read from a book entitled "New Account, right honorable Henry Dundas."

"Bank, 1785,

"July 30th, 1785—By balance to new account, 13,026*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*"

Then the following entry was read from a book entitled "The right honorable Henry Dundas with the Bank, by act of parliament, dated July 1st, 1785."

"July 30th—By balance to new account, 28,528*l.* 15*s.* 0*d.*"

Mr. Giles—Adding these together, your lordships will find it amount to 41,555*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* and that, deducted from the official balance, which was 51,555*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* just leaves 10,000*l.* deficiency in July, 1785. The deficiency continued the same in August and September, and I mean to show that, in October, 1785, this deficiency was reduced to 9,000*l.* by a payment made, by placing 1,000*l.* due to lord Melville on account of his salary, to his credit in the public account at the Bank.

Then Mr. John Davis was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles—Did you pay or transfer the sum of 1,000*l.* to the account of lord Melville as treasurer of the navy, at the Bank, in the month of October, 1785?

Mr. Davis—I made a draft for 1,000*l.* payable to the right honorable Henry Dundas; it was for his salary as treasurer of the navy, for the preceding quarter.

Mr. Giles—What situation did you hold in the Navy-pay-office at that time?

Mr. Davis—At that time I was assistant to the then cashier of the navy.

Mr. Giles—What was his name?

Mr. Davis—John Slade; the public cash was deposited in our joint names, and therefore I drew the draft myself.

Mr. Giles—Did you make any payment to the amount of 1,000*l.*?

Mr. Davis—I did, on the 6th of October, 1785.

Mr. Giles—On what account did you make that payment?

Mr. Davis—I made it on account of the right honorable Henry Dundas's salary, for the preceding quarter.

Mr. Giles—To whom, or to what account did you make that payment?

Mr. Davis—I will look at another book and inform you.

Lord Chancellor—Is that book in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Davis.—It is all in my own handwriting. The draft was drawn payable to Mr. Dundas, but it was given to Mr. Douglas.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—We will show by the banking-book that that draft was placed to the credit of lord Melville's new account in the banking-book.

Then the following entry was read:

"New account, right honourable Henry Dundas.

"October 6, 1785, Slade and Davis 1,000*l*."

Mr. Giles.—Now I proceed to shew that this payment having been made to the new account on the 6th of October 1785, it had the effect of reducing his deficiency to 9,000*l*. on that account.

Then George Fennell, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—State the treasurer's balance on the 31st of October, 1785.

Mr. Fennell.—The treasurer's balance in the Navy branch, on the 31st of October, 1785, was 95,133*l*. 10*s*. for the Pay branch, on the 31st of October, 1785, it was 31,213*l*. 16*s*. 11*d*.—for the Victualling branch, on the 31st of October, 1785, it was 19,712*l*. 10*s*. 9*d*.

Mr. Giles.—These sums make altogether 146,059*l*. 17*s*. 8*d*.—I will now show your lordships that the two Bank balances, viz. the balance of the new account and that of the act of parliament account, amounted to 137,059*l*. 17*s*. 8*d*. just 9,000*l*. less.

Then the following entry was read:

"New account right honourable Henry Dundas, Bank, 1785."

"1785, October 31st,—By balance to new account, 9026*l*. 10*s*. 8*d*."

Then the following entry was read:

"The right honorable Henry Dundas with the Bank, by act of parliament, dated July 1st, 1785.

"31st October, 1785,—By balance to new account, 128,033*l*. 7*s*. 0*d*."

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Your lordships will find they make together 137,059*l*. 17*s*. 8*d*. The Bank balance being exactly 9,000*l*. less than the official balance. This deficiency continued in that state during the month of November; but, as it is not worth while to trouble your lordships with evidence of that, we will go to the deficiency as it existed on the last day of December 1785, after Mr. Douglas's death. He died in December 1785, and the deficiency then continued to be 9,000*l*. on the second treasurership, and 1,600*l*. on the old treasurership, making together the sum of 10,600*l*. which, it will be hereafter proved to your lordships, lord Melville confessed to be a deficiency due from himself. I will prove it in November, because it appears that the Bank balance, owing to Mr. Douglas's death, was not settled on the 31st of December.

VOL. XXIX.

Then Archibald Douglas, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—When did your father die?

Mr. Douglas.—Some day in December, 1785, to the best of my recollection, but I cannot ascertain the day.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—I believe it might be precisely ascertained to be the 19th of December. Owing to another paymaster not being appointed, the balance could not be settled at the end of December, but it remained the same as it was at the end of November.

Then George Fennell, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—State what was the treasurer's balance of the Navy branch on the 30th of November, 1785.

Mr. Fennell.—The treasurer's balance on the Navy branch on the 30th of November, 1785, was 59,584*l*. 2*s*. 1*d*.; for the Pay branch on the 30th of November, 1785, it was 2,513*l*. 16*s*. 11*d*.; for the Victualling branch on the 30th of November, 1785, the balance was 21,712*l*. 10*s*. 9*d*.

Mr. Giles.—These sums make together 83,810*l*. 9*s*. 9*d*.

Now read the Bank balances?

Then the following entry was read:

"The right honourable Henry Dundas with the Bank, by act of parliament July 1st.

"November 30th, 1785.—By balance to the new account 65,783*l*. 19*s*. 1*d*."

Mr. Giles.—The balance in the other account continued the same; there was no entry either to the credit or the debit in the month of November.

The following entry was read:

"Banking book new account, 1785."

"October 31st, 1785.—To balance from old account, agreed John Betworth, 9,026*l*. 10*s*. 8*d*."

Mr. Giles.—Adding these sums together, they amount to 74,810*l*. 9*s*. 9*d*.; and, deducting that from the official balance, there is a deficiency of exactly 9,000*l*. the same as it was the preceding month.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—You are a clerk in the Navy office.

3 L

Mr. Standert.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—When the treasurer of the navy is to make a transfer from one account to the other, does he not do that by the direction of the navy board?

Mr. Standert.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Is he allowed so to do, without directions being given for that purpose?

Mr. Standert.—No.

Mr. Giles.—Were any directions given for transfers by the navy board to the treasurer of the navy, for 2,000*l.* on the 13th of March, 1784; or for 1,000*l.* on the 24th of April, 1784; or for 1,500*l.* on the 7th of June, 1784; or for 1,500*l.* on the 1st of March, 1785?

Mr. Standert.—I cannot tell from memory.

Mr. Giles.—Have you taken any, and what means to inform yourself, whether such orders were or were not given?

Mr. Standert.—I have referred to those bills by which the transfers were made.

Mr. Giles.—Do you mean by which all transfers were made during that treasurer-ship?

Mr. Standert.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Do you find any authority whatever, for the treasurer having made the transfers that have just now been stated to you?

Mr. Standert.—The bills only are the authority for such transfers.

Mr. Giles.—Examine those bills, and see if you find any authority for a transfer of the sum of 2,000*l.* on the 13th of March, 1784?

Mr. Standert.—The first is, 10,000*l.*; the second is 10,000*l.*; the third is 20,000*l.*; the fourth is 10,000*l.*; the fifth is 5,000*l.*; the sixth is 5,000*l.*; the seventh is 5,000*l.*; the eighth is 5,000*l.*; the ninth is 5,000*l.*; the tenth is 10,000*l.*; the eleventh is 5,000*l.*; and the twelfth is 5,000*l.*

Mr. Giles.—Are there any more bills of the same nature, authorising transfers during that period?

Mr. Standert.—Not from one treasurer-ship to the other.

Then Osborne Standert, esq. was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Explain what you mean by transfers made by bill?

Mr. Standert.—Sums that had been received by the treasurer for the time being, and paid over to the ex-treasurer to carry on the service during his treasurer-ship.

Mr. Plumer.—Then I understand from you, that the account of the ex-treasurer and the treasurer in office, are kept distinct?

Mr. Standert.—They are so.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you mean, speaking of the transfers, that when there was a transfer from one account to the other, that was directed by the navy board?

Mr. Standert.—Yes; that it was directed by the navy board.

Mr. Plumer.—Each head of service is also kept distinct by the ex-treasurer, or by the treasurer in office?

Mr. Standert.—Exactly so.

Mr. Plumer.—Is any direction given by the board with respect to the removal of any money from the Bank for any purpose?

Mr. Standert.—Never.

Mr. Plumer.—The transfer, from one place to another place, is left to the discretion of the treasurer, and not under the direction of the board?

Mr. Standert.—Undoubtedly not.

Mr. Plumer.—Was there any transfer from one account to the other, at the period respecting which you have been interrogated, in March, April, and June, 1784?

Mr. Standert.—I find one transfer of 10,000*l.* was made in March, 1784, from the new account to the old account.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that a transfer directed by the board?

Mr. Standert.—Yes; that 10,000*l.* was expressly received by the treasurer in his second treasurer-ship, purposely to pay over to the treasurer in his first treasurer-ship.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that under the regular authority of the navy board?

Mr. Standert.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Is there any unauthorised transfer in the same month, from one account to the other?

Mr. Standert.—I do not know of any.

Mr. Giles.—It must appear by the Bank book, whether there was any transfer at all made.

Mr. Plumer.—This is the witness they have called for the purpose of proving unauthorized transfers from one account to the other; I am only pursuing it, to show my direct negative to that fact.

Mr. Whitbread.—We only called this witness to show, that no authority did exist for one transfer being made; we did not call him to show, that no authority existed for transfers being made.

Mr. Plumer.—I understood him to have been interrogated, first, as to the course of the office, and the mode in which transfers when duly made were entered; and then I meant to show, in point of fact, that in certain months no authority was given for a transfer from one account to the other.

Mr. Whitbread.—We have proved that a specific transfer was made from one treasurer-ship to the other on the 13th of March 1784. We call the witness to show that no authority existed for that particular transfer, not calling upon him to show whether other transfers had been made.

Mr. Plumer.—As I understand the evidence, the honourable managers have proved no such thing as they have stated, viz. a transfer from one treasurer's account to another account. What they have proved is a transfer at the Bank. All I wish is, to have from this witness a clear and distinct statement of what are the sorts of accounts in which alterations are never made from the one to the other without authority, and to show that that is the total amount, not the place of deposit, which has confused the two questions. The place of deposit is not interfered with by the navy board at all; it is to show that the total amount of the balances of the ex-treasurer and the treasurer in office, is never varied at all without authority. Is not that so?

Mr. Standert.—Yes; that is perfectly clear.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether you know of any alterations, in the month of March and the other two months, from the old account to the new account, from the ex-treasurer to the new treasurer?

Mr. Giles.—The witness has never seen those accounts; he is not in the Bank but the Navy-office.

Mr. Plumer.—If the witness will say that this is not within his department, I am quite satisfied. It would not be proper for me to inquire of him. I wished it to be distinctly understood, what the sort of transfer he has spoken of, which requires the interference of the board, was.

Mr. Whitbread.—A short question will put an end to that. Do you belong to the Navy-pay-office at all?

Mr. Standert.—I do not.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you belong to the Navy-office?

Mr. Standert.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it your particular office to control the treasurer's accounts?

Mr. Standert.—It is.

Mr. Plumer.—Does it lie within your own knowledge, if there is any transfer from one account to the other, in consequence of your department?

Mr. Standert.—It would appear in the account of each, the sum transferred and the sum received in the other account.

Mr. Plumer.—Would it come within your official knowledge if such a transfer had, at any time, been made?

Mr. Standert.—It would.

Mr. Plumer.—Did any such transfer take place, on the 13th of March, 1784, from one account to the other account?

Mr. Standert.—The day on which the actual transfer was made I cannot speak to; but the document by which the transfer was made, passed the office on the 8th of March, 1784.

Mr. Plumer.—That is one that is authorized by the board.

Mr. Standert.—It was.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know of any other transfer from one account to the other, in the course of the same month?

Mr. Standert.—I do not.

Mr. Plumer.—If there had been any transfer from one account to the other, should you have known it?

Mr. Standert.—In the regular course of business, I should.

Mr. Plumer.—Are you in possession of any documents to know whether, in point of fact, there appears to have been any variation of the accounts in that month—any transfer from one account to the other?

Mr. Giles.—In what accounts does the learned counsel mean?

Mr. Plumer.—I mean just exactly the account we have been speaking of all along; the account of the new treasurership to the ex-treasurership.

Mr. Standert.—The express sum, which I have mentioned before of 10,000*l.* is the only article, that I know of, that was transferred in that way, and the only transfer that I know has been made.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish to put the same question, with respect to the other two months, April and June, 1784, and the month of March, 1785?

Mr. Standert.—I have no document, of April or June, 1784, that shows any transfer at all.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any, relative to March, 1785?

Mr. Standert.—I have a document of the 11th of March, 1785—5,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—What we prove, was on the first of March.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know, in point of fact, whether any transfer, in either of those months, from one account to the other, did take place?

Mr. Standert.—I cannot tell by my memory.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you, by referring to any books, ascertain that fact?

Mr. Standert.—Referring to the treasurer's receipts and payments, which were signed by Mr. Douglas, would show it—the certificate books.

Mr. Plumer.—Specify the book in which that is to be found?

Mr. Standert.—It would have appeared in the books Mr. Fennell lately had; the copies of those books are in the hands of the solicitor for the managers.

Mr. Plumer.—Supposing a transfer from the Bank account of the ex-treasurer to the Bank account of the new treasurer, or vice versa, would that be a subject upon which any direction would be required from the navy board?

Mr. Standert.—Certainly not.

Mr. Giles.—Does the witness mean to represent that no transfer was made at the periods that have been mentioned, from the second treasurership to the first, without authority from the navy board?

Mr. Standert.—I can only speak from the authorities which lie before me.

Mr. Giles.—May there not, for any thing you know, have been a transfer made from the second treasurership to the first, without any authority from the navy board?

Mr. Standert.—I think if there had been, and those transfers had been regular, I must have known it.

Mr. Giles.—I am asking concerning irregular and unauthorized transfers?

Mr. Standert.—Those I cannot speak to.

Mr. Giles.—When you are speaking of transfers, are you to be understood to be speaking of transfers of the Bank account of the treasurer at the Bank, to the Bank account of the ex-treasurer, or the total account of one treasurer to the total account of the other.

Mr. Standert.—We know of no transaction at the Bank.

A Lord.—When you speak of a transfer from the new account to the old account, do you mean by that, the Bank carrying part of the credit which stood to the new account to the credit of the old account?

Mr. Standert.—When money is required in an old treasurership, to carry on the service an application is made to the navy board for a sum to do so—the navy board write to the treasurer of the navy to solicit a certain sum for that purpose—he takes that solicitation to the treasurer, and upon that document the treasury issue the precise sum to the treasurer for that purpose—when that is done, he certifies to the navy board that such a sum is received for such a purpose, upon which those bills are made out in the name of the ex-treasurer, and assigned in the name of the treasurer for the sum; therefore it is only a sum passing through the medium of the present treasurer to the late treasurership, to carry on the service of that late treasurership.

A Lord.—Then if the treasurer for the time being should draw upon the Bank by his paymaster the sum of 1,000*l.* and that should come into the hands of his paymaster, and should afterwards, by that paymaster or any other, be paid to the old account, whatever that is in effect, would you either call it a transfer or an unauthorized transfer, whatever it be in effect?

Mr. Standert.—We should call nothing a transfer but what appears upon the face of the treasurer's account.

A Lord.—Though the thing be the same in effect, you give a different name to it.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, we have, on the part of the commons, shown your lordships that the deficiency, which was originally 23,000*l.* has, by the means which I will not now detail, but which we have given in evidence, been reduced from 23,000*l.* to 10,600*l.* that is to say, 9,000*l.* on the new account, and 1,600*l.* on the old. I have stated to your lordships that that 10,600*l.* remaining deficiency was confessed by lord Melville to be his deficiency, and not the deficiency of his paymaster; and, to prove that fact, the managers purpose, in addition to the evidence your lordships have already received, to read a pamphlet published by lord Melville.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

SIXTH DAY.

Monday, May 5, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, Managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Giles.—My lords, on Saturday I stated to your lordships, that the differences between the balances had been reduced to 10,600*l.* being 9,000*l.* upon the account of the second treasurership, and 1,600*l.* upon that of the first. I find by the minutes, however, that I did not prove that this continued to be the exact difference between the official and Bank balances of the old treasurership to so late a period as I thought. I did not then carry it lower than the 31st of March, 1785; whereas, the last settlement, prior to Mr. Douglas's death, which happened in December, 1785, was in the September preceding it. I will now supply the defect, and prove the differences between the official and Bank balances of the first treasurership, on the 30th September, 1785.

Then George Fennell, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—What was the treasurer's balance on the old account of the ex-treasurership, September, 1785?

Mr. Fennell.—For the Navy branch, 701*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*—for the Pay branch, 4,556*l.*—for the Victualling branch, 851*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. Giles.—Making together 6,108*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* The Bank balance will appear in the banking book.

Then the following entry was read from a book before delivered in:

"30th September, 1785. To balance from old account, 4,508*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—Leaving, as I stated, a deficiency of 1,600*l.* upon the old treasurership. I have now, my lords, traced the deficiencies to the latest period preceding Mr. Douglas's death, and shown the difference of the balances upon the first treasurership to have been 1,600*l.* and upon the second treasurership 9,000*l.* In order to prove lord Melville's acknowledgment, that this 9,000*l.* and 1,600*l.* (amounting together to 10,600*l.*) was a deficiency due from him, I intended to have produced some evidence, with which it will not be necessary to trouble your lordships, because a witness must shortly be called, who will most satisfactorily prove that fact. In the mean time, I wish to show your lordships what the balance of lord Melville's account, at Messieurs Drummond's, was on the 25th of May, 1785, when the 2,000*l.* draft, drawn in favour of Swaffield, and denied by Swaffield to be paid to him, was paid into Messrs. Drummond's by Mr. Douglas.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Refer to the ledger you produced before their lordships, and state what was the balance of Mr. Dundas's account, on the 25th of May, 1785?

Mr. Oliver.—The balance on that day appears to be 2,547*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* against my lord Melville.

Then Mr. Thomas Oliver was cross-examined, as follows :

Mr. Plumer.—Turn again to that entry of the 25th May, 1785.—You represented what was the balance of the account current of lord Melville on that day. Does there appear upon the book any balance struck that day, or is it a balance that you struck now upon the account current?

Mr. Oliver.—I make it from calculation, by casting up the account.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you make it from the calculation of an open account current.

Mr. Oliver.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to the entry of the 4th of March, 1784, of money paid on lord Melville's account, and by whom?

Mr. Oliver.—"March 4th, 1784. By cash received of Andrew Douglas, esquire, 600*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 27th of May, for the same purpose.

Mr. Oliver.—"May 27, received of ditto, [that is, Andrew Douglas] 500*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 28th of the same month.

Mr. Oliver.—"May the 28th, ditto, 500*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 14th of August.

Mr. Oliver.—"August the 14th of ditto, 1,000*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Does "ditto," in all these entries you have read, refer to Andrew Douglas before named?

Mr. Oliver.—They do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to an entry of the 8th of January, 1785.

Mr. Oliver.—"January the 8th, 1785. By cash received of Andrew Douglas, 1,000*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to an entry of the 17th of March, in the same year.

Mr. Oliver.—"March the 17th, of ditto, [meaning Andrew Douglas] 1,000*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to an entry of the 19th of May, in the same year.

Mr. Oliver.—"May 19th of ditto, 1,000*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—What does "ditto" mean to express in that entry?

Mr. Oliver.—Of Andrew Douglas.

Mr. Whitbread.—The entry of the 25th of May, which is the succeeding and last entry, has been already read to your lordships; but I wish it to be read again, to complete the year.

Mr. Oliver.—"May the 25th, of Andrew Douglas, 2,000*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—There are three entries in 1783, which precede all the entries that we have had read to-day out of the other ledger.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, the witness stopped with reading an entry of the 25th May, 1785. I wish that the two next entries in the same page and in the same account may be read.

Mr. Oliver.—"October the 4th, Mansfield on Coutts, per Newbigging, 2,000*l.*—December the 29th, Simpson on the Bank, per Davison, 3,600*l.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to an entry of the 7th April 1783.

Mr. Oliver.—"April 7th 1783, received 500*l.*"

Mr. Plumer.—It does not specify from whom received?

Mr. Oliver.—It does not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to an entry of the 30th of June 1783.

Mr. Oliver.—"June 30th 1783, of Andrew Douglas, 175*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to an entry of the 30th of December, of the same year.

Mr. Oliver.—"December the 30th, received 100*l.*"

Lord Chancellor.—Is that the whole of the entry?

Mr. Oliver.—Yes.

A Lord.—With regard to the entry on the 7th of April 1783, and the 30th of December 1783, which are marked in the first instance simply "received 500*l.*" and in the other entry "received 100*l.*" from whom were they received?

Mr. Oliver.—It is presumed immediately from lord Melville, or from a messenger immediately from him; that is the usual way of making the entries.

A Lord.—Does your presumption of that fact appear any how upon the face of the book?

Mr. Oliver.—It does not appear only "received."

A Lord.—Is there any entry with the mark of the letter P. among those entries.

Mr. Oliver.—It would not appear here—that would appear in the waste book.

Mr. Whitbread.—We propose now to call Mr. Archibald Douglas, who has been before your lordships.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Archibald Douglas, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Whitbread.—You have stated that your father, Andrew Douglas, died in December 1785; were you in London at the time of your father's death?

Mr. Douglas.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—How late, previous to your father's death, did you see him?

Mr. Douglas.—I reached London from Scotland on the Thursday, late in the day, and my father died on the Sunday following.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you executor to your father?

Mr. Douglas.—I was acting executor to my father.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any claim made upon you as executor to your father, for any balance due upon the navy pay account?

Mr. Douglas.—Yes, there were.

Mr. Whitbread.—What were those claims, and made by whom?

Mr. Douglas.—I cannot say, expressly, that the claim was made upon me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had you any interview with lord Melville subsequent to your father's death?

Mr. Douglas.—Yes, I had.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you remember what passed at that interview between lord Melville and yourself.

Mr. Douglas.—At the distance of twenty, or twenty-two years, I cannot be very positive; but, to the best of my recollection, knowing that there was a balance due in the treasurership of lord Melville for exchequer fees, I thought it my duty to wait upon lord Melville, to ask him to whom I was to pay such sum or sums as were due in his treasurership.

Mr. Whitbread.—What answer did lord Melville give you to that inquiry?

Mr. Douglas.—To the best of my recollection, lord Melville said he would let me know, or I should soon know to whom I was to pay it.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom, in fact, were those sums so due transferred? and does that appear from any writing?

Mr. Douglas.—I do not know that it does; I will state from memory to whom I think I paid them.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any account in writing made by you to whom that balance was paid?

Mr. Douglas.—The mode by which I paid the balance, as well as I recollect, was by my accompanying Mr. Trotter, who, I believe was appointed to succeed my late father, to the house of Messieurs Coutts, the bankers, and the mode of paying Mr. Trotter, as far as I recollect, was by transferring some large sums, from my credit to that of Mr. Trotter, in the books of Messieurs Coutts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at this receipt; upon what occasion was that given you?

Mr. Douglas.—It appears to me to be signed Henry Dundas. It was given to me as the executor of Andrew Douglas, for the sum of four thousand four hundred and seventy-five pounds, four shillings and nine-pence, "being the amount of a balance remaining in his hands, due me upon account of twelve thousand pounds advanced him in the course of my two treasurerships to pay exchequer fees, &c. per account also received." Signed "Henry Dundas."

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether any further claims were made upon you, and by whom, as acting executor of your father?

Mr. Douglas.—I do not recollect any further claims being made upon me. My father was due balances.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where were those balances?

Mr. Douglas.—There was a balance due in the treasurership of the late lord Mendip.

Mr. Plumer.—I presume the witness has no knowledge himself of what balances existed either to lord Mendip, lord Melville, or any body else, but what appears upon the books; and then he is only speaking to the contents of books which your lordships have determined not to be evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—I presume the question put by me was, whether any further claim was made upon him on account of the ex-paymastership of his late father, I meant to confine myself entirely to the treasurership of lord Melville.—Was any further claim made upon you as the executor of your father on account of lord Melville's treasurership?

Mr. Douglas.—None, as far as I recollect.

Mr. Whitbread.—Or ever since?

Mr. Douglas.—Nor ever since.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the commons here leave, for the present, the evidence they have to adduce, as it respects the first and tenth articles. It is impossible for them to say that they entirely close that evidence, because the whole matter is so connected, that it may be necessary in the course of the trial, to bring some other evidence to these two articles; but, for the purpose of saving your lordships' time in hearing the evidence to be adduced in support of the further articles, I beg now to refer your lordships to the fifth article, exhibited by the commons, against lord viscount Melville: wherein it is stated that the defendant, for some corrupt purposes, other than navy purposes, took the sum of 10,000*l.* for his own use.

I again offer myself as a witness to your lordships; and I swear, that on the eleventh day of June, one thousand eight hundred and five, I heard lord Melville declare, with reference to another sum of ten thousand pounds, respecting which I deposed on the other day, that he did at a time subsequent to the time at which he possessed himself of the first ten thousand pounds, possess himself of another sum, nearly to a similar amount; and I understood in substance, that lord Melville said that he would not reveal the application of that money, any more than of the first ten thousand pounds: and from the same motives. This was said in the presence of hundreds of persons, and I propose, on a future day, to call another witness to confirm the testimony I have given.

Then Samuel Whitbread, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—I presume the honourable manager did not, upon this subject, any more than the other, at the time, take any note or minute in writing of what passed?

Mr. Whitbread.—I certainly at that time, took a note of the substance of all that lord Melville said, but not of the exact words.

Mr. Plumer.—The speech of lord Melville* in the house took up a considerable time?

Mr. Whitbread.—Yes, upwards of two hours, I dare say.

Mr. Plumer.—Could you undertake to repeat, by heart, any passages that made favourably for lord Melville, as well as those that you have now given to the Court?

Mr. Whitbread.—I have repeated, by heart, certain words which I have sworn that lord Melville spoke; any other particular words of his speech I am not quite sure that I could repeat: I am now only swearing to the substance of what lord Melville said.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you repeat the substance of any other part of lord Melville's speech which was favorable to lord Melville?

Mr. Whitbread.—If the learned counsel will point my attention to any particular passage of that speech, I will tell him whether I can repeat the substance of it or not.

Mr. Plumer.—Did the noble lord, in the course of his speech, with respect to the sum in question, negative the appropriation of that sum, the same as of the other, to his own private use?

Mr. Whitbread.—I understood him to do it exactly in that way, as with regard to the other sum of 10,000*l*.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect that the noble lord at the same time, in the most positive and explicit manner, did deprecate any appropriation of these sums to his own private use, or Mr. Trotter's?

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not think that he did, in precise and explicit terms, negative that fact.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you, by referring to the notes you took at that time, be able to speak with more positiveness and precision upon that point of the subject?

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not think that I could speak with more positiveness and certainty.

Mr. Plumer.—Was no note taken upon that subject?

Mr. Whitbread.—Yes; but when expressions are equivocal, it is difficult by any note, exactly to give the precise meaning the words are intended to convey.

Mr. Plumer.—What was that equivocal expression which was used upon that occasion?

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not recollect the precise words, but without recollecting the precise words, one may have a recollection that there was an equivocal sense pervading several sentences.

Mr. Plumer.—Endeavour to recollect the substance of what was said in that part of the noble lord's speech that made that impression.

Mr. Whitbread.—The impression intended to be conveyed by that part of the noble lord's speech, to which I presume the learned counsel means to refer, the impression intended to have been conveyed, I apprehend to have been—that he had not directed Mr. Trotter to make use of any public money for his private advantage. With regard to the permission, which he had given to Mr. Trotter, I think the words were pretty precisely, that he had given Mr. Trotter such permission.

Mr. Plumer.—Permission to do what?

Mr. Whitbread.—To place the public money at other places than the Bank, and also to make use of a part of it for his own advantage.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to repeat my questions—whether the noble lord did not, in the most explicit and positive terms, deny that he had either given any permission, or had any knowledge of the public money being laid out to any purposes of private emolument or profit, either for himself or Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish the learned counsel to interpret what he means by 'laid out'. I understood the noble lord to say, or at least implied from it, that he had permitted Mr. Trotter to place the public money at other places besides the bank, for his own private purposes, but with regard to other places, that he did not do any such thing.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to ask the honorable manager, whether he does not distinctly recollect, that the averment of the noble defendant upon that subject of placing it was, that he had given no other permission, but to remove the money from the Bank to a private bank, for the convenience of appropriating it to the public service?

Mr. Whitbread.—Certainly one of the reasons given by the noble lord, was, that he had allowed the money to be removed to a private banker's for official convenience; but it did not appear to me, that that was the only reason.

Mr. Plumer.—Then having said one of the reasons assigned by the noble lord, was, that it might be there for the public convenience, did he give any other reason besides?

Mr. Whitbread.—Yes; I understood for the emolument of Mr. Trotter: and the noble lord described the manner in which he thought that emolument had accrued, namely, by interest paid by Mr. Coutts to Mr. Trotter for lodging that money.

Mr. Plumer.—Be so good as refresh your memory upon the subject, and say whether the sole reason given by the noble defendant was not, that the sole object of removing it from the Bank was for public convenience; but at the same time he did suspect or believe, that an advantage had accrued to Mr. Trotter from that act, which was not done for his advantage, but for public convenience?

Mr. Whitbread.—That was not the way in which I understood it altogether.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether you have refreshed your memory since you heard the speech, by a reference to what was stated on Saturday, as intended to be read in evidence, the substance of the speech delivered?

Mr. Whitbread.—I have not looked at the pamphlet in question since; I have been otherwise most laboriously occupied.

* See it p. 560.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the noble defendant did not in express terms say, that he did solemnly assert before that house, that he never knew that Mr. Trotter had drawn any money for the purposes of private emolument, in manifest evasion of the act?

Mr. Whitbread.—I am speaking to the speech and not to the pamphlet. The pamphlet, which I have read more than once, does not in every part of it exactly correspond with the speech as delivered by the noble defendant, in the house of Commons, to the best of my recollection and belief. Whether those precise words were uttered in the house of Commons, it is impossible for me to say; but, whether they were, or not, the context of all he said was to make the impression upon my mind, which I have had the honor of stating to the Court.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to have a precise answer, whether those words, or to that effect and substance, were used by the noble defendant? I will repeat them again: "I never knew that Mr. Trotter had drawn any money for private emolument, in manifest evasion of the act."

Mr. Whitbread.—I can give no other answer than I have heretofore done, and I hope that is perfectly satisfactory to the Court, that I am not speaking to the words of that pamphlet, but to the words of the speech, without recollecting precise parts of it.

Mr. Plumer.—I have not made use of the word pamphlet, but I am asking whether, in substance, the noble defendant did not imply to the effect I am stating.

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not recollect the precise words, nor do I think that the very substance of those words was uttered in any precise form by the noble lord.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether you mean not only to negative the precise expression I have stated, but to negative also the substance?

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not mean to negative the substance altogether, of lord Melville's criticism upon what the words manifest evasion meant; the substance of the speech was what I have given to your lordships; the words themselves I do not recollect.

Mr. Plumer.—I am not answered yet. I wish to know whether in words and in substance, and also to the effect, of what I stated just now was or was not made use of by the noble lord?

Mr. Whitbread.—Not to that precise effect; to an effect very nearly similar.

Mr. Plumer.—I shall be obliged to you if you will state, what was the averment upon that subject, as near as you can recollect?

Mr. Whitbread.—The averment upon that subject I took to import, that he had not allowed Mr. Trotter to do that, to the extent to which it had been done.

Mr. Plumer.—Am I to understand your recollection to be, that he allowed it to any extent?

Mr. Whitbread.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you mean that he allowed it in any other respect, than as a benefit might arise to him, from depositing it for the convenience of the public service, at another bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—The noble lord had first of all contended that the act was not evaded, and therefore there comes a question—what was an evasion of the act? not a manifest evasion of the act, according to the construction of the noble lord; but, according to the construction I put upon it, it was in manifest evasion of the act.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the noble lord admitted that he had ever permitted Mr. Trotter to derive any private benefit from the public money, except the benefit arising from a deposit made at a private banker's, for the purpose of official convenience?

Mr. Whitbread.—I understood lord Melville to say, for Mr. Trotter's convenience also.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether upon recollecting yourself upon this subject, you mean to state that the noble defendant admitted that he knew or permitted any emolument to be derived to Mr. Trotter, from the public money, save and except what resulted from its deposit at a private banker's, for official convenience?

Mr. Whitbread.—The noble defendant stated, that he had allowed the money to be placed at a private banker's for official convenience; and, when there, he had allowed or permitted, or not prevented Mr. Trotter from making a private emolument of it; and that emolument arising from the interest, he was to make of it from Mr. Coutts's.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the noble defendant admitted his consent or knowledge of any other benefit to Mr. Trotter from it?

Mr. Whitbread.—The noble lord never said he had restricted Mr. Trotter from making advantage in any way, to the best of my recollection and belief; and he then stated, that he had made it in that way.

Mr. Plumer.—My question is—not whether he restricted him, but whether he said he knew of his having any other advantage, excepting the advantage before stated?

Mr. Whitbread.—He did not say he even knew it, but only supposed it: he did not admit that he knew of any other.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether he did not also state, in the same speech, that he never knew that Mr. Trotter had invested any money in exchequer or navy bills?

Mr. Whitbread.—I believe he said so.

Mr. Plumer.—That he never knew he had lent any money, upon security of stock?

Mr. Whitbread.—I believe he said so.

Mr. Plumer.—That he never knew he had employed any money in the discount of private bills?

Mr. Whitbread.—I believe he said so.

Mr. Plumer.—That he never knew he had employed any money in the purchase of Bank, or India stock?

Mr. Whitbread.---I believe he said so.

Mr. Plumer.---Whether you recollect, at the same time, the noble defendant declaring, that he had not the smallest knowledge or belief that Mr. Trotter ever did lay out, for his use or benefit, in any such modes, any sum of public money whatever?

Mr. Whitbread.---Please to read the passage over again, and tell me to whom that his refers, whether to Mr. Trotter or to lord Melville?

Mr. Plumer.---Do you recollect lord Melville's declaring, that he had not the smallest knowledge or belief that Mr. Trotter ever laid out, for his use or benefit, any sum of public money whatever?

Mr. Whitbread.---I do not think so precisely, as it is put in those words.

Mr. Plumer.---What was the averment upon that subject?

Mr. Whitbread.---Pretty nearly amounting to precision, but not altogether; the impression made upon my mind was, that the denial was not positive and precise.

Mr. Plumer.---Can you, with any distinctness, recollect the substance of the expressions used?

Mr. Whitbread.---I cannot recollect further than I have stated, I cannot discriminate more nicely; I wish I could, for the benefit of the learned counsel, as it would save him trouble.

Mr. Plumer.---Is there any part of this expression which you think was not used: I will read it again.

Mr. Whitbread.---It is not the expression, it is the general impression of the same words in another order; the insertion or the omission of one word will make all the difference to the construction of the passage.

Mr. Plumer.---Have you the notes with you, which you took at the time?

Mr. Whitbread.---I have not; they were notes I then took, being then in the house of Commons, and endeavouring to prepare myself to answer the speech of the noble lord; they were notes of that sort, that if I were to refer to them now, I do not know that I should be able to understand them, and whether they are in existence or not I cannot say.

Mr. Plumer.---In this passage, which is favorable to lord Melville, you have no distinct recollection of the terms made use of?

Mr. Whitbread.---The only precise words I have any distinct recollection of, I have sworn to;---I have no recollection of those words stated by the learned counsel to the court, whether favourable or unfavourable.

A Lord.---When lord Melville stated that he would not reveal the application of a sum of 10,000*l.* or thereabouts, did he state to the house his reason for declining so to reveal it?

Mr. Whitbread.---In mentioning the first 10,000*l.* or whether he coupled the two together I am not quite sure, but the words he used, and the motives he said that prevented him from revealing the application of that money, were motives of public duty, of private honour, and personal convenience. I understood him to apply those words to both sums.

Mr. Whitbread.---Having given the evidence we shall at present offer upon the subject of those articles, I take the liberty of calling your lordships attention to the subsequent part of the case, to which we are about to adduce evidence; and stating the mode in which we shall adduce that evidence.

First I will apply myself to the second article, that the defendant, in breach of the act, connived at Mr. Trotter's drawing large sums from the Bank, and permitted him to place the same in the hands of Messieurs Coutts, in his own name and under his own control. We shall put in first the appointment of Mr. Trotter as Paymaster to lord Melville, which we wish to have read.

Then several papers were shown to the counsel for lord Melville, and admitted by them to be signed by his lordships. The same were read, and are as follow:

Letter of attorney from lord Melville to Mr. Trotter, dated 10th January, 1786.

"Know all men by these presents, that I the right honourable Henry Dundas, treasurer of his majesty's navy, as well within Great Britain as without, (the kingdom of Ireland excepted) have nominated, constituted, and appointed Alexander Trotter esquire my paymaster, hereby giving and granting to him full power and authority to draw on the governor and company of the bank of England, for and upon my account, as Treasurer of his majesty's navy, all and every sum and sums of money that now are or shall hereafter be wanted for the public services under my care of payment, he being particularly careful to specify in each and every draft the service for which the money is drawn.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 10th day of January 1786, in the 26th year of his present majesty's reign.

HENRY DUNDAS. (L. S.)

Signed, sealed, and delivered, being first duly stamped in the presence of
WILL. BELL."

"Power of Attorney.

Right hon. Henry Dundas to Alexander Trotter.

Know all men by these presents, that I the right hon. Henry Dundas, treasurer of his majesty's navy, have made, ordained, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do make, ordain, constitute, and appoint Alexander Trotter of Grafton Street, in the parish of St. Pancras, in the county of Middlesex esquire, my true and lawful attorney for me in my name, and on my behalf, to transact, do, perform, and execute all such matters and things as either now do or shall hereafter in any manner whatsoever appertain to the duties of my office or place of treasurer of his majesty's navy, and especially for me in my name and to my use to apply for and receive of and from the officers of the receipt of his majesty's exchequer for the time being, and of and from the governor and company of the Bank of England, all and every such sum and sums of money as shall from time to time be wanting and necessary for the due execution of my said office, and to give and sign receipts for the same. I the said Henry Dundas hereby ratifying and confirming, and agreeing to ratify and confirm all and whatsoever my said attorney shall lawfully do, or cause to be done in and about the premises by virtue of these presents. In witness whereof, I the said Henry Dundas have hereunto set my hand and seal, this nineteenth day of July in the year of our lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty six.

S M

HENRY DUNDAS. (L. S.)

Sealed and delivered, being first duly stamped, in presence of

WILLIAM CABELL.

Mr. Whitbread.—The next instrument I wish to put in, is a mutual general release, between the right honourable Henry viscount Melville and Alexander Trotter.

Then the release was read, and is as follows :

Mutual general release between the right honourable lord Melville, and Alexander Trotter esquire, of Dreghorn, dated 18th and 23d February 1803.

"To all and sundry to whom these presents shall come, we the right honourable Henry baron Dunira, lord viscount Melville, some time treasurer of his majesty's navy, and Alexander Trotter esquire, of Dreghorn, paymaster of his majesty's navy, send greeting: whereas for several years past, there have been sundry accounts, reckonings, and money transactions depending between us, the accounts of which have lately been examined, adjusted, and agreed upon between us, and upon such examination, settlement, and adjustment, there remained a balance due from the said Alexander Trotter to the aforesaid lord viscount Melville of one thousand four hundred and eighty pounds eleven shillings and one penny sterling money, with which final examination, settlement, and adjustment, both parties declare themselves perfectly satisfied, and do hereby approve of and ratify the same; and they have either mutually delivered up to each other, or resolved and agreed mutually to cancel and destroy all the vouchers or other memorandums and writings, that at any time heretofore may have existed, passed, or been interchanged between them, relative to the said accounts, and the different items and articles of which the said accounts are composed or consist, and they have further resolved and agreed mutually to release and discharge each other up to the day of the date of these presents, for now and ever: therefore the aforesaid right honourable Henry lord viscount Melville, for and in consideration of what is above mentioned, and also for and in consideration of the sum of five shillings of lawful money of Great Britain, to him in hand well and truly paid by the aforesaid Alexander Trotter, the receipt thereof he doth hereby acknowledge, hath, under the reservation and saving herein-after mentioned, remised, released, and for ever discharged; and doth by these presents for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and successors whatsoever, remise, release, and for ever discharge the aforesaid Alexander Trotter, his heirs, executors, administrators, and successors whatsoever, of and from all and all manner of action and actions, cause and causes of action and actions, suits, debt, dues, sum and sums of money, accounts, reckonings, bonds, bills, notes, specialties, covenants, contracts, controversies, agreements, promises, variances, damages, judgments, extents, executions, clauses and demands whatsoever in law and equity, which against the said Alexander Trotter he the said lord viscount Melville ever had, now has, or which he, his heirs, executors, administrators or successors hereafter can, shall, or may have for, upon, or by reason of any matter, cause, or thing whatsoever, from the beginning of the world to the day of the date of these presents. Saving nevertheless, and reserving from the above mentioned release and discharge, and the effect thereof, the aforesaid sum of one thousand four hundred and eighty pounds eleven shillings and one penny, which the aforesaid Alexander Trotter doth hereby acknowledge to be due and owing from him to the said lord viscount Melville, as the balance on the aforesaid accounts so settled and adjusted between the said lord viscount Melville and him the said Alexander Trotter, as is above mentioned. And he, the aforesaid Alexander Trotter, for and in consideration of what is above mentioned, and also for and in consideration of the sum of five shillings of lawful money of Great Britain to him in hand well and truly paid by the aforesaid Henry lord viscount Melville, the receipt whereof he doth hereby acknowledge, hath remised, released, and for ever discharged, and by these presents doth for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and successors, remise, release, and for ever discharge the aforesaid lord viscount Melville, his heirs, executors, administrators, and successors whatsoever, of and from all and all manner of action and actions, cause and causes of action and actions, suits, debts, dues, sum and sums of money, accounts, reckonings, bonds, bills, notes, specialties, covenants, contracts, controversies, agreements, promises, variances, damages, judgments, extents, executions, claims and demands whatsoever in law and equity, which against the said lord viscount Melville he the said Alexander Trotter ever had, now has, or which he, his heirs, executors, administrators, or successors hereafter, can, shall, or may have, for, upon, or by reason of any matter, cause, or thing whatsoever, from the beginning of the world to the day of the date of these presents. And the said Alexander Trotter doth hereby testify, acknowledge, and declare, and that notwithstanding any thing herein-before contained, he doth still remain indebted and owing to the aforesaid Henry lord viscount Melville in the sum of one thousand four hundred and eighty pounds eleven shillings and one penny lawful money of Great Britain, being the balance of the accounts finally settled and adjusted between him and the said lord viscount Melville as herein-before is mentioned; and both the parties aforesaid consent to the registration hereof in the books of council, and session in Scotland, therein to remain for preservation, or, if necessary, that all due and ordinary execution may be directed hereon, and for that effect they constitute their procurators."

"In witness whereof these presents, written on this and the two preceding pages of paper, duly stamped by Thomas Doige clerk to messieurs Spottiswoodes and Robertson of Sackville street, in the liberty of Westminster, are subscribed by the said parties, and to this last page they have hereunto respectively set and affixed their seals, as follow; viz. by the right honourable Henry lord viscount Melville, at Melville castle, in the county of Mid-Lothian, on the eighteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and three, before these witnesses, Thomas Pocknell and Thomas Matthews, both his servants, and by the aforesaid Alexander Trotter at London, on the twenty-third day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and three, before these witnesses, Thomas Wilson of the Navy-pay-office, London, esquire, and John Spottiswoode junior, of Sackville street aforesaid, the place, date, witnesses names, and designation to the execution hereof, by the said Alexander Trotter, being inserted by the said John Spottiswoode junior.

Signed, sealed and delivered by the said Henry lord viscount Melville, (being first duly stamped) in the Presence of us witnesses hereto.

MELVILLE. (L. S.)

THOMAS POCKNELL,
THOMAS MATTHEWS.

Signed, sealed and delivered by the said Alexander Trotter (being first duly stamped) in the presence of us witnesses hereto,

ALEX. TROTTER, (L. S.)

THOMAS WILSON,
JOHN SPOTTISWOODE, JUN."

Mr. Plumer.—It appears upon the attestation, that lord Melville executed this release at Melville Castle, on the 18th of February, and Mr. Trotter executed it in London on the 23rd.

Mr. Whitbread.—I now wish to call the attention of your lordships to notices which have been served upon the noble defendant, for the production of all papers relative to his connexion with Mr. Trotter, either as his private agent, or as a public officer—we can prove that notice.

Mr. Plumer.—We shall admit it.

Mr. Whitbread.—I now wish to call before your lordships Alexander Trotter, esq.

Then Alexander Trotter, esquire, was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you ever in the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did you first enter the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe in the latter end of the year, 1776.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was your salary when you were first appointed?

Mr. Trotter.—I went into the pay-office a junior clerk, I believe upon a salary of 50*l.* a year.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did you continue in the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I continued I believe till the year 1784, as a clerk.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was your salary increased from your first entering the office, up to the day of your quitting the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I apprehend it may have been, but not materially; I do not recollect.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it doubled?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not think it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did you remain out of the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—My recollection does not serve me to state that precisely; but I believe nearly a twelvemonth.

Mr. Whitbread.—What office did you hold when you were replaced in the Navy office?

Mr. Trotter.—I was appointed paymaster, under the treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who appointed you paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—My lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—Upon whose recommendation, if you know it?

Mr. Trotter.—I am at a loss to ascertain that precisely; but my relation Mr. Coutts, had applied to Mr. Pitt, and I believe Mr. Pitt had made interest with my lord Melville to appoint me to that situation; I do not know whether that was the only interest employed or not.

Mr. Whitbread.—When you were appointed paymaster, what was your salary?

Mr. Trotter.—Five hundred pounds a year, with some deduction of taxes.

Mr. Whitbread.—As paymaster of the navy did you receive the balance of public money which was due from your predecessor?

Mr. Trotter.—The Bank books were delivered to me, I believe, by lord Melville, and I was told that the public balance was at that time in the Bank, excepting the sums that were in the hands of the sub-accountants, and a sum which his lordship mentioned to me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect what that sum was which lord Melville mentioned to you?

Mr. Trotter.—I had stated it upon the best of my recollection upon a former occasion, to be 10,000*l.*, but have been induced from many things I have seen since, to believe it was 10,600*l.*—1,600*l.*, a balance due from his first treasurership, and 9,000*l.* a balance due on the first part of the second treasurership.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you examine the public cash at the time you became paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—No further than by observing by the books that the balance was in the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where was that 10,000*l.* which you have thus divided into two sums?

Mr. Trotter.—My lord Melville told me that he should account for it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he tell you in whose possession it was?

Mr. Trotter.—He did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive the balance of Exchequer fees?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the distinction between Exchequer fee money and the public money deposited at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—Exchequer fee money is imprested into the hands of the treasurer of the navy, who allows the paymaster to have entirely the management of it, for the purpose of paying fees at the Exchequer, and some other contingencies.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the Exchequer fee money imprested to the treasurer of the navy in the same manner as the other public money?

Mr. Trotter.—It is the only instance in which it differs.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what manner does it differ?

Mr. Trotter.—The treasurer, or rather the paymaster, having the sole management of that business, applies to the Treasury for 3,000*l.* at a time, as he finds his funds are nearly exhausted or reduced under the sum of 3,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Does that application to the Treasury originate with the treasurer himself?

Mr. Trotter.—It is put in execution by the paymaster; it may, perhaps, originate with the treasurer, because the paymaster signs all documents for the treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does the paymaster transact every part of the duty of the treasurer, by virtue of the power of attorney made to him?

Mr. Trotter.—All the public duties of the office, as far as I recollect, except that of appointing the clerks.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does the treasurer of the navy do any public duties of the office, or interfere in drafts for cash, after the appointment of his paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any instance of his having drawn drafts during the time I acted as his paymaster.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where was the public money, exclusive of the Exchequer fee money, when you took upon you that appointment?

Mr. Trotter.—It was in the hands of Mr. Archibald Douglas, Mr. Douglas's son.

Mr. Whitbread.—I mean, exclusive of the Exchequer fee money, where was the public money?

Mr. Trotter.—Part of it was in the Bank of England, and part in the sub-accountants of the treasurer of the navy's hands.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you mean exclusive always of the 10,600*l.* for which lord Melville had told you he should account?

Mr. Trotter.—I mean so; having mentioned that sum, I did not think it necessary to repeat it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the public money continue in the Bank of England? I mean to put the question, exclusive of Exchequer fee money: Did all the public money continue in the Bank of England all the time you were paymaster, excepting the money that was in the hands of sub-accountants?

Mr. Trotter.—Of the money which I had taken under my management, there were many exceptions.

Mr. Whitbread.—What do you mean by the money which you had taken under your management? and where was that money?

Mr. Trotter.—I mean in consequence of my having made an application to lord Melville for liberty to draw part of those balances from the Bank, and to place them in the hand of a private banker, for the convenience of official transactions.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who was that private banker?

Mr. Trotter.—Coutts and Company, in the Strand.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you draw all your drafts from the Bank in the forms prescribed by the act of parliament?

Mr. Trotter.—To the best of my knowledge and remembrance, I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether you meant to pay them immediately to the sub-accountants, or to place them in the house of Messieurs Coutts, was the same form always used in both those cases? Did you always draw according to the terms of the act?

Mr. Trotter.—I always drew, to the best of my remembrance and belief, in the same form.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever draw a draft upon the Bank of England, specifying Pay-branch, and deposit the money arising from that draft in the house of Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly.

Mr. Whitbread.—And the same in the Navy-branch?

Mr. Trotter.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Whitbread.—And the same in the Victualling-branch?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had you at any time any of the money so drawn under the terms of the act, which you took under your own management, in the hands of other persons, besides those of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—I had.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had you ever with Mr. Sprot?

Mr. Trotter.—I had.

Mr. Whitbread.—With Mr. Montague Lind?

Mr. Trotter.—Mr. Lind, as a friend, used to assist me in negotiating business; but I do not recollect the having lent him any money.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had you ever any in the hands of any house of credit and repute, at Edinburgh?

Mr. Trotter.—I had.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had you ever government security, such as navy, victualling, and transport bills, purchased with such money?

Mr. Trotter.—I had.

Mr. Whitbread.—And Exchequer bills?

Mr. Trotter.—Yes, I had.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever discount the bills of any private individuals with that money?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect the having transacted such business myself; but my friend, Mr. Lind, and others whom I have employed, undoubtedly have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you employ persons to discount the bills of private individuals of good repute, with that money, through the medium of friends or agents?

Mr. Trotter.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you ever absent from the Navy-pay-office, with permission of your principal?

Mr. Trotter.—I have been.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom, during those absences, did you confide the management of public money, both at Mr. Coutts's, in the hands you have stated, and at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—To Mr. Thomas Wilson.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what way did Mr. Thomas Wilson draw, or in what way was he authorized to draw on your account?

Mr. Trotter.—As I did not wish to propose to my lord Melville to authorize any other person than myself to draw from the Bank, I found it necessary, in case of illness, or occasional absence from the office, when sudden demands were made upon the accountants for payment of money to leave in Mr. Wilson's hands drafts signed by myself.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those drafts left in blank with regard to the sum?

Mr. Trotter.—That was necessary.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those blank checks so given to Mr. Wilson both upon the house of Coutts, and also upon the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—No, only upon the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the power of drawing unlimited?

Mr. Trotter.—It was; I did not mean to deny that Mr. Wilson had also liberty to draw upon Mr. Coutts, but it was not under the same form.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had Mr. Wilson also power to draw on Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—He had.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what form?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I gave him any written authority, though I suppose I must; as Coutts's house is so correct, I must have given them a written authority to answer demands he might make upon my account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had Messieurs Coutts unlimited authority to answer the drafts of Mr. Wilson on your account?

Mr. Trotter.—They had.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had Mr. Wilson instructions from you, during your absence, to employ public money for your advantage, in the same way in which you employed it while you were present?

Mr. Trotter.—He had my verbal instructions.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he act upon those instructions?

Mr. Trotter.—He did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you actually make profit of the public money so placed in various hands, in the manner you have now stated?

Mr. Trotter.—I did; I never meant to conceal it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Through whose hands, or whom did you first employ to make profit of the public money for you?

Mr. Trotter.—That I do not distinctly recollect.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was Mr. Jellicoe a person so employed by you?

Mr. Trotter.—He was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever act as a private agent to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I have always endeavoured to be of what service I could to his lordship in the transaction of his private business, but without any formal appointment, as an agent.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did the first transaction of agency by you, on the part of lord Melville (though not by any appointment from his lordship), take place?

Mr. Trotter.—It is impossible for me to recollect, as I do not recollect the instance.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did it take place before your appointment of paymaster of the navy?

Mr. Trotter.—It did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—When you were first in the Navy-pay-office, in the character of a clerk, at a salary of 50*l.* a year, were you in any way known to lord Melville in that office?

Mr. Trotter.—I had the honour of being introduced to his lordship.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect in what year, and about what time, you were so introduced to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I think about the year 1782.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was your salary in the office at that time?

Mr. Trotter.—I have already stated it to be not more than 100*l.* I do not know whether it had varied from the first salary I had when I went into the office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you, after you became paymaster, receive the salary of lord Melville, as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Trotter.—I did, by virtue of a general power of attorney.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive lord Melville's salary, as his private agent, when lord Melville held other appointments under government?

Mr. Trotter.—I received no other regular salary of lord Melville's into my hands.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive his salary as president of the board of control, for instance?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—As keeper of the privy seal of Scotland?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—As keeper of the signet?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive the income of lord Melville's private estates in Scotland?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not receive them regularly; remittances have been made to me from Scotland, but I did not know from what sources they came.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you agent, to receive regularly the income from lord Melville's estates in Scotland?

Mr. Trotter.—I was not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you regularly receive the income of any estates, which lord Melville might have in England?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive the dividends from any public stock belonging to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I did receive such dividends.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you keep any account between yourself and lord Melville, as debtor and creditor?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you now produce such account?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot; I have no account in my possession that I can command, excepting one, that is in the possession of the managers of the impeachment.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what way, in what form, upon what paper, or in what book was that account kept?

Mr. Trotter.—I kept the account in a small account-book of my own.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was a copy or a statement of that account regularly furnished by you to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It was frequently, but not regularly.

Mr. Whitbread.—When so furnished, did lord Melville sign that account, and you also? and were duplicates of that account made?

Mr. Trotter.—There were duplicates made; he did sign them generally, I believe always when I presented them.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those duplicates so signed by you and your principal, one part of them left in the hands of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you carry to the credit of that account all sums of money which you received on account of lord Melville for salary and all occasional remittances from Scotland?

Mr. Trotter.—I carried them to the credit of lord Melville in his accounts with me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was interest, on either side, charged on that account?

Mr. Trotter.—There was none.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you advance to the debit of that account any sum of money to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I have advanced sums of money to lord Melville, and placed them to the debit of that account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you in 1786, or thereabouts, advance any specific sums to lord Melville that went to the debit of that account?

Mr. Trotter.—As nearly as I recollect I did advance specific sums to lord Melville, and placed them to the debit of that account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any security given for those sums?

Mr. Trotter.—His lordship granted me a bond and security for 4,000*l.* which I advanced him in or about that year.

Mr. Whitbread.—From what fund was that money or those sums composing the 4,000*l.* advanced?

Mr. Trotter.—I was enabled to advance that sum of money to his lordship, from the fund which I have already explained; having had the control of that which was put into my hands, for the purpose of paying Exchequer fees, and as I had money upon two different treasurerships, which would not probably be called for, but had always been allowed to remain in the paymaster's hands, for the trouble of making up the ex-treasurer's accounts, I knew that money would not be called for till I should leave the office, or the accounts should be audited, and from that account I advanced his lordship 4,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that sum of 4000*l.* so advanced by you, bear interest?

Mr. Trotter.—I charged no interest to his lordship for that sum.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the bond bear upon the face of it, that it was with interest, or without?

Mr. Trotter.—It did not bear upon the face of it, that no interest was to be paid; but no interest was expressed to be paid.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was interest expressed to be paid upon the face of the bond?

Mr. Trotter.—It was not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Why did you advance a sum of money to lord Melville without interest?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not feel myself entitled to charge his lordship interest for money which had been put into my hand, under the situations which I have described.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you describe to lord Melville the reason why you did not charge interest?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not; nor did I press it upon his lordship's attention so much as to know, whether he ever knew that it did bear interest or not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was this 4000*l.* so stated to have been without interest and upon bond, entered in the account which you have stated?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it to have been the first article in that account; but I am only speaking from recollection; and it being at a very distant period, I beg to say, it is only from recollection that I do state it.

Mr. Whitbread.—To the best of your recollection and belief, was that the first item in the account?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the title of the account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was entitled an account current.

Mr. Whitbread.—In the account current, so kept between you and lord Melville, were other advances made on the account of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—As I was in the habit of receiving all his dividends, and his salary, as treasurer of the navy, of course I debited his lordship with payments that I made for those sums.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you also credit lord Melville for all the dividends received upon those sums?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you direct a purchase to be made on account of lord Melville of 2,000*l.* India stock, in or about the year 1792?

Mr. Trotter.—My attention has been called to that circumstance from seeing the entry in the tenth report, and I have no reason to doubt that I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—To the best of your knowledge did you, or did you not give such direction?

Mr. Trotter.—I really have no doubt that I did give such directions; although I have no actual remembrance of it, I can venture to say that I did give such directions.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know, or have you any knowledge from what fund the money was taken with which that 2,000*l.* India stock was purchased?

Mr. Trotter.—I have already said that I had drawn money from the bank, and put it into the hands of Coutts and company; these sums having created credit to me at Coutts's house, I then drew upon Coutts for money to pay for that stock.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that 2,000*l.* stock bought on the account of, and for the benefit of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the dividends of that stock carried to the credit of his account current with you?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no doubt that they were; I am obliged to speak under that reserve, from having no documents of my own to refer to; but, from looking at the account at Coutts's house, I am satisfied that the dividends of that stock were carried to the credit of lord Melville's account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you direct to be purchased a certain quantity of stock, commonly called the loyalty loan, in or about the year 1797?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was a certain quantity of the loyalty loan subscribed to for the benefit of, or on account of lord Melville, by you or under your authority, or paid for with money coming from out of the funds you have described before?

Mr. Trotter.—There was no such stock subscribed for by me or purchased by me; I believe the payments were made by Mr. Coutts's house, as far as I can understand and recollect, and they were afterwards repaid by me to Coutts's house.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that loyalty loan, the price of which was so originally paid by Coutts and repaid by you to Coutts, for the benefit or on account of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It was repaid by me to Mr. Coutts for lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the dividends upon that loyalty loan carried to the credit of lord Melville, in the account current between his lordship and you?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the quantity of that stock so purchased for lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I understood, from the first question upon this subject, that it was 10,000*l.* then alluded to; it must therefore be 10,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Was lord Melville debited in the account current between his lordship and you for that sum of 10,000*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe he was.

Mr. Whitbread.—From what sources did you derive that sum of 10,000*l.* to repay Messieurs Coutts for the purchase of that loyalty loan?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot state the sources distinctly and separately as they were upon different payments, unless I had documents before me which I have not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those payments, in fact, paid from the public money which you had in the hands of Mr. Coutts?

Mr. Plumer.—I feel a great reluctance upon a question of this nature to offer any interruption; it is painful to me to interpose upon any question, but particularly upon an inquiry like the present, for obvious reasons; and, therefore, I have rather submitted to many questions that in strictness are not regular, than interpose an objection; but I do wish that the gentleman now under examination, when he speaks of transactions, will speak from what he knows of his own knowledge.

Mr. Whitbread.—I beg the witness may be directed to withdraw, while the counsel state any objection to the question.

Lord Chancellor.—The witness must withdraw.

[The witness withdrew.]

Mr. Whitbread.—If Mr. Plumer has any objection to the last question I put, I will waive that question, and endeavour to put one in a more regular form.

Mr. Plumer.—If the question is waived, I have nothing to trouble the Court with upon it; but it may save time, if I merely state that the nature of some part of the examination of this witness is, to interrogate the witness to transactions, of which he states himself to possess no memory, except what he has collected from the tenth report, or from the accounts of other persons.—Your lordships observe that he was interrogated particularly with respect to 2,000*l.* stock, of which he stated he had no recollection but from what he collected in the tenth report and Coutts's accounts, and from thence he derived his recollection and inference of such a transaction having taken place. It is of great importance to us that he should speak to those transactions only of which he has a recollection, in order that we may be enabled from that recollection, to possess your lordships not of a part of the transactions only, but of the whole.

Mr. Whitbread.—I am sure the learned counsel does not mean to interrupt this examination for the sake of interruption; and I beg to correct the statement he has just now made: that Mr. Trotter spoke as to one transaction from the tenth report only. True it is he mentioned his recollection being refreshed by the tenth report, but he concluded by saying that he had no doubt of the fact he asserted.

Mr. Plumer.—I did not state that Mr. Trotter derived his knowledge from the tenth report only, but that the witness stated he derived that knowledge, which enabled him to pronounce that opinion upon the subject, partly from the tenth report, and partly from Coutts's account; neither of which are sources from which the witness could legally and properly speak.

Mr. Whitbread.—I conceive the witness spoke from his own memory, having refreshed it as he thought proper.

Then Alexander Trotter, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—From what fund or funds did you derive those various payments which constituted the 10,000*l.* repaid to Messieurs Coutts for the purchase of that loyalty loan?

Mr. Trotter.—Some of the payments I drew from the Bank, and put into Messieurs Coutts's hand, others I drew from my private account at Mr. Coutts's and paid them into the account of lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that private account from which you gave some of these drafts, consist of public money, and a part of it of private money?

Mr. Trotter.—It consisted of both.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you purchase, or direct to be purchased, a certain sum of 7,000*l.* 3 per cent. reduced annuities, for or on account of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I directed stock to that amount to be purchased, I believe.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the dividends of that stock carried to the credit of lord Melville in the account current between lord Melville and you?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any interest charged by you upon any of the sums heretofore specified, 2,000*l.* India stock, 10,000*l.* loyalty loan, and 7,000*l.* 3 per cent reduced?

Mr. Trotter.—I have already mentioned, that I placed these sums into my account current with lord Melville, and that I never charged lord Melville interest upon that account, nor did I charge myself interest, when the balance of that account happened to be in his lordship's favour.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you direct payments to be made to private individuals, on account of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I have, frequently.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you direct a certain sum of money to be paid on account of lord Melville, to the account of sir William Forbes and company in Edinburgh?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe I did, from the documents that I have seen.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you any doubt of that fact?

Mr. Trotter.—I have none; but at the same time I have no recollection of it.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—This is one of the transactions which affords an instance of the nature of the objection I before stated; and I submit that no part of the account this witness has given, relative to a remittance to the house of Forbes and Company, at Edinburgh, ought to be received, because the witness has uniformly declared he had no recollection upon the subject. He has stated also, that he had in another place directly negatived it; but he states that he had been shown other papers and documents of other persons, from whence it is that he now derives the inference of such a transaction having taken place; and, giving credence to those other papers and other representations, from thence he states that he has no doubt of the truth of the transaction.

But it is of consequence to us to have those other persons before your lordships, in order that those who can speak to it may be interrogated by the house, respecting all the particulars attending it. Therefore I object to Mr. Trotter's account of it, which is only second-hand information, derived from other quarters, having himself no recollection upon the subject, yet saying he has no doubt upon it. A person may have full credit in the books and papers of another, and from thence be able to state he has no doubt about any supposed fact of which he knows nothing.

Mr. Adam.—I take it to be perfectly clear, that wherever a witness speaks from his own recollection positively and distinctly, or where he speaks from any memorandum that he has taken at the time, to which he can refer as having been taken at the time, that the witness may be heard to that recollection to speak to the fact: but I take it to be equally clear that the witness cannot refresh his memory or create his memory by having reference to the books, writings, or conversations of another person; and that what Mr. Trotter now says he has no doubt about, arises from this; and as it is contrary to the law of evidence to admit such testimony, I trust your lordships will think it necessary to confine the honorable manager to such questions, and the witness to those answers which will fall within that rule.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons being always extremely desirous to save the time of this Court, are extremely happy that they have a memorandum of Mr. Trotter's, written at the time, to put into his hand.

Then Alexander Trotter, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that letter now in your hand, of your hand-writing?

Mr. Trotter.—This letter is of my hand-writing.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the whole your hand-writing.

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read that, in order to refresh your memory; read first aloud to the Court the date of it?

Mr. Trotter.—The date is the 18th of July, 1787.

Lord Chancellor.—Read the whole of it to yourself, so as to enable you (as far as it can) to answer the questions that shall be proposed to you.

Mr. Whitbread.—Having now read the letter, does it enable you to speak from your memory, so refreshed, whether you did pay in a sum of money into the house of sir William Forbes and Company, at Edinburgh?

Mr. Trotter.—I am satisfied that I gave such directions, though I do not remember the circumstance.

Mr. Whitbread.—From that memorandum, are you satisfied that you gave such directions?

Mr. Trotter.—Perfectly so.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount?

Mr. Trotter.—2,000*l*.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that sum of 2,000*l*. carried to the debit of lord Melville in the account current, and when?

Mr. Trotter.—It was carried to the debit of lord Melville's account with me; but as his lordship had more than one account, I do not recollect which account it was carried to.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it carried to the debit of some account between lord Melville and you?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any interest charged upon that 2,000*l*. in that account, whatever account it might have been?

Mr. Trotter.—No.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect, from having looked at that document, in your own hand-writing, and made at the time, any advance directed by you to be made to the account of lord Melville to the house of Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, in Edinburgh?

Mr. Trotter.—The same letter specifies the sum of 3,374*l*. to have been paid by my directions to Messieurs Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, on lord Melville's account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any security given to you for either of those sums from lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—None that I recollect; but having no recollection of the transaction at all, I can recollect no collateral circumstance attending it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the last sum you have mentioned carried to the debit of lord

Melville, in any account between his lordship and you?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the amount of that sum so paid by you to Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company?

Mr. Trotter.—3,374*l*.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any interest charged upon that sum, between lord Melville and you?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe none to have been charged.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the balance of the account current, between you and lord Melville, more generally on one side or the other?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—On which side?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville was generally indebted to me.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount, upon an average, in that account current?

Mr. Trotter.—I am perfectly unable to state that circumstance.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you recollect whereabouts it might be?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot, unless any particular time was specified, and then I do not believe I could do it.

Mr. Whitbread.—When was that account current brought to a settlement?

Mr. Trotter.—Upon the general settlement which I had with his Lordship, at the time he left the Navy-pay-office.

Mr. Whitbread.—When was that?

Mr. Trotter.—I think upon the 31st of May, 1800.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was a transcript of that account, or the account itself, presented to lord Melville at that time?

Mr. Trotter.—I made out a general statement of his lordship's business as far as I was connected with him, and that account was particularly specified as well as others.

Mr. Whitbread.—At that time, in whose favour was the balance?

Mr. Trotter.—The balance was in my favour.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount, or whereabouts was the balance in your favour?

Mr. Trotter.—I presume your lordships mean the general statement, including all his account.

Mr. Whitbread.—The account current only, I was speaking to now; however, I will postpone that question to a future opportunity, to avoid confusion. Do you recollect another advance in the year 1789, about the month of July, to sir William Forbes and Company?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you any recollection of the sum of 3,000*l*. advanced about the 17th of the same month to Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, on account of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of that circumstance; I have seen both sums stated in the Tenth Report, but I have no other means of recollecting it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at that paper. Is that your hand-writing at the bottom of that paper?

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read that, and see whether you can refresh your memory by it; it is a memorandum, dated 5th January, 1790; the transaction took place in 1789. Can you now, from having refreshed your memory by the documents in your hand, state whether you did advance on account of lord Melville, to sir William Forbes and Company, 1,000*l*. in the month of July, 1789?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of that particular transaction; and I hope it will not appear extraordinary to you, when it is considered the multiplicity of the transactions that went through my hand, during the time I acted in that public capacity, and which appears in the Tenth Report.

Mr. Whitbread.—But are you able to speak to the fact by referring to the paper you hold in your hand?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no doubt about the fact, from its being in a signed account between my brother at Edinburgh and myself, and it is stated to be transmitted to the House, at Edinburgh, through my brother.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you any doubt as to the other sum advanced to Mansfield, Ramsay and Company?

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—I wish to call your lordships attention to the distinction between what a man recollects from papers being shown to him relative to an account between himself and another, and the inference he may draw from such papers. I did not object to the paper being put into Mr. Trotter's hands for the purpose of refreshing his memory, although it is not of a contemporaneous date; but I permitted him to look at it, to see whether, by the inspection of that paper, he could take upon himself, upon his oath, to say he had any recollection that such a transaction took place. And after reading that paper, the witness says he has no recollection upon that subject. He is still asked whether he has any doubt of the fact. He says "I have no doubt" deriving his inference of the truth of it from that paper, but being asked, can you say you recollect the fact, he answers, "no, I do not know any thing about it." I submit that is not proper evidence to be received.

Mr. Whitbread.—To save the time of the Court I will waive the question.

Then Alexander Trotter, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether there was any other account, besides the account current, kept between you and lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—There was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that account also kept in a book?

Mr. Trotter.—It was written in the same book.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the title of that account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was entitled "Chest Account."

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect whether the sum of 10,600*l.* which it was stated by lord Melville that he would account for, when you first became paymaster of the navy, was carried into that account?

Mr. Trotter.—I do recollect that it was stated in that account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did it form the first item of the account?

Mr. Trotter.—It did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were there other sums advanced on account of lord Melville, entered in this Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—There were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the loyalty loan to the amount of 10,000*l.* which you stated to be advanced to lord Melville for the purchase of that stock, and carried to the account current, ever transferred to this Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom did you consider lord Melville to be debtor on the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—I considered lord Melville to be indebted to government for the sums I advanced upon the Chest account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville know that you so considered it?

Mr. Trotter.—I never had any specific conversation with his lordship upon it, so as to enable me to say positively that he did; but the accounts were signed, and duplicates were delivered to his lordship.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was your reason for transferring the loyalty loan money from the account current to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was from an anxiety, an attention to my own interest. Lord Melville was indebted to me as a private individual only upon the account current, and I considered him indebted, as I said before, to government, for the balance upon the Chest account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you state to lord Melville, that you wished or intended to transfer this loyalty loan money, from the account current to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I positively stated it to his lordship, but I delivered accounts which bore it upon the face of them.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those accounts, upon the face of which this transfer was borne, delivered to lord Melville, and signed by him the same as the other accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the duplicates so signed, one part taken by lord Melville and the other part by you?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you charge any interest to lord Melville upon the Chest account, when the balance appeared to be against lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—On which side did the balance on the Chest account usually stand?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville generally stood debtor upon that account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville approve of the transfer of the loyalty loan to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—He neither approved nor disapproved of it. He took the accounts without any consideration.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville, in fact, know, at the time the Chest account was delivered to him, that he was indebted to the public, upon that account, in the sum of 10,000*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—I presented the accounts to his lordship; but, as I had no conversation upon them, I am altogether at a loss to answer that question.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he know of any distinction between the two accounts, respecting the situation of the one account and the other account?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no reason to doubt it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville then know, that upon one account he was indebted immediately to government, and on the other that he was debtor to you?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe he did.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did this Chest account terminate?

Mr. Trotter.—At the general settlement which took place when his lordship left the office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you present to lord Melville a general statement of this Chest account, as well as the account current?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville sign that account, or acknowledge it?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe he did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville, at that time, discharge these two accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—He did, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect what the amount due to you upon those two accounts was?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of the precise specific amount.

Mr. Whitbread.—To the best of your recollection, whereabouts was the amount of these two sums?

Mr. Trotter.—I should think nearly about 50,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you lay before lord Melville, at that time, the differences between the office cash and the cash at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you state that in consequence of lord Melville's intended quitting the Navy-pay-office, there would be a necessity for his providing a sum of money.

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—For what purpose was it necessary to provide that sum of money?

Mr. Trotter.—To make a repayment of the money which his lordship had from the public balances.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that re-payment so to be made by his lordship, consist of the two sums so taken together, the account current and the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—I have explained, that I applied to his lordship for a general settlement at that time, and finding that his lordship pointed out assets sufficient to discharge both, I incorporated the two accounts together, and his lordship paid me the balance of both.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what account was that balance so paid to you placed?

Mr. Trotter.—To discharge the balance upon the Chest account, and upon my account current with his lordship.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where did you pay those balances as soon as you received them?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know that; they went all through the same channel.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where did they center ultimately?

Mr. Trotter.—They must have centered ultimately in the Bank, because I had a larger sum at that time from the Bank upon my own account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did this sum which my lord Melville so paid you, go to make good the differences at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot state from recollection whether the whole went or not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were your differences, as paymaster at the Bank, made good in part by these payments so received of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—As money cannot be identified, I cannot answer that literally, because it may first have gone into Coutts's house, and I may have drawn a larger sum from Coutts's house, which may have made up my balances.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the money so paid by lord Melville, go into Coutts's or any other hands, for the purpose of ultimately making good these differences at the Bank, or a part of them?

Mr. Trotter.—I presume they must ultimately have been applied to that purpose, as I had a much larger sum to pay at the Bank than upon my own account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you consider that money, before it was paid by lord Melville, as a part of the difference owing to the public?

Mr. Trotter.—I have stated that a part of the balance, that was due upon the Chest account, I looked upon as due to the public, the other as a balance due to myself; and whether I paid that money afterwards into the Bank, in whole, or not, upon my own account, I do not know.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you consider that your own difference to the public was increased by as much as lord Melville was debtor to you upon the account current?

Mr. Trotter.—I did, as far as I can understand the question.

Mr. Whitbread.—If, for instance, exclusive of the account current, your difference consisted of 20,000*l.* and the account current consisted of 25,000*l.* was the difference increased to 45,000*l.* by the payment of lord Melville to you?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not understand the question.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was your difference, your debt to the public, swelled by the debt owed to you on the account current of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—If I understand the question, certainly not necessarily.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it in fact so increased on account of the debt lord Melville owed to you?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know whether it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—If you had not had any balance due to you from lord Melville, on the account current, on the 31st May, 1800, would you have had so great a difference at the Bank as then existed?

Mr. Trotter.—I may have chosen to take the balance which lord Melville owed to me into another channel, in which case it would have made no difference in the cash in the Bank; and, as the fact did not exist, I cannot say what I would have done in such cases.

Mr. Whitbread.—If lord Melville had not paid to you the sum due upon the private account, to enable you to pay that sum into the Bank, must you not have been under the necessity of providing that sum of money elsewhere?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville understand then, that the discharge of these two accounts was to enable you to make good your differences at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly not; lord Melville understood that so much of it was due upon the Chest account; I believe he understood that was to make good his lordship's difference at the Bank, and the other was to be in repayment of a sum of money which he owed me upon my account current.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether you gave directions in or about the year 1789 or 1790 for the purchase of another sum of East India stock for the benefit of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I gave directions in the year 1789, to purchase a sum of East India stock for the benefit of lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you enabled, from your memory, to state what passed between lord Melville and yourself upon that subject?

Mr. Trotter.—I will state the transaction as far as my memory will carry me, which was in consequence of a conversation I had with his lordship, in which he stated his opinion of the value of East India stock, from the probable rise that would take place ultimately in that stock; and I observed to his lordship, that if he was impressed with so good an opinion of that stock, that I thought in consideration of his own interest he ought to invest a sum of money in that stock.—His lordship's observations seemed to throw it aside, by saying, that he had no money to invest in stock. I had mentioned to his lordship, that there were considerable balances lying at all times in my hands that were not called for, and in all probability would not be called for, from circumstances that I need not, perhaps, relate at this time; but it was money lying unclaimed in my hands, which it would not be necessary to advance to the public until it was claimed, and there was no prospect of that claim taking place soon; and I advised his lordship to give me leave to lay out so much of that money as would buy about 13,000*l.* or 14,000*l.* East India stock, but which his lordship refused in the most pointed and decided manner, insomuch that I was afraid I had incurred his lordship's displeasure by proposing it; but it occurred to me at the same moment, that it would be possible to borrow a sum of money upon the security of that stock, and I proposed to his lordship that I should endeavour to do so; and that I should lay out that money in the purchase of East India stock; to which his lordship readily assented. I mentioned that I then lived with a relation of my own, who was a man of considerable importance in the city, and that he would be enabled to raise this sum of money for me; in short, I made it an easy matter to his lordship; but when I applied to Mr. Lind, the gentleman to whom I alluded, I found that I was deceived, and that it was not an easy matter to raise money upon that security. But I was unwilling to disappoint his lordship in what I had so sanguinely told him I could effect, and I never acquainted his lordship with the difficulty that had arisen; but I assisted Mr. Lind by advancing money from the public money which I had the management of. I never had occasion afterwards to mention the circumstance to lord Melville until April in the last year, and he was perfectly unacquainted with my having made use of the public money in that transaction; and I charged his lordship a regular interest, for the whole of the money which I advanced in that transaction, from the first day it was advanced, until the final settlement of our accounts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville never inquire the name of the lender of that money?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that his lordship ever did: I had stated, in such positive terms, that Mr. Lind could do it, that I never found it necessary to mention the circumstance again to lord Melville, but took it for granted, that he had thought I had concluded the transaction in the manner that I had supposed it could be effected.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you mention Mr. Lind's name to lord Melville at the time?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the dividends upon that stock carried to the credit of lord Melville's account?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you direct any transfer to be made to lord Melville of any part of that stock, at any time, previous to the year 1800?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of that circumstance; it was mentioned to me yesterday, but I do not recollect it.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the amount of the sum originally expended in the purchase of this stock?

Mr. Trotter.—I have stated it in another place, and I have no reason to alter my opinion now, from recollection that it was about 23,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the debt, for the purchase of that stock, continue to that amount, until the stock was replaced or repaid for?

Mr. Trotter.—It did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what manner and to what amount was it diminished?

Mr. Trotter.—It was diminished by payments from his lordship to me, to the sum of 20,000*l.*; upon which his lordship continued to pay interest to me, until the final settlement of our accounts.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what manner was the 3,000*l.* repaid to you?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no distinct recollection of it; but I believe I have been paid at two different times.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the 3,000*l.* so paid, carried to the credit of either lord Melville's Chest account, or his account current with you?

Mr. Trotter.—It was not.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what credit, then, was it carried?

Mr. Trotter.—It was carried to the credit of the debt which was upon the stock.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom was that 3,000*l.* paid?

Mr. Trotter.—As I had advanced the money for the stock myself, of course it was repaid to myself.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that East India stock in your possession, or was it still placed for the benefit of lord Melville, in May 1800, when he quitted the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—He was possessed of it in the manner I have described; it was held in trust by the house of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and Company, and subject to my control.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it subject to your control, during the whole time that it was out?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any interruption of it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the dividends always carried to lord Melville's credit?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe they were.

Mr. Whitbread.—At the time that you proposed to lord Melville to purchase East India stock for him, out of the public balances, lying in your hands unclaimed, did lord Melville ask you the amount of such balances?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that he did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he inquire whether you had in your hands assigned or unassigned balances, or whether you had both or either?

Mr. Trotter.—I never had any conversation with his lordship upon the subject?

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you ever restricted by lord Melville in any way as to the quantity of money you were to keep out of the Bank at the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville left the management of the balances in the Bank entirely to me. I believe I enjoyed his lordship's confidence to the fullest extent, and he never interfered.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any restriction upon you, as to the sums to be taken out of the Bank for that purpose?

Mr. Trotter.—There were none.

Mr. Whitbread.—There were no restrictions as to the branches upon which you were to draw, when you took money from the Bank to place it at Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville never interfered with me in the management of the balances of the Pay office.

Mr. Whitbread.—I asked, if there were any restrictions as to the branches upon which you were to draw, when you took money from the Bank to place at Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—I have not the least idea of the meaning of the question.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville say that you might or might not draw upon the Pay branch, that you might or might not draw upon the Victualling branch, that you might or might not draw upon the Navy branch, or did he mention any restriction as to either of them?

Mr. Trotter.—I have already said, lord Melville never gave me any instructions, with regard to managing the balances of the office; therefore I do not know what the honourable manager means by restrictions upon it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville order you not to draw upon this or that branch for any purpose?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever draw drafts in favour of the right honourable Henry Dundas, in your account at Coutts's?

Mr. Trotter.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever draw drafts in favour of Mr. Dundas?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever draw drafts in favour of Henry Dundas?

Mr. Trotter.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do all these three descriptions mean the same person, the treasurer of the Navy?

Mr. Trotter.—They did, unless some exceptions may exist in case of my having drawn in favour of Mr. Robert Dundas.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those drafts in general in favour of the treasurer of the Navy, with small exceptions?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you use either of those names—"Mr. Dundas, Henry Dundas, or, the right honourable Henry Dundas," in the drafts on Messieurs Coutts, without the payment being made either to lord Melville, or some person on account of lord Melville, or some person having a money connexion with lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It is probable I never did; but so many transactions of this sort took place, that it is impossible for me to say that there were no exceptions.

Mr. Whitbread.—I ask, generally speaking?

Mr. Trotter.—Generally speaking, they have collateral connexion with lord Melville's accounts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was this East India stock, in May 1800, when lord Melville went out of office, either sold or pledged, for the purpose of making up your differences at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—It was disposed of at that time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any increase upon the value of that stock, from the time at which it was bought to the time at which it was either so sold or pledged?

Mr. Trotter.—The stock had risen.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what account was the money, obtained upon the stock, either sold or pledged, carried?

Mr. Trotter.—20,000*l.* to pay off the debt upon that stock, and 8,000*l.* of it went to pay me in part liquidation of the balance upon my account current.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had lord Melville, in fact, the benefit of the rise of that stock?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly he had, and the loss would also have accrued to his lordship, in case the stock had fallen.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had he the benefit of the excess of dividends, above the interest of five per cent paid for the money, during the whole time there was such an excess?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know that the dividend did exceed the interest which he paid upon it, especially at first, I believe it did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there at any time a rise upon that, between the time the stock was purchased, and the time it was sold?

Mr. Trotter.—There was a rise upon the dividends on the stock, several years after it was purchased upon his lordship's account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any security of any kind given to Mr. Lind, for this purchase of East India stock?

Mr. Trotter.—The stock was invested in his name some time after, not immediately, as I have understood from a document which has been lately put into my hands.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the accounts, which you from time to time, delivered to lord Melville, though not delivered at regular periods, include all the receipts and payments made and received by you, on account of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—They did, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you, at the close of the year 1790, make up all the balances of the Navy-pay-office, at the Bank of England?

Mr. Trotter.—The account at the Bank of England, appears by my books to be balanced at that time; but whether the balance was exactly paid in, or not, I cannot ascertain, because some of my drafts may not have been presented, in which case, that would form part of the balance appearing so to be paid in.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the balance at the end of the year 1790, exactly struck, and did it appear that there was no deficiency at that time?

Mr. Trotter.—They appeared to be; I could speak with more precision, if the accounts were laid before me, which I have not had the advantage of for some time past.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you make up the difference between the balance of the one account and the other, at the end of the year 1791?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot speak from recollection; my documents are in the hands of the honourable managers, and I probably should be able to speak with more precision, if they were laid before me.

Mr. Whitbread.—If there was any difference between the office cash and the Bank cash, in the end of the year 1791, of what money did that difference consist?

Mr. Trotter.—It would consist of drafts of mine which had not been presented at the Bank, in part, and in part of the sum of money which lord Melville was indebted to the Chest account, and to me upon my account current.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that balance you are now speaking of, comprehend both the Chest account and the account current?

Mr. Trotter.—It did, to the best of my recollection of the accounts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the balances so outstanding, from 1791 to 1799, comprehend those balances so due from lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—They did, to the best of my recollection, of the settled accounts always, but a small account may have existed upon the account current, which was not included in that.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the difference between the office and the Bank balance, at the end of each of those years which you have specified, denote, with a trifling exception, the sum of money which was to be made good by payments from lord Melville, to the public and to you?

Mr. Trotter.—They did, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did you continue in office after lord Melville left it?

Mr. Trotter.—Upwards of two years.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who was treasurer of the navy after lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Harrowby succeeded lord Melville; Mr. Bathurst succeeded lord Harrowby, and Mr. Tierney succeeded Mr. Bathurst.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any interruption given, by either of those treasurers, to the practice of taking the money from the Bank, and placing it in the hands of Mr. Coutts, or any private individuals?

Mr. Trotter.—Mr. Bathurst ordered it to be altogether done away.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that order carried strictly into execution?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know how I must be pinned down to the word strictly; Mr. Bathurst did not press it to be done within a few days, but to do it with convenience to myself; that I might do it in the space of a month or so; there was no time defined.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it done within the month?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you continue in the situation of paymaster, after the money was so placed at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did you quit the office?

Mr. Trotter.—I left the office in one month after Mr. Tierney succeeded to the situation of treasurer of the navy; I do not recollect the time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you ever after appointed paymaster of the navy?

Mr. Trotter.—I was, by Mr. Canning.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the same practice, that had been ordered by Mr. Bathurst, prevail during the treasurership of Mr. Canning?

Mr. Trotter.—It did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the balance upon the Chest account always against lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any security of any sort signed by lord Melville to you, or to any other person, on account of the India stock so purchased?

Mr. Trotter.—None.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did you quit the Navy-pay-office altogether?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe in the April in last year; I have no recollection of the precise day.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you, while you were paymaster of the navy, make any cash payment with your own hand, on account of the public?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I ever did, excepting in Exchequer fees.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you always issue your money by drafts to your sub-accountants?

Mr. Trotter.—I recollect one or two instances wherein I did not; having a sum of money in the Iron Chest, I issued to them.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those exceptions to the general rule few?

Mr. Trotter.—Very few.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever draw drafts upon the Bank of England, and go yourself, or send others to take cash or bank-notes from the Bank, to be paid either to Messieurs Coutts, or elsewhere?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know that I ever did it personally; but I have sent others to do so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you, or any other persons, received such money without passing it through the hands of Mr. Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no knowledge of its ever having been done; I have been informed it has been done.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect no instance of notes having been brought from the Bank of England, without passing through the hands of Messieurs Coutts.

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any myself; my instructions were generally given to Mr. Wilson, who managed that for me, or Mr. Tweedy of the Pay-office. I am told that has happened more than once, but have no recollection of it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect drawing one day for a million of money, and having received a million of money, without passing through the house of Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—I never drew for a million of money but once in my life, and that money went into the hands of Coutts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it paid into Coutts's hands in bank-notes, or was the draft given to them?

Mr. Trotter.—My draft was given to the principal money conductor of the Pay-office, who went into the Bank with that draft; the notes being divided into a great number of small notes, and he brought that directly, and put it into the house of Coutts, as I understand.

Mr. Whitbread.—Then it was put into Coutts's bank in bank-notes, and not in the shape of a draft?

Mr. Trotter.—I drew a draft as usual upon the Bank, but instead of giving the draft to Coutts's, I gave it to the money conductor, who carried it to the Bank, and took the Bank notes to Coutts's.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever draw for small sums, either upon the Bank, or upon the house of Coutts, for public services?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know what the honourable manager may call a small sum.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever draw for a less sum than a thousand pounds, either upon the Bank or Messieurs Coutts, on account of the public service?

Mr. Trotter.—I make no doubt I have often done so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever make any small payments on account of the public service, excepting Exchequer fees?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any, unless it were re-payments into the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—According to the nature and to the practice of the Pay-office, since that account, have payments been made by the paymaster in the ordinary course of the office?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any. I do not know what the honourable manager alludes to.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do any payments to any public creditors pass, in the usual form of business, through the hands of the paymasters?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are not they all made by the sub-accountant?

Mr. Trotter.—They are, as I said before, except with regard to the Exchequer fees.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever receive any gratuity from lord Melville, for acting as his agent?

Mr. Trotter.—Never.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the book in which you kept the account current and the Chest account destroyed?

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are all the books containing any accounts between lord Melville and you, and the vouchers, destroyed?

Mr. Trotter.—They are, to the best of my belief.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever lose one of these books whilst they were in existence?

Mr. Trotter.—I was robbed of one of those books at one time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you recover it again?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—How did you get it again?

Mr. Trotter.—I received it from one of the magistrates of the public office, in Hatton-garden.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that one of the books in which the account current and Chest account, between you and lord Melville, was entered?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at this paper, is that signed by you?

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—What does that paper purport to be?

Mr. Trotter.—It purports to be an account current between lord Melville and myself, dated, commencing in the year 1802.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that an account balanced?

Mr. Trotter.—It appears to be so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it signed by both parties?

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you any vouchers in your hand connected with that paper?

Mr. Trotter.—Here are vouchers, but I do not know whether they belong to it or not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to them.

Mr. Trotter.—They do not seem to refer to the account, they are of subsequent date, I see no reference whatever.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are they vouchers of any accounts between lord Melville and you?

Mr. Trotter.—They are vouchers of three payments, which I appear to have made upon lord Melville's account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the sheet now in your hand of the nature of those accounts, which you delivered to lord Melville, at certain periods?

Mr. Trotter.—They are.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the accounts so delivered by you, at certain periods, both on the chest and the current account, so signed as that paper in your hand is signed?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom did you give the direction for the purchase of 2,000*l.* India stock, in 1792, for the benefit of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I can only judge from that circumstance, that most part of my transactions of that sort went through the house of Coutts and Company, and I have no doubt my directions were there placed.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom were the directions given for the purchase of 10,000*l.* of the loyalty loan, in 1797?

Mr. Trotter.—I gave no directions respecting that, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom did you give directions for the purchase of the 7,000*l.* three per cent reduced?

Mr. Trotter.—I presume also to the house of Messieurs Coutts and Company.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does Mr. Philip Antrobus, the broker, act for that house?

Mr. Trotter.—I have heard so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that he did, at that time, act for that house?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it, but I do not know it.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to ask the honourable managers whether they will have occasion to call this witness again?

Mr. Whitbread.—I do not know that they will, but I do not say that they will not call him again.

Mr. Plumer.—I did not mean to interrupt their examination, if they go to other matters now, and to examine him upon the whole of his evidence hereafter.

Then Alexander Trotter, esq. was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—You speak of your being appointed paymaster in consequence of the recommendation you stated. Had you had an opportunity of being useful to lord Melville in some regulations respecting the office, previous to your being appointed by him to the office of paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—I, very early after lord Melville's first appointment as treasurer of the navy, presented his lordship with a plan for new regulating the business of the office, which I have understood was much approved of by his lordship.

VOL. XXIX.

Mr. Plumer.—In what year was that?

Mr. Trotter.—I fancy it was in 1782; it was a very short time after his lordship was first appointed treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Plumer.—Some time prior to your being appointed paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—A great many years before.

Mr. Plumer.—In that interval, between the circumstance that first brought you to lord Melville's notice, and your appointment as paymaster, was any intercourse kept up between his lordship and you?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe I was known to his lordship during the time, but I had no particular intercourse with his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—The first circumstance you were interrogated to, after that of your being appointed paymaster, was his lordship's acknowledgment of a balance in his hands of 10,000*l.* At the time lord Melville said that was in his hands, did he not at the same time say it was not applied to any private use or emolument of his own, but to public purposes, from whence it was likely there would be a loss?

Mr. Trotter.—His lordship expressed to me he was afraid that there might be a loss; the conversation might be very pointed, but I do not recollect it so much as to be able to say that his lordship actually stated it to be for public purposes, but it is at a very distant period, and it is not impossible he did.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any the least recollection that lord Melville acknowledged that he had applied it to any purposes of private benefit to himself?

Mr. Trotter.—None.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the sums for the purpose of paying the Exchequer fees, which you have stated, had not for some time been a fund in the hand of the paymaster, which he used for his own emolument, when not wanted by the public?

Mr. Trotter.—I had understood that they had always been in the hands of my predecessors, paymasters of the navy; and that the parts, which were not immediately required for the payment of the public fees, were made use of; and that as soon as the sum in their hands was reduced to under 3,000*l.* it was usual for the paymaster to make an application for a further sum of 3,000*l.* to be imprested into his hand for that purpose. That was the mode that was explained to me when I came into the office, and I received the balances remaining upon two ex-treasurerships; and, soon after my appointment to the office 3,000*l.* was put into my hands to pay the Exchequer fees upon the current treasurer-ship.

Mr. Plumer.—I think you said the money issued for the Exchequer fees, is issued in a different mode from the money issued for public service?

Mr. Trotter.—I did state so.

Mr. Plumer.—State wherein that difference consists?

S O

Mr. Trotter.—All monies issued from the Exchequer, to the treasurer of the navy, are in consequence of a letter from the different boards, connected with that office, desiring him to memorial the Treasury for such sums of money, excepting in the instance of Exchequer fees; he alone is acquainted when they are nearly exhausted, and when he finds them to be nearly exhausted, he includes an application for 3,000*l.* into any memorials to be sent to the Treasury, to be imprested into the treasurer's hands.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it to be understood then that all applications for other sums of money for the public service, must originate with some one of the boards?

Mr. Trotter.—The whole of the money.

Mr. Plumer.—There are different boards that give directions for issuing of money; can any money be issued from the Exchequer to carry on the naval service without a letter from one or other of those boards?

Mr. Trotter.—It cannot.

Mr. Plumer.—Does that letter, or a copy of it, accompany the memorial to the Treasury for the issue of that money?

Mr. Trotter.—It does.

Mr. Plumer.—Is that the case with respect to money that issues for Exchequer fees?

Mr. Trotter.—I have endeavoured to explain that it is not; it originates entirely from the paymaster, in fact, who is the judge of when that fund is nearly exhausted.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the course of office you have described, the same before the act of parliament, as it has been since the passing the act of the twenty-fifth of the King?

Mr. Trotter.—The same, I believe.

Mr. Plumer.—Is then the issuing Exchequer fees, a subject to which the regulation of the act of parliament, by the course of office applies?

Mr. Trotter.—I presume it is; as I believe the act of parliament directs all sums from the Exchequer to be issued to the Bank, and the money to pay Exchequer fees, is accordingly issued to the Bank.

Mr. Plumer.—Has all the detail and management of the treasurer's office been always left to the paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it generally is, especially during the time in which I acted as paymaster to the navy, it certainly was, and altogether so in lord Melville's time; some subsequent treasurers have thought it necessary to attend the business of the office more minutely.

Mr. Plumer.—But during the whole period of time you have been acquainted with the office, has the execution of it in detail always been left with the paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—Always, I believe.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that the case during the whole period of lord Melville's treasurership?

Mr. Trotter.—As far as I know it was.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the whole management and drawing for the public money entirely left to you, during the period when you were paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was.

Mr. Plumer.—You stated that permission was given by lord Melville, to draw money from the Bank of England, to Coutts's bank. Whether the only reason represented by you, to lord Melville, for that measure, was not to facilitate the official convenience?

Mr. Trotter.—Entirely so, I always stated so; the convenience that would arise, and the greater security of the money.

Mr. Plumer.—State, if you can recollect, how you represented that it would facilitate the convenience of the office, that that transfer should take place?

Mr. Trotter.—I represented the inconvenience that would attend the payments from the distance of the Bank, and proposed to his lordship, that a banker nearer should be allowed to keep the money in his hands, till I found it necessary to issue it to the sub-accountants.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you state also to lord Melville, in what manner the money would be more secure?

Mr. Trotter.—I represented to him the danger of sending in drafts, to the Bank every day, by messengers, who were obliged to bring out the produce of these in cash to supply the daily payments.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether when this application was made by you, the office had not been removed from Broad street, where it had been before situated, to Somerset House?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it had.

Mr. Plumer.—Though the paymaster makes no payment with his own hand, does not the paymaster furnish the supplies to the sub-accountants, for all the money that is daily paid?

Mr. Trotter.—He does.

Mr. Plumer.—Was there the least mention to lord Melville, at the time application was made for his permission to make the change you have stated, of any private emolument to be derived to any body from it?

Mr. Trotter.—None whatever; it was never in lord Melville's contemplation, and I do not remember that it was in my own, at that time.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the permission which was given to draw money from the Bank, to be deposited till it was wanted, in Coutts's bank, entirely confined to the money that would be wanted for official convenience?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know that the conversation extended to so great a length, as to go into that minute part of the subject.

Mr. Plumer.—But was there then, or at any subsequent time, any permission given by lord Melville to draw monies from the Bank, for any other purpose?

Mr. Trotter.—Never.

Mr. Plumer.—I understood you to state, that you received lord Melville's salary, as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Trotter.—I did in most instances; I had thought universally so, till a statement was made from the Pay-office, in which I found some few payments had been made to Mr. Wilson upon my account, and to others upon my account, and one payment to his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—Besides the salary of the treasurer which you received, did you also receive on lord Melville's account, during the whole period of acting as his agent, various remittances from Scotland and other places, on his lordship's account, to a considerable amount?

Mr. Trotter.—I did, to a large amount.

Mr. Plumer.—You speak of your attending lord Melville with the statement of his accounts, which was signed by his lordship, as I understood you to state, and duplicates of the accounts left with him?

Mr. Trotter.—So I stated the fact.

Mr. Plumer.—When you attended his lordship upon the subject of private business, and business of the nature you have stated, did you observe whether his lordship gave any particular attention to the business?

Mr. Trotter.—I was very much concerned that I never could draw lord Melville's attention particularly to the subject of his private accounts.

Mr. Plumer.—Were not, in most instances, the accounts that were produced brought by you, signed immediately, upon the confidence lord Melville reposed in you, without any examination?

Mr. Trotter.—I always exhibited the accounts to his lordship for his examination, and he may have looked at them, but I am conscious that he never attended to them particularly.

Mr. Plumer.—Whenever you had occasion to attend his lordship upon any business of a public nature, or any business that related to the detail and management of the office, in which his own private interest was not concerned, did you find lord Melville equally inattentive, or directly to the reverse?

Mr. Trotter.—I must state directly the reverse. Lord Melville never interrupted me in any representations that I made to him respecting the public business of the office, unless it was merely telling me he had not time to attend to me at that time, and appointing another time, when I laid the subject before him.

Mr. Plumer.—Am I to understand you, that when you waited upon lord Melville about the public accounts in which he was not personally interested, you were sure to have his attention, but could not get his attention in the same manner to his own private accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—That is what I mean to state.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether lord Melville did at any time require or receive from you any receipt or voucher, or document of any kind upon these accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I ever gave him a receipt for any money in my life.

Mr. Plumer.—Whenever you have paid money for him, did his lordship ever desire to see any voucher for that payment, or take it entirely upon the representation you gave of it?

Mr. Trotter.—I never failed to present the documents and vouchers to his lordship, but I do not recollect any instance in which he required it.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any distinct recollection that can enable you to state what was the form or the contents of the bond of this 4,000*l.* or whether it was not a bond in the usual form?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of it whatever, only I believe it did not bear interest.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any recollection whether its not bearing interest was or not specified in the bond?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no distinct recollection, but I do not believe that it was.

Mr. Plumer.—The first purchase you speak to was 2,000*l.* East India stock. Whether, after the documents you have seen on the subject, you have now any memory or recollection upon the subject?

Mr. Trotter.—I recollect generally that lord Melville wanted to be possessed of a further qualification of East India stock, and he begged me to procure it for him, but whether he told me that he would immediately repay me the money or not I do not recollect.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether upon that occasion, or upon any other, lord Melville ever directed you to lay out any part of the public money in your hands for the use and benefit of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—He never did under the specific name of public money, or any money bearing that description.

Mr. Plumer.—In every instance in which this stock was purchased by you, was it understood by lord Melville to be purchased either out of lord Melville's own funds, or from private funds lent him by you?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot precisely say that; I do not know any thing to the contrary, but I do not know what lord Melville's conceptions may have been, he never expressed himself to the contrary to me.

Mr. Plumer.—Is there any instance in which prior to the purchase of any stock, it was mentioned to lord Melville by you, that it was intended to be purchased out of the public money, except in the instance of the purchase of East India stock?

Mr. Trotter.—Never to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Plumer.—Am I to understand you to state, that in the only instance where that was proposed, it was indignantly rejected?

Mr. Trotter.—I mean so to be understood.

Mr. Plumer.—I understood you to state that you did not originally give directions, nor are cognizant by whom the direction was given for the purchase of the subscription of the 10,000*l.* loyalty loan?

Mr. Trotter.—I am unacquainted who gave directions respecting that loyalty loan; at least, I have no recollection of that; and I do not find that it passed through me, or by my orders.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you recollect, whether the first instalment that was paid for that loyalty loan, was not paid out of the private funds belonging to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It may have been so, but I do not recollect the circumstance.

Mr. Plumer.—You stated, that you had paid several instalments, from time to time, upon that loyalty stock?

Mr. Trotter.—I have.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it at any time communicated to lord Melville, whilst these payments were making out, out of what funds these advances were made?

Mr. Trotter.—Never; I believe they were made in consequence of demands which were made upon lord Melville, and which I satisfied without any instructions from his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you recollect about what period it was, that the last of those payments, in respect of this 10,000*l.* loyalty loan, was made?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not; but my accounts with Mr. Coutts must show it.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you remember the year?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of it.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect whether it was about September 1797?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no recollection of it.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect that soon after the last instalment was paid upon that account, securities were given by lord Melville, and a power of attorney for the sale of that and all his other stocks, to secure the repayment of what was due?

Mr. Trotter.—I perfectly recollect the circumstance.

Mr. Plumer.—Did those securities cover an ample fund for the repayment of all those sums which had been advanced upon that account?

Mr. Trotter.—They did.

Mr. Plumer.—You stated, I think, that you directed stock, to the amount of 7,000*l.* three per cents, to be purchased for lord Melville; was that purchase made by any directions from lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It was made without any directions from his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—How came that purchase to be made, without any directions from lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I made it in the general management of lord Melville's affairs: I believe a sum of money had come into my hands, at that time, for his lordship, and I thought it was proper to invest it in some manner, to produce an interest to his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—Am I to understand, that funds had come into your hands, which, before that time, had been carrying a productive interest to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe they had, either previously, or a few days afterwards; one of the payments was, I think, upon a bill, which might not have been due upon the very day I made the purchase; but I believe the bill had come into my hands previous to my making the purchase.

Mr. Plumer.—Was any precise communication ever made to lord Melville, respecting the mode in which that purchase had been made, or any particulars respecting it?

Mr. Trotter.—I probably mentioned it when I presented my accounts to him, but I do not recollect any particular conversation that I had with his lordship on the subject.

Mr. Plumer.—You have stated that lord Melville indignantly rejected the offer of applying the public money to the purchase of India stock, and you then proposed to furnish him with the money, by procuring it of a relation?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that relation's name mentioned to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I mentioned my relation's name, it was Mr. Montague Lind.

Mr. Plumer.—Was any security ever demanded of lord Melville, in respect to the loan that had been made for that purchase of stock?

Mr. Trotter.—None; because I had represented to his lordship that I thought I could procure it on the security of the stock being vested in the person's name of whom I should borrow the money.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the stock, after its purchase, transferred as a security to cover the money that was advanced for the purchase of it?

Mr. Trotter.—It was not, in fact; it was invested in Mr. Lind's name for my account.

Mr. Plumer.—Did it ever stand in the name of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It never did.

Mr. Plumer.—At first you stated, that the amount of the interest, for the money borrowed for this purchase, exceeded the dividend?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it to have done so.

Mr. Plumer.—When that was the case, was lord Melville charged with the difference?

Mr. Trotter.—He was regularly charged with the interest, and got credit by the dividends, whatever they were.

Mr. Plumer.—Then, at that time, was he not an annual loser by the purchase of that stock?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe his lordship to have been so, inasmuch as the interest exceeded the dividends.

Mr. Plumer.—When this purchase of East India stock was made, was the prospect an immediate rise, or that in the course of time it would rise?

Mr. Trotter.—His lordship certainly alluded to a distant prospect, from the progressive state of the affairs of India towards prosperity.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether lord Melville ever knew that the person who advanced this money, was any other person than Mr. Lind, until after the publication of that fact, in the tenth report, or from the late inquiries?

Mr. Trotter.—I never thought it necessary to inform his lordship of it, and I have no reason to believe that he ever knew it.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you the least reason to believe that lord Melville knew, or supposed any part of that advance to be public money?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no reason whatever.

Mr. Plumer.—You spoke of two sums, one paid to sir William Forbes and Company, and the other to Mansfield and Company, the one of 2,000*l.*, the other of 3,300*l.*; have you any recollection of the funds, from whence those two sums came, or any thing respecting them?

Mr. Trotter.—I have none whatever, excepting what I gather from an examination of Mr. Coutts's books, from which I see that they were advances from his account, and from my own letters.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any reason to doubt, but that the payments made upon that subject, were repayed out of the private funds of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no reason to doubt it, as there were frequent payments subsequent to that, and they went in reduction of the general account, in which those sums were included.

Mr. Plumer.—You were asked, whether lord Melville, at any time, imposed any restrictions upon you, with respect to the quantum of your drafts from the Bank, or specified what were to be the limits of them, under either head; I wish to ask whether my lord Melville ever said any thing to you upon the subject?

Mr. Trotter.—Never; the subject was never mentioned.

Mr. Plumer.—You were interrogated respecting a million of money, that was once drawn from the Bank; was that circumstance known to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I am persuaded I never communicated the circumstance to lord Melville; whether he may have learnt it from other quarters or not, I do not know, as I never made any secret of it, but mentioned it frequently.

Mr. Plumer.—What was that drawing of money to that large amount?

Mr. Trotter.—It was the amount of several months Navy bills, that were directed to be paid off at the time, for which a sum of upwards of three millions was issued to me, upon one particular day, and I chose to draw one million from the Bank, and put it into the hands of Coutts and Company, in order to accommodate the bill-holders, at the west-end of the town. And when the bills were presented a few days afterwards (and which intermediate time was necessary, from the business of the Navy-office, in which they calculated the interest upon those bills) when they were presented I drew, as the bill-holders preferred, my drafts upon Coutts's bank, in discharge of their bills, or upon the Bank.

Mr. Plumer.—How long was it before it was all paid away?

Mr. Trotter.—I think it was five or six days before the interest was calculated at the office, and all arrangements made before the bills began to be presented; but after they began to be presented, I fancy it was paid as close up to the balance as other payments of the navy, in the course of a very few days afterwards: there is always a sum that remains unclaimed.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you been much conversant with figures, and made them much the subject of attention?

Mr. Trotter.—I have.

Mr. Plumer.—Was not the whole business of the accounts, both of the office and all the private accounts of lord Melville, left entirely in your management?

Mr. Trotter.—The whole of the public accounts were left in my management, and such of his private accounts as were put under my management.

Mr. Plumer.—You have been asked as to your own use of the public money, removed from the Bank to Messieurs Coutts; I understood you to say, that you made use of it, in point of fact, for your own benefit?

Mr. Trotter.—I certainly made use of that part which I found was not likely to be claimed, for my own profit.

Mr. Plumer.—In what mode was that made use of?

Mr. Trotter.—Generally, by lending it at interest; at other times by investing it in Exchequer or Navy bills, or other government securities.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that to a very considerable amount?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Plumer.—Were the whole profit and emolument, derived from that mode of laying out the money, which you have described, entirely your own?

Mr. Trotter.—Entirely.

Mr. Plumer.—Was any intimation or knowledge ever communicated to lord Melville of the public money having been so used.

Mr. Trotter.—I never made any such communication to lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether, during the period that you have spoken of having acted as paymaster to lord Melville, and while those transactions were going on, the public service of the navy at any time suffered the smallest loss, disadvantage, or interruption, in consequence of the transaction you have spoken of?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know any instance wherein the public have suffered any loss, obstruction, or delay in the public payments, from the use that has been made of public money, or the manner in which I kept my balances elsewhere than in the Bank.

Mr. Plumer.--Was the public money at all times safe, and were proper securities taken for it at all those times?

Mr. Trotter.--I believe it at all times to have been so.

Mr. Plumer.--Was there any one circumstance which happened during the period of lord Melville's executing this office, that should have called his attention, from any interruption the public service received during any part of the period, to the use that was making of the public money?

Mr. Trotter.--I never heard of any.

Mr. Plumer.--Whether during the period of lord Melville's executing his office, sums to the amount of a hundred and twenty millions did not pass through his lordship's hands or through his office?

Mr. Trotter.--More or less, I believe so.

Mr. Plumer.--During all that time, was there a loss sustained by the public, or any impediment suffered by them of one single farthing?

Mr. Trotter.--Not in consequence of the transactions which have been particularly alluded to, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Plumer.--You spoke of some regulations approved and adopted by lord Melville; were those regulations calculated to increase the balance in the hands of the paymaster or treasurer, or directly the reverse?

Mr. Trotter.--I do not think they had any influence either one way or the other; it was merely a different mode of making up the accounts.

Mr. Plumer.--I mean those regulations that were made by which seamen were enabled to make allotments for the maintenance of their families in their absence, or to facilitate the receipt of money due to them; whether regulations to that effect were not made, and whether the effects of them did not tend to reduce, and not increase the balances?

Mr. Trotter.--Certainly, I thought the learned counsel alluded to the regulations I proposed to his lordship in 1782.

Mr. Plumer.--At what period in 1802 did Mr. Bathurst alter the mode of making the payments for the future?

Mr. Trotter.--I am not able to state that.

Mr. Plumer.--Was it in June?

Mr. Trotter.--I do not know.

Mr. Plumer.--Whether that alteration was not entirely made to obviate any inconvenience of a similar nature in future, before any inquiry had taken place before the commissioners of naval inquiry. Whether the evil was not remedied before that inquiry?

Mr. Trotter.--I believe it was.

Mr. Plumer.--Has that course been continued ever since?

Mr. Trotter.--It has, to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. Plumer.--What is that remedy which has been adopted?

Mr. Trotter.--That the money shall remain in the Bank, until wanted for payment, as nearly as possible.

Mr. Plumer.--Is the money remaining in the Bank to be written off from one account to the other account?

Mr. Trotter.--Instead of drawing the money to Messieurs Coutts's house, and issuing to the sub-accountants from that account, the money is made over to one of the sub-accountant's account at the Bank, and he draws himself upon that account. The whole difference is, that the money remains in the sub-accountant's account at the Bank, instead of the sub-accountant's account at Messieurs Coutts's.

Mr. Plumer.--Does it then, in consequence of this alteration, become a private account kept with the Bank by each sub-accountant, when a certain amount is written off to the credit of that sub-accountant?

Mr. Trotter.--I believe that the accountant has a perfect control over the account. I do not know what constitutes it a public account further than being kept in the Bank.

Mr. Plumer.--Then, after the credit is written over from the treasurer's account to each sub-accountant's account, each sub-accountant has the power of drawing out the money as he shall want it, or as he shall think fit?

Mr. Trotter.--He has as much the control over it as he had when the money was put into his name in his account at Mr. Coutts's, as far as I understand.

Mr. Plumer.--If no permission had been given at all, of drawing from the Bank to Coutts's bank, as a place of temporary deposit; whether all the same use might not have been made of the public money by drafts in the same way at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.--Certainly; but it might have been considered a greater dereliction of my duty.

Mr. Plumer.--Whether the same use might not have been made of the public money, being laid out for private benefit, without its reaching in the intermediate transit of it, any private bank?

Mr. Trotter.--That is exactly the question I answered before, that I think it might be made use of in exactly the same manner; but that if I had done so, I think it might be considered as a still greater dereliction of duty.

Mr. Plumer.--Whether the small payments that are daily made in this great department, the navy department, can be made any other-wise, than by cash in the hands of the sub-accountants?

Mr. Trotter.--I do not apprehend it to be possible; and I am told the present treasurer attempted it, and could not carry it into execution.

Mr. Plumer.--Is the amount of those payments, and the number of them that are daily made, such as could not with any possible practical convenience, be made by drafts upon the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—It certainly could not be done by any means, in my opinion.

Mr. Plumer.—How low, in point of value, do some of those payments go?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly as low as one shilling, some of them.

Mr. Plumer.—Are they very numerous under ten pounds, or two pounds, or even one pound in value?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe there are many thousands paid monthly, lower than ten pounds, and even lower than two pounds.

Mr. Plumer.—State, as nearly as you can, as to what was the average amount of money due to the payees of assigned bills?

Mr. Trotter.—I never had occasion to make a calculation of the average, excepting once, and then I was assisted by the then treasurer of the navy, Mr. Canning; and we found it averaged a considerable number of years about 143,000*l*.

Mr. Plumer.—What do you mean by a balance of that nature being due to the payees of assigned bills?

Mr. Trotter.—It is the amount of bills which the several boards have drawn upon the treasurer of the navy, and which have been put into the hands of the persons who are entitled to receive them, but who have not demanded the payment of them; the treasurer, in that situation, stands exactly in the situation of a banker, in which a balance accrues in consequence of unclaimed demands upon him.

Mr. Plumer.—When bills are drawn upon the treasurer, is the list of the bills so drawn communicated to the treasurer?

Mr. Trotter.—A list is sent from the board, of the bills which they assign upon the treasurer for that day, by which the treasurer understands he is to be prepared to make payment of bills to that amount; but bills to that amount seldom or never come in all together; the whole amount is not generally presented for some time, by which means an aggregate balance is formed and created, which lies unclaimed in the treasurer's hands.

Mr. Plumer.—From the moment that list is communicated to the treasurer, is it the course of the office, to credit his account, for the amount of the bills that are so drawn?

Mr. Trotter.—It is the course of the Navy-office, and of the different offices whose boards draw upon the treasurer of the Navy-office, to give the treasurer credit for the full amount of those assignments.

Mr. Plumer.—Are those bills payable at sight, the instant they are presented?

Mr. Trotter.—They are, excepting the ninety day bills, which are never presented till the day they are due.

Mr. Plumer.—Are all the other bills payable to the payees at sight?

Mr. Trotter.—They are.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it competent to them to call and receive the money whenever they think fit?

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Plumer.—If any delay takes place, or any balance remains unclaimed for any period of time, is that entirely the act of the holders of the bills?

Mr. Trotter.—It depends entirely upon the holders of the bills, or upon other causes not dependant upon the treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Plumer.—Is the fund that is thus assigned, considered as reserved for their use during that interval?

Mr. Trotter.—I understand that admits of different opinions; it is certainly my opinion that it is the property of the holders of the bills.

Mr. Plumer.—From the moment the list is received of the bills assigned, I understand you to say that the treasurer must be ready to satisfy them when called for?

Mr. Trotter.—He certainly may be called upon; I beg to explain that, I have said there never has been any delay of a payment of a navy or victualling bill; but there is another description of bills, which are not called navy or victualling bills, which I did not advert to at that time. All navy or victualling bills are drawn assignable out of a certain sum of money received at the Exchequer; as long as that fund lasts, the bills are drawn from that fund: but there is another description of bills, not to a great amount, which are drawn upon the general fund of wages, without specifying any particular sum; and when the fund under the head of wages has been low, the navy board have thought proper, to desire the treasurer to cease making payments of those bills, until a supply, under the head of wages, should be received from the Treasury.

Mr. Plumer.—Does that delay in any respect proceed from any act either of the treasurer or his paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—Not in any degree whatever.

Mr. Plumer.—You have been asked about drafts made in the name of the right honourable Henry Dundas, Mr. Dundas, and Henry Dundas; have you discovered instances, which lead you to believe, that the name of Mr. Dundas was sometimes inserted, when the money was not for him, nor applied to his use?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect having discovered any such instances; they were generally to his use, or collaterally for his use.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you not found instances, of money being directed to be paid in the name of Mr. Dundas, which, in point of fact, was not so applied?

Mr. Trotter.—I have found instances, wherein the money was not directly paid to Mr. Dundas; but I have found no instances, wherein the money was not in some measure or other, connected with Mr. Dundas.

Mr. Plumer.—There is an instance on the 24th of July 1789.—“To cash paid Henry Dundas 1,764*l*. 18*s*. 10*d*.”?

Mr. Trotter.—That was a transfer from one of my own accounts to the other, the same sum was advanced to lord Melville in two different sums, and charged to him in my other accounts with Messieurs Coutts, so that it came doubly charged to Mr. Dundas.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect any entry of this nature, “To the right honorable Henry Dundas, act of parliament account,” or “Pay Henry Dundas account 2,500*l*.” Whether instances do not occur of entries of that kind which in fact, were never paid to Mr. Dundas, or on his account?

Mr. Trotter.—There are entries of that description, but they are very different from pay Mr. Dundas, they are, “Pay Mr. Dundas’s new account;” which means that they were paid into his new account at the Bank, or paid into his first account, in which case they are paid into his first account at the Bank; there his name is made use of, without his having any connexion with the money.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether there are not entries to the same effect, where it is not the act of parliament account, or the new account, but simpliciter “Henry Dundas,” or “the right honorable Henry Dundas,” without any addition?

Mr. Trotter.—I am unable to explain that, unless I knew the specific entries; I should rather apprehend that they went to the credit of his account, at the same house upon which I drew.

Mr. Plumer.—I understand the release to have been executed by you in London?

Mr. Trotter.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Was lord Melville at that time in Scotland?

Mr. Trotter.—He was.

Mr. Plumer.—Were any directions given by lord Melville, as to the form of that release, or any particular clause, which it should contain?

Mr. Trotter.—None whatever, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Plumer.—An account has been given of your having destroyed some books of account; was any one book of that sort, destroyed by any directions, or any previous communication of it to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—None whatever.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that circumstance ever known, to your knowledge or belief, to lord Melville, till after the publication of the tenth report?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know that his lordship ever was acquainted with it before that time, but I only speak of knowledge, because I may have communicated it to his lordship sooner. I do not recollect the particular time when I communicated it to his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—Are you quite sure, that it was long after the books were in fact destroyed, that the circumstance was communicated to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—Perfectly so.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the mode in which you kept your account with Mr. Coutts, and the mixture of private and public money, entirely your own act, without any knowledge of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It was an act entirely my own, and lord Melville never had any knowledge whatever, of the manner in which I kept my accounts at Mr. Coutts’.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the destruction of the books of account by you, was done in the least for any purpose of concealment, or benefit to my lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I had not lord Melville’s interest in contemplation at the time I destroyed the books.

Mr. Plumer.—Had you any money transactions with Mr. Sprot?

Mr. Trotter.—I have had considerable transactions with Mr. Sprot.

Mr. Plumer.—Was any one of those transactions ever communicated to lord Melville, or was ever the least benefit derived to his lordship from them?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not believe, that lord Melville ever had the smallest knowledge of my transactions with Mr. Sprot, nor did he derive any advantage from them.

Mr. Plumer.—State generally, without entering into detail, whether the use, which you made of that public money to your own emolument, was to a very considerable amount?

Mr. Trotter.—It certainly was to what I call a considerable amount.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it a use made commonly from month to month?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Plumer.—I understand you to have stated before, that the whole benefit derived from all that use of the public money, that went on from month to month, was exclusively your own?

Mr. Trotter.—All excepting the sums which I have stated to have been advanced for lord Melville, upon which I do not know that any profit was made, excepting as far as I have explained.

Mr. Plumer.—Was not the difference between the Bank balance and the official balance, created by money drawn by you from time to time from the Bank, for the purposes you have before stated?

Mr. Trotter.—The whole was included in that difference.

Mr. Plumer.—At the time lord Melville went out of office in 1800, were there more balances due upon the ex-treasurer’s account of 1782; the first treasurership and the first part of the second treasurership, did they together amount to more than 10,000*l*?

Mr. Trotter.—I think they each exceeded 5,000*l*.; consequently they must have collectively exceeded 10,000*l*. but only a few hundreds,—it was about 11,000*l*. I believe.

Mr. Plumer.—Had any part of that sum, during all that period, been ever wanted for the public service?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly not, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Plumer.—Was there, to your knowledge or belief, any delay in passing the accounts of the ex-treasurers, so as to retain that balance in their hands?

Mr. Trotter.—There was a great delay in passing the accounts, but not at all proceeding from the treasurer, or the paymaster.

Mr. Plumer.—What was the cause of that delay?

Mr. Trotter.—From the necessity of a co-operation between the clerks of the Navy-office and the Pay office. The Navy-office had thought proper, to withdraw their clerks, from the business of making up the accounts of the ex-treasurer, in order to send them to the out ports, and otherwise to disperse them in the current business of the office, and the treasurer found himself under the necessity of doing the same thing.

Mr. Plumer.—Was lord Melville, if these obstacles had not occurred, at all times ready to pass his accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—The passing the accounts, I understand, to be the making up the accounts which did not depend upon lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the quantum of the balance issued to the treasurer at any time, depended in the least upon any act either of lord Melville or his paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly not.

Mr. Plumer.—Was any one act, at any one period during the whole time of lord Melville's treasurership, done by either him or his paymaster to augment those balances?

Mr. Trotter.—It was not in the power of either of us to augment the balances by any act that we could have done, and consequently neither of us ever to my knowledge committed any act so as to produce that effect.

Mr. Plumer.—During the whole period, was the actual quantum of official balance fairly and properly communicated to the boards?

Mr. Trotter.—The office returned accounts every fortnight to the different boards, in which the balance of the treasurer was stated, and they were regularly made acquainted with it.

Mr. Plumer.—I do not recollect any other questions which I wish to put, but probably in so extensive an examination some may afterwards suggest themselves, which I trust the Court will have the goodness to permit me to put.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons have several questions to put in re-examination of Mr. Trotter; after the cross-examination of the learned counsel, there are many parts upon which it will be necessary to put questions, to bring back the true understanding of it before the Court.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

SEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, May 6, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber.
VOL. XXIX.

ber of Parliament, into Westminster Hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons propose to your lordships, to call back Mr. Alexander Trotter, for the purpose of re-examining him, upon some parts of the cross-examination of the counsel. Upon other parts they will not trouble your lordships, that cross-examination having gone to points not included in their articles.

Then Alexander Trotter, esq., was again called in, and re-examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville ever transact any part of the business of the Pay-office, or give any directions whatever concerning it?—by business I mean the official business of the payments and receipts?

Mr. Trotter.—I was going to make that distinction, that in the actual execution of business lord Melville seldom or never interfered; but he paid attention, at all times, to the representations of difficult cases, and proposals that were made for improving the business of the office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were any representations ever made to him, concerning the office payments, or receipts, in the ordinary course of business of the office, and not with a view to any new regulations?

Mr. Trotter.—In the ordinary course of the office, no communications were made to lord Melville; but in any extraordinary cases, such as I thought it was necessary to represent to lord Melville, I did not fail to do so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Of what nature were those cases?

Mr. Trotter.—There are such a variety that I can scarce mention them; but if any person made a claim that he was not strictly entitled to, or that some doubt had arisen upon it, if lord Melville was near the office, I commonly applied to him to know what I ought to do upon such an occasion.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you, on those occasions, submit the books of the office to his lordship?

Mr. Trotter.—If the cases required it I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did such cases often occur?

Mr. Trotter.—Very seldom.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever pay any money into the hands of lord Melville, personally?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect having done so; I may have paid his salary once, or small sums of money; but I do not recollect any particulars respecting it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever receive from lord Melville, any money into your own hands, which required a receipt?

Mr. Trotter.—I have received money from lord Melville, but I do not recollect ever having given his lordship a receipt.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount were those sums which so passed from hand to hand, from the treasurer to the paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—I have only an impression upon my mind, that I have received considerable sums from lord Melville, but do not recollect the particulars of any.

Mr. Whitbread.—The last question applied to payments made to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I beg to have the question repeated, as I misunderstood it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever pay to lord Melville personally, any sums of money which required a receipt from his lordship?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not think I ever paid any sums so large as to require a receipt, excepting that I paid his salary; in one instance I find his lordship received it; and then he would sign the office receipt for his salary.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he sign such an office receipt?

Mr. Trotter.—The whole is but a faint impression upon my mind; if I presented it for his signature, no doubt he signed it, but I do not recollect the particulars.

Mr. Whitbread.—You stated that lord Melville was inattentive to his private affairs: before that you stated that lord Melville actually signed all the private accounts presented to him. Did those accounts contain an history of your private money transactions? Did you give a proper account of the history of those private transactions in the accounts so delivered to lord Melville, which he was in the course of signing?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville always sign them?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any instance to the contrary.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the bond which was stated yesterday, to have been given for 4,000*l.* in an early part of your connexion with the treasurer of the navy, given up or kept by you?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was given up and destroyed. It is so many years ago that I do not recollect exactly what became of it; but I believe it was given up.

Mr. Whitbread.—Upon what occasion was it given up to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—From payments having been made upon that account which exceeded that 4,000*l.* in which case I did not think it was proper to keep the bond.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the account stated and balanced accurately, at the precise time at which the bond was given up?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was not, I do not recollect that it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the Court to understand that the account current, of a sum, in which account that bond applied, and which sum formed the first item of that account was still an open account current at the time the bond was given up.*

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—When lord Melville gave orders or directions to you to pay money on his account, did he specify at all out of what fund that money was to be paid?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any instance in which his lordship so specified.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any difference in the mode of lord Melville's application to you, at the times when he wished money to be debited to him in the account current, and at the times in which he wished money to be debited to you in the Chest account?

Mr. Plumer.—I submit to your lordships, that question is not a proper one, since it assumes, that lord Melville had made such a distinction.

Mr. Whitbread.—I will change the question.---Did lord Melville ever make any distinction in his mode of application to you, when you were to debit his account in one or the other way?

Mr. Trotter.---In manner, I conceive his lordship did.

Mr. Whitbread.---What was his manner or mode of speaking and addressing you, at the time that you understood he wished to have money debited in the account current?

Mr. Plumer.---I have not yet heard that the witness has said that any part was to be carried to the Chest account.

Mr. Whitbread.---I submit whether that is not a proper question to be put.

Mr. Plumer.---I wish to know whether lord Melville ever expressed any wish to have any money debited to the account current? It assumes that as a fact.

Lord Chancellor.---Put the question, whether lord Melville ever did direct any money to be debited to his Chest account? That would be a fit preliminary question.

Mr. Whitbread.---Did lord Melville, by any words, or any mode, suggest, or in any way ever convey to you, an intimation that he wished a certain sum of money, advanced to him, should be debited to him in his account current?

Mr. Trotter.---I can only speak in general terms, as different circumstances would of course attend different payments upon that account; and, in speaking in those general terms, I say his lordship would probably enter into an explanation of monies which he expected to receive soon; and, under that impression he requested me to accommodate him with a sum, they seldom were large sums, until such times as payments came into his hands. I only speak that in general terms.

Mr. Whitbread.---When such request had been conveyed to you, to which of those two accounts you have stated to be opened, between lord Melville and yourself, was that money debited?

* This question is copied correctly from the Report published by the authority of the House of Peers, but it is not easily intelligible.

Mr. Trotter.—The account current.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any other mode of application described, in the way I before stated to you, when lord Melville wished it to be debited to any other account?

Mr. Trotter.—I can to this question also only answer in general terms. His lordship generally required, that such a sum of money should be paid, without coming to any explanation with me at all upon the subject.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that requisition, which you are now alluding to, in the nature of a command from lord Melville to you for that purpose?

Mr. Trotter.—I considered it as such.

Mr. Whitbread.—Would you have thought yourself bound to debit lord Melville for any sum he had chosen to require on the Chest account?

Mr. Plumer.—Surely that is not a question, what he would have done. The question is, what he did?

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever make any remonstrance upon the magnitude of any sum that was advanced to lord Melville, or on his account, that was afterwards carried to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—I never did, because it never interfered with the convenience of the office, as a much greater sum than lord Melville ever commanded, under those circumstances, might have been spared from the unclaimed balances.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever hold any conversation with lord Melville, on the situation that you held in the Navy-pay-office, expressive of your gratitude for having been placed in that situation?

Mr. Plumer.—I do not object to this question; but would only just observe, this is certainly going to a point to which nothing in the cross-examination led: it is perfectly new matter.

Mr. Whitbread.—I will waive the question. Could any body have drawn the money from Coutts' which was placed there by you except yourself, or some person vested with your special authority?

Mr. Trotter.—It appears to me, that that is a matter more for the determination of Mr. Coutts than myself, as I do not know what Mr. Coutts would have done under the circumstances of a person unauthorized presenting a draft.

Mr. Whitbread.—Supposing any third person unauthorized by you had presented a draft for payment upon Coutts, and if Coutts had debited you in your account for such unauthorized payments by him, should you have conceived Mr. Coutts had acted honestly or properly by you?

Mr. Trotter.—That depends entirely upon the circumstances which had accompanied the transaction. I should certainly think that Mr. Coutts had done me a favour by granting it to certain people under certain situations, when I should have been very much surprised at it in other situations.

Mr. Whitbread.—Could any body have received your money from Mark Sprot, Montague Lind, and others, unless vested with your especial authority, excepting yourself?

Mr. Trotter.—I conceive the same answer to apply to this case, that I have given to the case of money supposed to have been demanded from Mr. Coutts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Could any body have had the power of selling, or changing the securities taken by you for public money, unless specifically authorized by you?

Mr. Trotter.—Mr. Thomas Wilson had a general authority from me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had any other person?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe not, I do not recollect any other.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had the treasurer of the navy himself any given authority, vesting him with the power of controlling your private monies, or the securities taken by you on account of these private or public monies?

Mr. Trotter.—None.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville repay the money to you, with which 2,000*l.* East India stock in 1792 was purchased, or did that money form a part of the account current between you till the final close of that account in the year 1800?—The East India stock bought being 2,000*l.* and the purchase money 4,000*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—I placed that sum to the debit of lord Melville's account current, and I believe every man of business must know that when payments are made upon that account current, it is impossible to say what particular sum was so paid.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any specific sum of money, appropriated by lord Melville, to the discharge of that specific sum?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any.

Mr. Whitbread.—If all the money had been placed according to the directions of the 25th of the king, and such an improbable event had taken place, as the failure of the Bank, should you have considered yourself responsible for the money so left in the Bank of England, according to the act of parliament?

Mr. Trotter.—I should not.

Mr. Whitbread.—And, if Messieurs Coutts should have become insolvent, should you have considered yourself as responsible, for the sum lost by that failure?

Mr. Trotter.—I confess I should; though I looked upon the circumstance impossible.

Mr. Whitbread.—Supposing such a very improbable event, as the failure of Coutts's house, had taken place, had you, at that time, any fortune of your own, by which you might have made good such a sum?

Mr. Trotter.—That depends entirely upon the balance that was in Mr. Coutts's hand at that time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Supposing the balance had amounted to 50,000*l.* had you any probability, in such a case, of repaying it?

Mr. Trotter.—Until very late years, I do not think that I had a fortune that could have made good that loss; of late years I could have made good that loss, as my fortune exceeds it, by perhaps, ten or fifteen thousand pounds, and no more.

Mr. Whitbread.—When you came into the Navy-pay-office, what was your private fortune, exclusive of your salary?

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, this is going into entirely new matter.

Mr. Whitbread.—I have not asked the witness a single question, that has not been formed from a note, taken from the mouth of the learned counsel, in the cross-examination of yesterday; but I submit I have a right, if I thought proper, to go into new matter also: I can refer, if it is necessary, to the words of the learned counsel. The learned counsel cross-examined very much as to the security of the public cash, in the situation in which the witness described he had placed it; he cross examined him indeed, as to the increased security of the public cash; then surely when I am asking as to the probable means of repayment, in case the public cash had been lost, I ask a relevant question.

Mr. Plumer.—I waive the objection.

Mr. Whitbread.—I am glad of it for the sake of the learned counsel. What was your fortune, independent of your salary, at the time of your appointment to the office of paymaster to the treasurer of the Navy?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect accurately; but certainly not great, not perhaps, exceeding one or two thousand pounds.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you had any great accumulation of fortune, by any event, independent of your situation as paymaster of the Navy?

Mr. Trotter.—I have had considerable acquisitions by inheritance.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount?

Mr. Trotter.—I was going to explain; it was considerable in proportion to my fortune, although it may not be so in the eyes of many people. I suppose, somewhere between six and seven thousand pounds.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that the extent of your accumulation of fortune, independent of what you derived in one way or other from the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I also had an acquisition of fortune, small I must confess, by marriage.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount?

Mr. Trotter.—I suppose about three thousand pounds.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did this acquisition by your marriage take place?

Mr. Trotter.—Part of it upon my marriage, in the year 1797.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did the other acquisitions take place, or the largest quantity of them?

Mr. Trotter.—At the death of my brothers, which was about—I am totally unfit to answer the question, from not being able to make up my mind as to the distance of time; it might be eight or ten years ago.

Mr. Whitbread.—What might your acquisition be upon that occasion?

Mr. Trotter.—I inherited, by one, the sum of five thousand pounds.

Mr. Whitbread.—How much by the other?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot tell how much, because it came into my hands at different times.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it as much as 5,000*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—It was not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it as much as 3,000*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—It may be; but I do not know.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you in possession of any landed property?

Mr. Trotter.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is lord Melville acquainted with that fact?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe he is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was he acquainted with that fact, at the time the acquisition of landed property took place, or thereabouts?

Mr. Trotter.—I purchased my land at four or five different times: I do not know that his lordship was acquainted with each purchase.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was lord Melville generally acquainted that you had become a man of landed property in Scotland?

Mr. Trotter.—I presume he was; for although it is not a great purchase, yet it is not so insignificant as to have escaped his lordship's notice.

Mr. Whitbread.—It is an unpleasant question, but I am led to it by the cross examination of the learned counsel, or I should have abstained from it.—What do you conceive to be the amount of your property at this moment?

Mr. Trotter.—I had occasion, about a year ago, to make up a statement of my property, and, at that time, I valued it at what I considered to be a very fair valuation, at about 51,000*l.* or 52,000*l.* but it was so invested, as not to produce me an income of more than 1,200*l.* per annum.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has the salary of the paymaster of the Navy been increased considerably since you were originally appointed to it?

Mr. Trotter.—It has.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount?

Mr. Trotter.—To the sum of eight hundred pounds per annum.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that increase take place before lord Melville left the office, in the year 1800?

Mr. Trotter.—It took place at that very time, I believe.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did it take place at the time, or immediately after lord Melville left the office?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know whether the first payment of my salary commenced before or after.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did it take place before the first of January 1800?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether drafts upon the Bank of England are, in your estimation, effects as valuable as drafts upon the house of Mr. Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—It depends upon who makes the drafts, I take it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Supposing always that the person who makes those drafts upon the one or the other has effects in the hands of that one or other person, and that he does not exceed in drawing the sum for which he has credit; supposing you have 10,000*l.* in the Bank, and 10,000*l.* in the hands of Mr. Coutts, and you were to give a draft to one person for 5,000*l.* on the Bank, and to another for 5,000*l.* on Mr. Coutts, should you think your draft on the Bank would be answered as readily as the draft on Mr. Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—I should certainly consider it of equal value.

Mr. Whitbread.—You have stated, in answer to a question upon the cross-examination of the learned counsel, that the Navy-pay-office had been removed during your paymastership from Broad-street, in the vicinity of the Bank, to Somerset-place, which is at a greater distance from the Bank. What were the usual official hours while you were paymaster, according to the common routine of business, when business began in the morning, and when it ceased in the afternoon?

Mr. Trotter.—From ten till four o'clock were the hours of attendance, but the payments I believe stopped sooner.

Mr. Whitbread.—At what hour did the payments stop?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe generally at two; but as I was not in the habit of making payments myself, I speak from the general habit of the office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know at what hour of the day payments cease at the Bank of England?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know.

Mr. Whitbread.—That is easily ascertained; it is at five o'clock. Did you confine your use of the public money to such sums only as were wanted for official convenience?

Mr. Trotter. I do not comprehend the question.

Mr. Whitbread.—You stated upon your cross-examination, that the average balance of the assigned and unclaimed money was about 143,000*l.*; did you confine yourself at all times to the use of the sum of 143,000*l.* only?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not; that is to say, I had greater sums out of the Bank, and in Mr. Coutts's hands, and elsewhere.

Mr. Whitbread.—When these sums were so out from the Bank, did you always take care to have the larger part of them in the hands of Mr. Coutts, for the purpose of answering official demands?

Mr. Trotter.—I have stated that the whole of it, as far as I can recollect, passed through Mr. Coutts's hands; but I do not mean to say that it remained in Mr. Coutts's hands till the payment was required.

Mr. Whitbread. Did you confine yourself to the sum assigned always, in drawing upon the Bank for your own private use?

Mr. Trotter. I did not.

Mr. Whitbread. Did you ever take any pains to inquire into the average amount of these unassigned claims, before your calculation with Mr. Canning?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot say I ever did.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did that operation, of the calculation between you and Mr. Canning, then take place, or whereabouts?

Mr. Trotter.—About March last year, I presume.

Mr. Whitbread.—On what account was that calculation made?

Mr. Trotter.—From the subject having become a matter of consideration with Mr. Canning.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it a matter of consideration with you also, at that time?

Mr. Trotter.—I did it more to assist him in his views, than having any myself.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you always consider the state of your account at Mr. Coutts's when you drew out money for your own purposes?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot say that I did; I rather considered the balance that was in the Bank, and conceiving it to be larger than would probably be demanded at an earlier period, I withdrew some part of it, and put it into the hands of Messieurs Coutts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has your account at Messieurs Coutts' ever been, at an average, below the unassigned part?

Mr. Trotter.—Very often, I have overdrawn Mr. Coutts's house.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you ever overdrawn that account?

Mr. Trotter.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever give a draft on the house of Coutts in favour of sub-accountants, for a smaller sum than you have given upon the Bank of England for the same sub-accountants?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I ever did; but, in the multiplicity of payments that appear on those accounts, I hope I shall not be urged to make specific answers, to such specific questions.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever in your official situation give a piece of paper of any description, a draft upon any body, or any house, purporting to be a draft for a fractional payment below one pound?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that ever I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever issue so low a sum in a draft, to any of your sub-accountants, as ten pounds?

Mr. Trotter.—In arranging balances in account with the sub-accountants I may have done so; but I do not recollect the circumstance.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever issue to any of your sub-accountants a draft of so low a sum as ten pounds, for the purpose of its being immediately paid, one of the payees having an immediate claim upon that fund?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect having done so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever make payments to the payees of the navy and victualing bills, except through your sub-accountants?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not think I ever did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you, when paymaster of the navy, make your issues daily to the sub-accountants?

Mr. Trotter.—I generally did.

Mr. Whitbread.—At what time in the morning did you usually take your seat in the office?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe I was pretty punctual in my attendance at the office, at the office hours, at ten o'clock.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the sub-accountants upon your taking your seat, come with the balances regularly to you in the course of the office, with signed lists coming from the Navy-board for each day?

Mr. Trotter.—They generally did so, but not uniformly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it their ordinary routine of duty so to do?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it the practice of the paymaster at that time, to issue to the sub-accountants drafts, for the whole of the money, which might be claimed under the assignment and list which was so sent from the Navy-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I generally issued the full sum, unless I found that the cashier had a balance in his hand, by which he could assist that payment.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you learn from the practice of the office, what was likely to be the demand upon the assignments which might be claimed, and a list of which was presented to you, and regulate your practice accordingly?

Mr. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you continue in your office, liable to be called upon by any sub-accountant to whom you had not issued a sufficient sum in the morning, till the hour at which the payments ceased in the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I either remained myself, or left some person authorized to carry on that part of my duty.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you after Mr. Bathurst had directed the removal of money from Coutts to the Bank, continue to regulate your practice and mode of payment by the same practice?

Mr. Trotter.—It does not strike me that there was any considerable deviation, excepting granting a fuller sum in the morning than perhaps I should have done if the account had remained at Mr. Coutts', where I could have recourse to a second supply more easily.

Mr. Whitbread.—Could you not have had recourse to a second supply by drawing upon the Bank, as much as if the money had been at Mr. Coutts'?

Mr. Trotter.—I could not.

Mr. Whitbread.—For what reason?

Mr. Trotter.—From the distance between the Bank and the Pay-office?

Mr. Whitbread.—Did any interruption or hindrance take place to the business of the office after the money was carried back from Messieurs Coutts' to the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—I foresaw that a hindrance might occur, and I took care to obviate it, by granting the balances fuller than I might have done, had it remained at Mr. Coutts'.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any payee ever delayed for a moment by the money being at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any instance of it.

Mr. Whitbread.—After the money was restored to the Bank by the direction of Mr. Bathurst, were the drafts upon the Bank drawn by you in the same form during Mr. Bathurst's treasurership, were the drafts upon the Bank, precisely in the same form as those drafts had been, by which you drew money out of the Bank of England, and placed it at Mr. Coutts'?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe they were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Now with regard to the 7,000*l.* 3 per cent reduced stock, you stated that you had received a sum of 4,000*l.* on account of lord Melville, and to his credit, which you thought proper without directions from lord Melville, to invest in stock, for lord Melville's interest; at the time you received that 4,000*l.* on lord Melville's account, with which you purchased 7,000*l.* 3 per cent reduced annuities, for lord Melville's benefit, what was the state of lord Melville's Chest account? on which side was the balance?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I ever specified that I had received a sum of 4,000*l.* under such circumstances.

Mr. Whitbread.—You stated yesterday upon your cross-examination that when you purchased 7,000*l.* 3 per cent reduced annuities for lord Melville's benefit; that that was an occasion upon which you received 4,000*l.* upon lord Melville's account, either from Scotland or elsewhere: now I want to know whether, at the time you so took upon yourself to purchase stock for lord Melville's benefit, the Chest account in the first instance was, or was not in favour of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—Would your lordships wish me to answer that question, before I have ascertained whether I made that answer?

The following extract from the witnesses evidence on the preceding day, was read.

Q.—“ You stated, I think, that you directed stock to the amount of 7,000*l.* three per cents to be purchased for lord Melville; was that purchase made by any directions from lord Melville?

A.—“It was made without any directions from his lordship.

Q.—“How came that purchase to be made, without any directions from lord Melville?

A.—“I made it in the general management of lord Melville's affairs; I believe a sum of money had come into my hands, at that time, for his lordship, and I thought it was proper to invest it in some manner, to produce an interest to his lordship.

Q.—“Am I to understand, that funds had come into your hands, which, before that time had been carrying a productive interest to lord Melville?

A.—“I believe they had, either previously, or a few days afterwards; one of the payments was, I think upon a bill, which might not have been due upon the very day I made the purchase; but I believe the bill had come into my hands, previous to my making the purchase.”*

Mr. Whitbread.—At the time these valuable effects of lord Melville came into your hands, in what state did the two accounts, between yourself and lord Melville stand? and I would wish first to point your attention to the Chest account, which you, in every instance, have stated to be against lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I hope your lordships will excuse me, in reverting to what I said before, that I do not find that the sum of 4,000*l.* was specified.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it not a 4,000*l.* from Mr. Cameron?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect the circumstance.

Lord Chancellor.—The short-hand writer, will read that part of the evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—I will not perplex the Court, by specifying the sum. When any sum of money, which you designated in the way you did yesterday, came into your hands, with which sum, unspecified as to the amount, a certain quantity of stock was purchased; was lord Melville's Chest account, in his favour or against him?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe the balance of the Chest account, at that time, stood against his lordship.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the account current, generally or usually, or for the most part, during the time it was open, stand against lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It did; but I do not know, whether it did at that time or not.

Mr. Whitbread.—You stated yourself, yesterday, to have been at times, holder of navy bills during the time you were paymaster of the navy; I am now referring to the security of the public money in your hands; were you, at any time, during the time you were paymaster of the navy, a holder of a certain quantity of navy bills?

Mr. Trotter.—I have held navy bills, during the time I was paymaster.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect that you were holder of a certain quantity of navy bills, at the time when they fell to a discount?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe I held navy bills, at a time, when they came to a discount.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you borrow a sum of money, for the purpose of making official payments, at the time that navy bills were so at a discount, that you might keep those bills unsold?

Mr. Trotter.—As I conceived it to be immaterial, whether I paid the public drafts, by money taken out of one pocket, or taken out of another; I certainly borrowed money at the time that I found I could not sell my navy bills without a loss.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that fact take place, that you made that loan?

Mr. Trotter.—I have reason to believe it did; although I do not distinctly recollect it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had the sub-accountants of the Navy-pay-office accounts at Messieurs Coutts' at the same time, that you had your account, as paymaster of the navy?

Mr. Trotter.—They had.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it with your approbation, that they had such accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it also by your recommendation, that they had those accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe in most instances it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it by your direction, or solicitation, that they had those accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—I beg to make a distinction between direction and solicitation.

Mr. Whitbread.—By your solicitation?

Mr. Trotter.—I very probably might solicit it, but not in very humble terms; I mean to say, that I did not insist upon it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did any one of them express a reluctance to transferring his account, or any part of it, from the Bank of England to the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that they did. Mr. George Swatfield has told me that he did; but I do not recollect it.

Mr. Whitbread.—You stated yesterday, upon the cross-examination by the learned counsel, that when the million of money was placed in the hands of Messieurs Coutts, that it was for the purpose of accommodating the payees at the west end of the town: when the million was placed at Mr. Coutts' for that purpose, were the payments made by your own drafts on Mr. Coutts to each individual payee, or did you issue drafts to the sub-accountants, as usual, and the payees resort to them as usual for payment?

Mr. Trotter.—I stated that as one of the objects that I had in view, but I carried on the payments in the same manner; I transferred a sum of, I think 400,000*l.* in a few days to one accountant, and 400,000*l.* to another, to their accounts at Mr. Coutts', and they paid the payees of the bills by their own drafts, upon their own accounts, at Mr. Coutts'.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any difference as to those specific sums, or was it not carried on in the same manner as the other accounts between you and the sub-accountants?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know any other difference, except in the great hurry which took place, which always rendered more arrangement necessary.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that arrangement go to supersede the ordinary routine of the office with the sub-accountants.

Mr. Trotter.—It did not; and I do not know that the ordinary routine was interrupted at that time.

Mr. Whitbread.—When Mr. Bathurst gave directions to you, as paymaster, to remove the cash from Mr. Coutts' to the Bank, did you remonstrate upon that subject?

Mr. Trotter.—I never made any objection to Mr. Bathurst's orders; but I certainly took the liberty to argue upon the subject.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did your arguments prevail with Mr. Bathurst?

Mr. Trotter.—They did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had you ever any discussion of the same sort with lord Melville as that which you had with Mr. Bathurst?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect ever having had any such discussion.

Mr. Whitbread.—Having been asked in your examination in chief, as to the names in your accounts of Henry Dundas, Mr. Dundas, and the right honourable Henry Dundas, whether they all applied to the same person, and being cross-examined by the learned counsel on the other side, as to a certain specific sum of 1764*l.* you stated that that sum was transferred from one of your accounts to the other, and that it was entered twice; when you spoke to a sum paid to Henry Dundas of 1764*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* and mention a transfer of that sum from one account to another, and call it a double entry, do you mean that the figures were entered twice over in two accounts, or that Henry Dundas was debited for twice the amount of the sum for which he was debtor?

Mr. Trotter.—I do mean to state, that I believe he was debited once in each of the accounts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you mean that he was charged 1,764*l.* more by you than he ought to have been charged?

Mr. Trotter.—I find, from looking into Mr. Coutts' books, the sum mentioned by the honourable manager charged in my general account with Mr. Coutts in two different sums, one of 1,000*l.* the other making up the odd sum of 1,764*l.* and I find, in what I called the separate account, a sum charged to Mr. Dundas; I find that carried to the credit of the other account, by which I rectified the debit which was wrong made in the first account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you mean, that you are now debtor in 1,764*l.* to lord Melville more than you thought you were when you signed the release?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not mean to say so; I mean to explain, that I debited lord Melville to a sum of 1,000*l.* and to a second sum of 700*l.* and odd. I drew a draft, payable to his lordship, for those two sums, upon my account, at Mr. Coutts', which I call my own account. I afterwards wished to make that debit appear in the separate account only; for which purpose I drew another draft, payable to Mr. Dundas, for 1,700*l.* and odd, to rectify the mistake I had made in the first account, as no sum appears to the credit of the first account under his name.

Mr. Whitbread.—Then, notwithstanding this double entry, the accounts were, such as you presented them, right and correct, at last?

Mr. Trotter.—The accounts were so; but I apprehended the question led to know, whether all the sums that were charged, or appeared to be charged to Mr. Dundas, actually went to his credit.

Mr. Whitbread.—But were the accounts, at last, correct and right?

Mr. Trotter.—They are correct in substance, although there appears a greater sum issued to Mr. Dundas than was issued to him.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are they correct in substance?

Mr. Trotter.—They are; I believe all my accounts are so.

Mr. Whitbread.—When a draft was drawn upon the house of Mr. Coutts, the produce of which was to be paid into the public cash at the Bank, was not there always a distinguishing mark, such as A. P. Act of Parliament account, or some other, by which you could distinguish, when referring to your accounts, that such draft was made for a public purpose?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know of any such mark.

Mr. Whitbread.—You were cross-examined by the learned counsel yesterday, as to a particular mark on one of your drafts of A. P. or something of that sort?

Mr. Trotter.—One of the accounts of the treasurer of the navy is designated, "Act of Parliament Account;" and when I drew a check payable upon that account, I would say, payable to Act of Parliament Account. But it does not follow, that I applied it to a payment, on account of the Act of Parliament Account, though I gave it that name.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that money, so drawn by you, from Mr. Dundas's Act of Parliament Account, specified upon it, money which you meant to apply to your own private emolument?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not. Every particular sum that is drawn there, is attended with particular circumstances, and I can give no general answer to that general question.

Mr. Whitbread.—The learned counsel yesterday cross-examined as to the accounts being kept up by the ex-treasurer of the navy, and so forth—whether you know that there was, during the treasurership of lord Melville, an Accountant's branch established in the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—I do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was that done during the treasurership of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did that branch continue its functions uninterrupted from the moment of its appointment?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it did, until it was found necessary to remove a great number of clerks, belonging to that branch, to a different branch of the office, to carry on the current business of the office, which was greatly augmented when the war began.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did the interruption to this branch of the accountant's business take place?

Mr. Trotter.—Many years ago; but I cannot recollect the precise time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect how long it went on in the due execution of its office?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not precisely recollect, but I suppose several years.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect when it was first discontinued?

Mr. Trotter.—It has been discontinued many years; but there was an absolute necessity for discontinuing it; it was done after several consultations and conversation with the navy board; and was not a suggestion of mine or of the treasurer.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it first discontinued on account of any suggestion to the navy board, or in consequence of any conversations with the officers of that board?

Mr. Trotter.—As far as I recollect the circumstance, it was discontinued from the navy board withdrawing several of their clerks, who were necessarily employed in the same business, and when they were withdrawn, it became necessary for the treasurer also to withdraw his, as they were proceeding on a business that required their joint attendance.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the increase of business in the Pay office the reason why those clerks were withdrawn, or was it because the business of the navy board was not able to keep pace with the business of the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—They both occurred at the same time, because it was to send clerks down to the out-ports, which it was necessary to send from both offices. I found it necessary at last to direct the accountant to take upon himself a duty out of town, as he could not be employed, I thought, with equal advantage upon the treasurer's accounts in town.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did there, to your knowledge, exist in the Bank of England, at the time lord Melville quitted the Navy-pay-office, a balance upon his lordship's first ex-treasurership account?

Mr. Trotter.—Yes, I believe so—I know so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect whereabouts the amount of that balance was?

Mr. Trotter.—The account was nearly closed, and, as far as I recollect, the balance exceeded 5,000*l.* by a few hundreds.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know what became of that balance, upon lord Melville's quitting the office?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe lord Melville drew out that balance.

Mr. Whitbread.—What did he do with it, when he had drawn it out?

Mr. Trotter.—He paid it to me; it was a balance upon the ex-treasurership, and as I understood at that time, all the ex-treasurers had a right to withdraw the money from the Bank, or to do with it as they pleased till the accounts were finally settled.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville pay it to you?

Mr. Trotter.—He did.

Mr. Whitbread.—What did you do with it when lord Melville had paid it to you?

Mr. Trotter.—I first carried it to the credit of his account current, and then I paid it into the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—Into what account at the Bank did you pay it, after you had carried it through your account current?

Mr. Trotter.—I paid it into the Bank on account of balances which I had out of the Bank at that time upon the current account of the navy.

Mr. Whitbread.—You have stated, upon your cross-examination, with regard to the last balances that were paid by lord Melville, that there were balances due by lord Melville upon the account current. Were the balances actually due by lord Melville to you upon the account current, and the balance due upon the Chest account, paid to you by lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe the whole of them were paid to me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Could you specify at all in what manner they were paid to you?

Mr. Trotter.—I have considered the subject very much lately, and from that consideration, I am enabled to speak.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what manner were those balances paid by lord Melville to you?

Mr. Trotter.—Having the power of selling the whole of his lordship's stocks, I directed them to be sold; and they accordingly were either sold, or else the price of the day was allowed me, and paid into the credit of my account at Mr. Coutts'. (They were paid into the credit, I believe, of lord Melville's account at Mr. Coutts'.) If I had documents to speak from, I could make an accurate statement. If the honourable manager, who is perfectly acquainted with the circumstance, will ask me upon each individual sum, I shall perhaps be able to state.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect so far, as that a sum of 20,000*l.* was paid into your hands, on account of lord Melville, by Mr. Sprot?

Mr. Trotter.—It was paid either into my hands, or by Mr. Sprot into the credit of lord Melville's account at Mr. Coutts'.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was another sum of about 30,000*l.* paid into your hand, on account of lord Melville, by Mr. Sprot?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not think the honourable manager has stated it perfectly correct; that money was paid in to the credit of my account at Mr. Coutts', being the produce of the sale of East India stock, which I mentioned yesterday, by which a debt was paid off, which existed upon that stock, of 20,000*l.*; the surplus of it went to the credit of lord Melville's account current with me.

Mr. Whitbread.—What became of it after it passed through the account current with you?

Mr. Trotter.—I also paid that money into the Bank, in liquidation of balances I had out of the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive, or do you know that lord Melville paid, an additional sum of 13,000*l.* in liquidation of balances at the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—That sum formed part of a greater sum, which lord Melville paid me to pay into the Bank on his account; the other part of that sum has already been mentioned; it was 19,000*l.* of the 20,000*l.* or thereabout, which was mentioned before, that formed the whole of the sum, I think, that I received of lord Melville, to pay into the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—Am I to understand that you mean to state, that that part of the balance, which was made good by lord Melville, was made good in the following manner: 20,000*l.* or thereabouts, from Sprot; 30,000*l.* or thereabouts also from Sprot; of which 20,000*l.* went in liquidation of the debt due for the East India stock mentioned yesterday, and the balance paid into the Bank account, after having passed through your account current; and the sum of 13,000*l.* or thereabouts, which was advanced in some other way, added to which, is the ex-treasurer-ship account of 5,000*l.* and upwards?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe the honourable manager has stated them correctly, as far as I can follow him.

Mr. Whitbread.—The learned counsel cross-examined the witness yesterday, as to all the receipts of the witness on account of lord Melville, from various sources and remittances from Scotland and elsewhere. When you speak of the balances due by lord Melville upon his accounts, do you mean to say that before those balances were struck, all those remittances of every description were always carried to his credit? Did you, in fact, always give lord Melville credit for every thing you received on his account when you summed up the account?

Mr. Trotter.—I gave lord Melville credit in one or other of his accounts for all the sums he paid into my hands.

Mr. Whitbread.—That came into your hands in any way.

Mr. Trotter.—I did, as far as I recollect.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know any one instance where you did not credit lord Melville, as an honest man ought to do, for the money you received on his account?

Mr. Trotter.—His lordship was most undoubtedly credited, but if a sum of money had been paid into my hands with directions to pay to himself again, those are the exceptions.

Mr. Whitbread.—Those sums you have last specified never came, I suppose, into the account at all?

Mr. Trotter.—If such a circumstance ever existed, but I do not recollect that it ever did.

Mr. Whitbread.—You stated yesterday about a loan from the house of Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, that had been advanced to lord Melville, and a payment which was made by your direction, after having refreshed your memory by a written document in your own hand-writing, of the date at the time when it was made. Did you make such payment without any direction given by lord Melville at all?

Mr. Trotter.—I stated yesterday that I had lost all recollection of the transaction whatever, but I can certainly state that I could not have made it without lord Melville's directions.

Mr. Whitbread.—You have stated upon your cross-examination, that lord Melville never directed payments to be made out of the public monies specifically: when you received certain modes of direction, such as you have stated this morning, did not lord Melville in fact know that those payments were made, and meant they should, in fact, be made out of public money?

Mr. Plumer.—That is certainly a very leading question put by the honourable manager, and goes not only to what lord Melville directed to be done, but to what lord Melville meant to do.

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish to put my questions with the utmost correctness. The question asked by the learned counsel upon which I may found myself, I suppose was, whether upon that occasion, or upon any other, lord Melville ever directed you to lay out any part of the public money in your hands, for the use and benefit of lord Melville; to which he answers, he never did, under the specific name of public money, or any money bearing that description. I would generally ask, whether you ever received any directions in any way from lord Melville, which led you to know that lord Melville meant the public money; that lord Melville knew that it was public money which was to be so paid?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot swear so.

Mr. Whitbread.—I ask as to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—I certainly cannot swear so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you believe that lord Melville knew that to be public money?

Mr. Plumer.—Certainly that is not a proper question; the witness is to state facts, not opinions.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive such directions from lord Melville as you have specified, which directions led you to debit lord Melville in the Chest account, and do you know that lord Melville meant those directions to be for public money?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not know it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you always use public money when such order was given?

Mr. Trotter.—I request the order to be more particularly described, before I can answer the question.

Mr. Whitbread.—That sort of order which you described in the early part of your examination to-day to be more in the nature of a requisition than a request, which induced you to debit him in the Chest account. Did you always consider such a request as an authority for using public money?

Mr. Trotter.—I have already said that I have placed them to the debit of that account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you in that case always debit it to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—I have already stated that that was the distinction I made, and I always did it of course.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville ever make any inquiry of you,—after the indignant refusal which he had given to the proposition made by you to him, to employ a certain sum of money in the purchase of East-India stock, upon which you were cross-examined yesterday,—Did lord Melville, when he either requested or required money to be advanced to him by you, ever ask you, in any one instance, whether your own private funds would supply that source?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that his lordship ever did; as to inquiring into the particular state of my own private funds, I do not think lord Melville ever did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he ever make any inquiry of you, whether in making such advances you were trenching upon the public balances?

Mr. Trotter.—He never did.

Mr. Whitbread.—You stated that the Chest account was regularly delivered to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—It was at different periods, but not so frequently as I delivered the account current.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were any objections ever made by lord Melville upon your delivering the Chest account to him?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville never examined my accounts, in my presence, so minutely as to enable him to make objections.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he ever in fact object to them?

Mr. Trotter.—He never did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know any instances in which lord Melville did not sign the Chest account after you, from time to time, had delivered that account to him?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any instance in which his lordship refused to sign the accounts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were not the duplicates of the accounts presented by you to lord Melville, left with his lordship?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Of both the Chest account and the account current?

Mr. Trotter.—They were.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it not in evidence that the money with which the loyalty loan was purchased, was transferred from the current account to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—The money which I advanced upon the loyalty loan was.

Mr. Whitbread.—There was some cross-examination as to the dividends of the East-India stock; was not the excess of the interest above the dividends charged to the debit of lord Melville's account?

Mr. Trotter.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you correct as nearly as you can recollect, in stating that the sum advanced for the purchase of the whole of that East-India stock, advanced at different times, was to the best of your recollection 23,000*l.* or thereabouts?

Mr. Trotter.—It was, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the interest at five per cent of 23,000*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—1,150*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the dividend upon the India stock at the time those purchases were made? was it not eight per cent?

Mr. Trotter.—Eight per cent.

Mr. Whitbread.—Calculating upon 14,500*l.* India stock, what would the dividend at eight per cent amount to?

Mr. Trotter.—To the best of my recollection that stock was only 13,500*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Calculate upon a given sum of 14,500*l.* what would it be?

Mr. Trotter.—1,160*l.* I believe.

Mr. Whitbread.—Then supposing it was 14,500*l.* there was no excess of interest above the dividend at that time. Was not the dividend, during the time it was in the possession of lord Melville, advanced from eight per cent to ten and a half per cent?

Mr. Trotter.—It was advanced to ten and a half per cent, but that was several years afterwards.

Mr. Whitbread.—What would the dividend amount to annually upon 14,500*l.* India stock at ten guineas per cent?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe 1,522*l.* 10*s.*

Mr. Whitbread.—It was stated, upon your cross-examination, with regard to the salary of lord Melville, that it had been brought to your recollection, that there were one or two instances in which you had not received the salary of lord Melville, but that Mr. Wilson had done so. When that salary was so received by Mr. Wilson, was it as agent to you, or as agent to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe he received it as agent to myself, as it was placed, I believe in most instances if not in all, to the credit of my account at Mr. Coutts' in the first instance, and afterwards transferred by me to the credit of lord Melville's account current with me.

Mr. Whitbread.—A good many questions were asked, upon cross-examination, with regard to a power of attorney given by lord Melville to sell and transfer stock and receive the dividends. I wish to know whether this power of attorney, for sale and transfer of stock and receipt of dividends, was in the usual and common form of such powers of attorney?

Mr. Trotter.—I know nothing to the contrary, but I do not know that I ever saw them; I fancy they were taken by my banker, but I do not know; I certainly never read them.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect, in any particular instance (and this arises upon the cross-examination with regard to the 2,000*l.* India stock), a desire expressed on the part of lord Melville, for the advance of money by you, to comply with any particular purpose, such as the purchase of 2,000*l.* East-India stock; at which time your account was so low at Messieurs Coutts', that you were obliged to withdraw from the Bank a specific sum to comply with that request?

Mr. Trotter.—Upon looking into Mr. Coutts' books, I find a circumstance of that sort may have occurred, but I do not recollect the circumstance myself; I cannot speak from my own recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—As you were a good deal cross-examined too with regard to the state of the balances in and out of the Bank, can you, from any information upon which you can depend, or any recollection that you have, or in any way state to the Court, what the difference between the Bank account and the office account was at any time or times, while you were paymaster of the Navy under lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot state it from memory.

Mr. Whitbread.—Could you, by consulting any documents, swear to that fact?

Mr. Trotter.—I have got documents in the hands of the honourable managers, by which I think I can ascertain it.

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish those books and documents, to which the witness refers, to be put before him.

Lord Chancellor.—What are those documents by which, if you refer to them, you shall be able to give that answer?

Mr. Trotter.—They are books which I kept as checks upon the public accounts, but no part of the public accounts: I believe they are called balance books.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was this book, lying before you, and the others to which you have referred, kept by yourself when you were paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—The greatest part does appear to be kept by myself.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is any part of that book in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did you continue to write in those books with your own hand?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot state that with any accuracy, but I have wrote very little in them for many years past, having been deprived of the use of my hand, from which I cannot write.

Mr. Whitbread.—When you ceased to be able to write yourself, who kept the books for you?

Mr. Trotter.—Principally Mr. Thomas Wilson, of the Pay office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you examined these books so written by Mr. Wilson?

Mr. Trotter.—I have bestowed upon them all the examination which I have thought necessary.

Mr. Whitbread.—From those books can you speak to the account?

Mr. Trotter.—It depends upon the questions that may be asked me from those books.

Mr. Whitbread.—I ask to a particular period, the 31st of August, 1786; what was the outstanding difference at that time in the Navy-pay-office?—Do you know what, on the 31st of August, 1786, was the difference between the office balance, or that with which the treasurer was charged, and the Bank balance?

Lord Chancellor.—Is that a public official book that lies before you?

Mr. Trotter.—No, it is my own private book, which I kept as a check upon the office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you speak from your own knowledge, whether on the 31st August, 1786, there was a difference of 56,000*l.* between the office balance and the Bank balance?

Mr. Trotter.—I cannot state it from this book, I must have also the concurrent testimony of books kept by the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—This book we can prove, by the Bank clerk that is here, to be one of the banking-books of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I can speak with more positive knowledge further on.

Mr. Whitbread.—I would ask as to the 31st of December, 1787.—Do you know that the difference at that time was 53,100*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—I have already stated that I must have the concurrent testimony of the Bank books, and I wish to give a little explanation upon this account before I speak upon it, if I have your lordships' permission. The treasurer's balance which was returned at the end of this month as well as all other months, consists of balances, in three different branches of the office; each of those branches are subdivided; part of the balance in each branch is in the hands of the treasurer and his paymaster, for the purpose of issuing further sums to the sub-accountant for the carrying on the public payments; and the other parts of it have already been issued to the sub-accountants, for the purpose of carrying on the public payments, that applies to that part which remains in the treasurer's hands, for the purpose I have described, of the three branches collectively.

Mr. Whitbread.—I ask to the aggregate of what ought to be in the hands of the sub-accountants and the treasurer, and then state what is the difference between that and the money in the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—The honourable manager wishes me to state that part of the balance which the first clerk of each branch calculates, by finding out the balance of the sub-accountants, and what ought to be in the hands of the treasurer; that may be accurate or not accurate, as the balance he states to be in the hands of the treasurer may be accurate or not accurate, and the balance he states to be in the treasurer's hands may be stated without his knowing it to be so.

Mr. Whitbread.—State the difference between that which is neither in the sub-accountants hands, nor in the Bank, but in yours?

Mr. Trotter.—On the 31st of December 1787, if the sub-accountants were right in making up their balances, there was a difference of 53,100*l.* between the sum which the first clerk said ought to be in the treasurer's hands, and the sum which was in the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—Now refer to the 31st May 1788.

Mr. Trotter.—Will your lordships allow me to speak from this account in my hand, instead of the book?

Lord Chancellor.—What is that paper?

Mr. Trotter.—An account I have collected from an examination of the books, and the Bank books.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that upon the 31st of May, 1788, there was a difference, in the way I stated before of, 61,600*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—There appears to be such a difference.

Lord Chancellor.—Is that subject to the same explanation that you gave of the former entry?

Mr. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to May the 31st 1790; was there not then a difference, subject to the same explanation, of 64,800*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—The statement is accurate.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 31st March, 1792; was there not a balance of 102,388*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*?

Mr. Trotter.—There appears to be that difference.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 31st October, 1793; was there not the sum then of 115,000*l.* difference, subject to the same explanations?

Mr. Trotter.—There appears to have been that difference existing at that time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 30th of April 1794; was there not then a balance of 161,425*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*?

Mr. Trotter.—That appears also to be correct.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 28th of February 1795; was there not a balance of 209,875*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, subject to the same explanation?

Mr. Trotter.—There was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 30th of April 1795; was the balance then 310,325*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.*?

Mr. Trotter.—The account which I hold in my hand differs two-pence.

Mr. Whitbread.—I stated it wrong, it is 17*s.* 9*d.*?

Mr. Trotter.—That is right.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 31st of March 1796; was not the balance then 194,500*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—That appears to be correct.

Mr. Whitbread.—On the 29th of February, of the same year, was it not 216,841*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*?

Mr. Trotter.—That also appears to be correctly taken from these books.

Mr. Whitbread.—On the 30th of June 1797 was it not 281,759*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.*?

Mr. Trotter.—That appears to be correct.

Mr. Whitbread.—On the 30th of September 1798 was it 222,500*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—That appears to be correctly taken.

Mr. Whitbread.—On the 30th of November 1799 was it 223*l.* os. 2½*d.*?

Mr. Trotter.—That appears to be correctly taken also.

Mr. Whitbread.—On the 30th of April 1800, the month preceding lord Melville's quitting the Navy-pay-office, was there not the sum of 344,500*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—There appears to have been that difference between the books.

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish to recall your attention to the 30th of December 1790: was not the balance then struck, and no difference appeared?

Mr. Trotter.—The balance was struck, and no difference appeared; but some explanation may be necessary upon that.

Lord Chancellor.—Give that explanation.

Mr. Trotter.—That this balance may not actually have been paid up in the Bank books; I have taken into the balance the drafts I may have drawn upon the Bank, and which might not have been presented; I do not know whether there were any such, but if there were, they were taken into my balance.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, I can prove every balance monthly, from 1786 down to 1800, when lord Melville quitted the Navy-pay-office; but it appears to us to be an unnecessary wasting of your lordships' time so to do, and we could prove larger differences even than those that have been stated, but as there might be some difficulty in referring to a part of them, the commons have thought it sufficient to take this mode of stating it to your lordships. There is a fractional difference with regard to one large balance of 490,000*l.* in one year, and I have not proved that, because it might be necessary to bring two drafts into court, for the purpose of showing that they were or were not presented, which might reduce the balance 10,000*l.* But the commons have not thought it worth while to call your lordships' attention to such a circumstance, having substantially proved the fact. I hope I have not forgotten any thing on the part of the commons; I should be extremely sorry if I had, but I cannot charge my memory at present with any other question which it would be material for the commons to ask. I am pretty sure that I have not asked a single question that has not its foundation in the cross-examination of the learned counsel; if I have, he will have the goodness to point out what it is?

Mr. Plumer.—According to my observation of the examination of this morning, a great deal of new matter has been introduced by the honourable manager, to which by the course of proceeding I should be entitled to put questions upon cross examination; but the course of examination pursued this morning appears to me to have left the matter so much as it stood yesterday, that I shall not avail myself of the right of putting questions upon that new matter, excepting one, which I wish to ask merely for the purpose of explanation.—The honourable manager has asked to-day respecting money that was drawn by the noble defendant, by requisitions, which were immediately carried to the Chest account.

Mr. Whitbread.—I beg, before that question is asked, to refer the learned counsel to the part of his cross-examination, upon which I founded that specific question. The foundation of that re-examination of mine is in a question and answer which I read before to your lordships; but having asserted the right of the commons to refuse the cross-examination of the counsel, the commons relinquish their right at this time, in order that there may not appear the least wish on their part to keep back any thing that the learned counsel can get out of the witness, in favour of lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether any part of the sums, stated to be drawn and carried to the Chest account of lord Melville, was in the whole or in part applied to the use of lord Melville, or he had any benefit or emolument from them?

Mr. Trotter.—I am totally ignorant of the application of them, excepting in the case of 40,000*l.* which had been advanced to Boyd and Benfield, and which I only learned from what has passed in public.

Mr. Plumer.—Is that 40,000*l.* comprehended within the head just mentioned, of money drawn by requisitions, and carried immediately to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was, and may serve to show the nature of the requisitions that were made, from that sum of money having been made more the subject of public discussion than any of the other sums which have been advanced to his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether any part of the sums that you employed to purchase stock, or in any other way, for the benefit of lord Melville, stood in the same predicament of being immediately carried to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—Not any of them.

Mr. Plumer.—I think you have stated, that a book of yours, which you referred to, a private book of yours, was in the possession of the managers; how long has that private book been in the possession of the managers?

Mr. Trotter.—Ever since the day upon which I had the misfortune to meet with the displeasure of the other House; I do not recollect the date.

Mr. Whitbread.—It was on the sixth of March, that the committee thought proper to call for the interposition of the House.

Lord Chancellor.—Has the counsel any other question to propose?

Mr. Plumer.—Several others; but I shall not give your lordships any more trouble.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you any knowledge, with the exception of the knowledge you have subsequently gained, with regard to the application of the 40,000*l.*; do you know any thing of the application of other sums?

Mr. Trotter.—I have no knowledge whatever of the application of them.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are we correct in supposing, that the loyalty loan money, was transferred from the account current to the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether lord Melville was not credited for the dividends, upon the loyalty loan, up to the period at which that loan was sold?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe he was.

A Lord.—Having stated that lord Melville, from time to time, signed those accounts, which you delivered to his lordship; did you compare, upon those occasions, the accounts you so signed with the vouchers?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect his ever comparing them, whilst I remained with his lordship.

A Lord.—Were those accounts, you have been speaking of, generally signed by lord Melville, immediately that they were presented by you, or did his lordship take the accounts home with him for consideration?

Mr. Trotter.—They were signed before I parted with him.

A Lord.—You stated that no item in these accounts had been ever objected to by the noble lord. Was it the habit of the noble lord to enter into any discussion with you, upon the several items of the accounts?

Mr. Trotter.—The items of those accounts were so numerous, that I have no doubt, but his lordship may have made observations upon some particular instances; but I do not recollect them.

A Lord.—Do you consider the accounts having been so signed by lord Melville, as a proof of his lordship's approbation of the accounts, and the particular items therein contained, or as a proof of his lordship's confidence in you?

Mr. Trotter.—It certainly was, in the first instance, a proof of his lordship's confidence in me; as he must have known that I was subject to alter the accounts, in case he should have pointed out any error in them in future; but the public business, in which his lordship was generally engaged, seldom or never afforded him time to enter into any examination of the accounts, during the time that I remained with him, after having presented them to his lordship.

A Lord.—During the time that you were paymaster to lord Melville, did any, and what circumstances of delay or embarrassment to the public business arise in that office, so as to induce his lordship to doubt the correctness of your administration, and so as to engage him to a greater attention to those accounts, or to suggest to his lordship's mind that a more attentive investigation into the conduct of this office was necessary, than had been given by his lordship?

Mr. Trotter.—I know of none; but as I may be supposed to speak with partiality, with regard to my own conduct in the office, I should wish that question to be asked of any individual that was conversant with the business of the Pay-office.

A Lord.—At what time did you make the representation you have stated to lord Melville, to induce him to consent to your placing part of the public money in the Bank, in the hands of Messieurs Coutts and Company?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe soon after the removal of the business of the Pay-office to Somerset-house, from Broad-street, in the city.

A Lord.—Do you recollect what time that was?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe in the year 1786 or 1787.

A Lord.—You having stated, that the object you represented to lord Melville to be the reason why you wished to have permission to take the money from the Bank, and place it in the hands of Messieurs Coutts, was for more convenience and greater safety.—How could you conceive that there was any greater danger either to the treasurer of the navy or yourself, as paymaster, in the money remaining in the Bank, than in the hands of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Trotter.—I beg to answer, that it was necessary to carry on the business of the Payoffice to send in drafts for very large sums, say 20,000*l.* or 30,000*l.* into the Bank daily; that we had no clerks or confidential people we could spare for that business, but were obliged frequently to send the messengers of the office, and it may appear to your lordships that it was a necessary precaution to fall upon some mode by which we could send a messenger for money to carry on those small payments, through a part of the town which was not so crowded, and not liable to so many accidents as in the great distance from the Pay-office to the Bank.

Then the following questions put to the witness on Monday the 5th instant, and his answers thereto were read:

Q.—“From the moment the list is received of the bills assigned, I understand you to say, that the treasurer must be ready to satisfy them when called for?”

A.—“He certainly may be called upon—I beg to explain that, I have said, there never has been any delay of a payment of a navy or victualling bill; but there is another description which are not called navy or victualling bills, which I did not advert to at that time. All navy or victualling bills are drawn assignable out of a certain sum of money received at the Exchequer; as long as that fund lasts, the bills are drawn from that fund; but there is another description of bills, not to a great amount, which are drawn upon the general fund of wages, without specifying any particular sum; and when the fund, under the head of wages, has been low, the navy board have thought proper to desire the treasurer to cease making payments of those bills, until a supply, under the head of wages, should be received from the Treasury.”

Q.—“Does that delay in any respect proceed from any act either of the treasurer or his paymaster?”

A.—“Not in any degree whatever.”

A Lord.—Explain that last answer; how it is that that does not depend either upon the treasurer or the paymaster?

Mr. Trotter.—Because they can only act by the instructions of the different boards.

A Lord.—You stated that you delivered two kinds of accounts to lord Melville, the current account, and the other account; were those mere copies of the accounts, or accounts made up from the accounts at Messieurs Coutts’?

Mr. Trotter.—They had no connexion whatever with the accounts at Messieurs Coutts; they were accounts between lord Melville and myself.

A Lord.—Whether you know that the public sustained any loss by the removal of the money from the Bank of England to Messieurs Coutts’?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know any loss that the public have sustained.

A Lord.—Do you know, whether the public did not sustain a loss, by the death of Mr. Jellicoe; and how that loss arose?

Mr. Trotter.—That was not a loss in consequence of having removed the money from the Bank, to the bank of Messieurs Coutts'.

A Lord.—Could that loss have happened, if the money had continued to be lodged in the Bank?

Mr. Trotter.—That circumstance could not have been affected by the money being continued in the Bank.

A Lord.—Whether the account, called the Iron Chest account, was principally of a public nature?

Mr. Trotter.—The Iron Chest account, was an account of monies which were drawn from the Bank, and placed into the hands of Messieurs Coutts'.

A Lord.—Having said, that my lord Melville paid a great deal more attention to accounts that were public, than to his own private accounts; what kind of attention did he pay to this Iron Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville, I do not think ever saw the Iron Chest account; I beg to explain to your lordships, that the Iron Chest account is a different account from the Chest account I have been speaking of.

A Lord.—The account you are asked concerning, is the Chest account, which you repeatedly, in the course of your examination, mentioned?

Mr. Trotter.—As my mind ran on the other account, I forgot the question that I was asked respecting it.

A Lord.—The question is; as you have stated that my lord Melville paid a great deal more attention to accounts that were public, than to his own private accounts; what kind of attention did he pay to the Chest account? meaning that account you have been repeatedly referring to, in the course of your examination?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know what attention lord Melville paid to that account, when he had the documents in his own possession; but he never paid any particular attention to it, during the time I was with his lordship, when I had presented it to his lordship.

A Lord.—Having said that when you delivered the private accounts to lord Melville (the account between you and lord Melville), his lordship was not in the course of investigating those accounts, or comparing the vouchers with them; if a complete investigation of those accounts, had taken place, between lord Melville and you, would it not then have appeared, that the monies in that account were monies advanced out of the public monies?

Mr. Trotter.—I apprehend it would.

A Lord.—When the application was made to lord Melville, upon the subject of the purchase of East India stock, was any reference made to the current price of that stock, at that time?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any reference made to the current price at that time, further than by a comparison to what his lordship expected would be the rise that stock would ultimately arrive at, at a distant time; that was the only time lord Melville ever gave me his opinion upon the value of it; and at no time whatever did his lordship ever insinuate to me, in the smallest degree, his expectations of the rise or fall of stock, excepting in that instance.

A Lord.—You having said, that for a considerable length of time, after the purchase of this stock, the interest of the money, which was borrowed for the purchase of it, amounted to a greater sum than the dividend arising from that stock. Whether any person lending money, in the ordinary course of dealing by money-lenders, would have considered the assignment of such stock, putting it in the name of the lender, as a collateral security for the money advanced for that stock?

Another Lord.—That is a question calling upon the witness to enter into an argument, and not to answer to a fact. I submit that cannot be put.

The question was waived.

A Lord.—How and in what manner was that 3,000*l.* you spoke to in your examination, repaid?

Mr. Trotter.—I can only recollect that it was repaid by his lordship to me, at two different times, in two different sums.

A Lord.—Did you take any receipt of lord Melville for that money which you paid him?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not.

A Lord.—Having stated that in the account between lord Melville and you, lord Melville was credited for the dividends upon the India stock, and debited for the interest of the money lent, in whose name was that receipt put?

Mr. Trotter.—No name was used at all; his lordship got credit by the dividend, and was debited to the interest, without any name being specified.

A Lord.—Supposing lord Melville had not rejected, as he did, with indignation, the proposition you made of advancing to lord Melville the public money, as the means of purchasing that stock; in what manner would it have been debited in the course of business?

Mr. Trotter.—As the fact did not exist, I have never taken it into consideration.

A Lord.—Would it have been debited in the manner in which it was debited?

Mr. Trotter.—I should not make any entry of any sort without a due consideration, and I cannot, in my present situation, give it a due consideration.

A Lord.—You stated, that after lord Melville had rejected the proposal that you made, to purchase India stock out of the public money, you suggested to lord Melville that you could procure the money from your relation, Mr. Lind, upon the security of that stock; that failing to procure the money, you stated, notwithstanding, to lord Melville, that you had so procured it, and the stock was in fact purchased, as I understood you, in the name of Mr. Lind. Was lord Melville acquainted with the circumstance of the stock having been so purchased in the name of Mr. Lind?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville knew that the stock stood in the name of Mr. Lind; but I never told lord Melville that I had actually procured Mr. Lind to advance the money.

A Lord.—In the course of the transaction of the purchase of this stock between you and lord Melville, was that transaction so conducted as if the money had been bonâ fide advanced for the purchase of that stock by Mr. Lind?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

A Lord.—What do you mean by the Iron Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—That was an account that was kept in the Navy-pay-office by Mr. Wilson and myself, in which we entered the sums of money that were taken from the Bank and put into Mr. Coutts', and vice versa, the sums drawn from Coutts, and issued to the sub-accountants.

A Lord.—What is it that you mean by Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—The Chest account was one of those accounts which I kept with lord Melville, upon which I had been required to advance sums of the application of which I knew nothing.

A Lord.—What was the first item of the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was the sum of 10,600*l*.

A Lord.—Were there other advances upon the face of that Chest account, immediately after the opening of it?

Mr. Trotter.—There were other sums advanced upon that account, but not immediately after the opening of it.

A Lord.—How soon?

Mr. Trotter.—My memory does not serve me to state.

A Lord.—You have said that in the year 1797 the advances for payment of the subscription of the loyalty loan were transferred from the account current to the Chest account; were there not many intermediate advances on the Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—There were more than one, but not many.

A Lord.—Whether, on the face of the Chest account, delivered the half year after the transfer of the loyalty loan was made from the current account to the Chest account, it might not appear to lord Melville that such transfer was made?

Mr. Trotter.—It must have appeared.

A Lord.—You have said that at the close of lord Melville's treasurership, you showed to lord Melville the sum advanced to him from the public money. I desire to know if lord

Melville explained to you from what sources that money was to be repaid?

Mr. Trotter.—I have said that I gave a general statement of lord Melville's accounts between his lordship and myself; and he consequently pointed out different sources from which money would arise in repayment of those sums, and which he expressed a wish to repay before he left the treasurership.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville express any surprise at the state of his account?

Mr. Trotter.—He did, he was very much surprised to find the balance was so much against him.

A Lord.—Having stated that you conceived that no loss or detriment accrued to the public by drawing the money from the Bank, and putting it in the hands of private bankers, state whether withdrawing so large a sum of money from the Bank, would not put it less in the power of the Bank, to make those discounts on which the trading part of the public depend?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know how far it would be proper for me to enter into an argument on that subject with your lordships.

Another Lord.—I submit to your lordships, we do not sit here to hear arguments.

The question was waived.

A Lord.—Having stated that you alone derived the benefit from this application of a part of the public money,—whether, without that application of the public money you have stated, you would have been in the condition to have made the advances you have stated you made to lord Melville, without charging any interest?

Mr. Trotter.—I could not; unless, finding that I had not the means of augmenting my fortune in the manner I did, I might have turned my attention elsewhere, and then I might have been able to have advanced these monies.

A Lord.—In what year was the money placed at Messieurs Coutts's?

Mr. Trotter.—Either in 1786 or 1787, I do not know which; at least I believe so.

A Lord.—Have you any books to which you could refer, and which books would enable you to give a more specific answer to the question?

Mr. Trotter.—I have not, unless I speak from the books of my bankers.

A Lord.—Have you got those books, so as to make the reference?

Mr. Trotter.—I can have access to those books by applying to my bankers.

A Lord.—Did you propose to lord Melville to draw the money out of the Bank, and to place such money at Mr. Coutts's?

Mr. Trotter.—I did apply to lord Melville for leave so to do.

A Lord.—Did all the money, that from time to time you deposited in Messieurs Coutts's bank, arise from the general permission you before spoke to?

Mr. Trotter.—Entirely so—and in no instance was it otherwise specifically, as far as I recollect.

A Lord.—Did you know, at the time when you deposited the sum of money in Mr. Coutts's bank, that the act of parliament had passed a year or two years before?

Mr. Trotter.—I knew that an act had passed to regulate the business of the Pay-office; but I do not know that I adverted to it, at the instant I made the application to lord Melville to draw the money from the Bank, and put it into the hands of Messieurs Coutts.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville, when you made this application to his lordship, make any answer?

Mr. Trotter.—He did not, to the best of my recollection.

A Lord.—Did the settlement of the release, which contained in it the destruction of the vouchers, or delivering up all the vouchers, originate either with lord Melville or you?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not think it originated with either; I am sure lord Melville was not consulted upon the subject at all.

A Lord.—With whom did that clause, respecting the destruction of the vouchers, originate?

Mr. Trotter.—It must have originated in conversation between my solicitor and myself.

A Lord.—Whether what passed between lord Melville and you, upon the probable rise of India stock, was in the course of official communication between lord Melville and you, or were you sent for by his lordship?

Mr. Trotter.—I was not sent for by his lordship; I believe I was at Wimbledon, when I had the honour of waiting upon his lordship, in his private capacity.

A Lord.—Whether the first suggestion upon the subject of this stock, originated with lord Melville, or proceeded from you?

Mr. Trotter.—It was suggested by me, in consequence of finding his lordship wished to make some family arrangement of that sort.

A Lord.—Then I understand, the first expression of lord Melville's opinion of the value of India stock, originated with lord Melville, and was not suggested to lord Melville by you?

Mr. Trotter.—It originated in the suggestion of myself to his lordship.

A Lord.—Did the original idea of purchasing the East India stock, arise from any desire of lord Melville to be possessed of India stock, although the subsequent conversation was in consequence of what you suggested?

Mr. Trotter.—As it all passed in a conversation, not premeditated or sought for by either party, I am quite at a loss to say who first started the subject.

A Lord.—Was the suggestion given to have recourse to some money-lender, to furnish the money, for the stock that was proposed to be purchased, a part of the same conversation, when it was first proposed to purchase the stock?

Mr. Trotter.—It was in the same conversation; and on the impulse of the moment.

A Lord.—Was the suggestion then adopted, upon your making it?

Mr. Trotter.—It was.

A Lord.—How soon afterwards did you proceed to carry it into effect?

Mr. Trotter.—I endeavoured for some considerable time to fulfil what I had suggested to his lordship it might be possible for me to effect; but finding it was not so, I then fell upon the mode, which I have already described, of advancing the money myself, as I was unwilling to disappoint lord Melville of what I had so sanguinely promised him I could carry into effect.

A Lord.—When you had carried it into effect, by that mode, did you communicate to lord Melville, that you had completed it; and how soon did you name the person who had advanced the money?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not say that any person had advanced the money, but I told him the stock was purchased, and invested in the name of Mr. Montague Lind, the person I had mentioned to his lordship in the original conversation.

A Lord.—Did you, upon making that communication to lord Melville, receive any, and what answer?

Mr. Trotter.—Nothing farther than his approbation of its having been done.

A Lord.—Were the dividends upon the India stock paid to Mr. Lind, or carried to the credit of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—That I have already explained.

A Lord.—At what period of time did you begin building your house near Edinburgh?

Mr. Trotter.—As nearly as I can recollect, I made a considerable addition to my house, which I began about four or five years ago.

A Lord.—Is that house furnished?

Mr. Trotter.—I removed the furniture from my house at Blackheath, with which it is now furnished?

A Lord.—Were you ever interrogated by lord Melville, as to the expense of building this house?

Mr. Trotter.—The expense of building this house may not be so great as noble lords may have heard, not so great as to induce lord Melville to ask me any questions upon that subject.

A Lord.—I think the release executed between the noble lord and you, was executed first by lord Melville in Scotland, and some few days after by you in London; was it prepared in London under your direction, or in Scotland under the direction of the noble defendant?

Mr. Trotter.—It was prepared in London, and sent to his lordship to execute in Scotland.

A Lord.—Was any draft of this release sent to the noble defendant in Scotland, to be subject to his correction, previous to his execution of the deed itself?

Mr. Trotter.—It was not, to the best of my knowledge; I do not know whether the solicitor might have sent it, but I am certain I did not.

A Lord.—Were any alterations or corrections, to your knowledge, made in it by lord Melville, previous to his lordship's execution of it.

Mr. Trotter.—Certainly not.

A Lord.—Whether, within your experience or knowledge of the noble defendant's unlimited confidence in you, and of the incorrect manner in which the noble defendant used to transact his own private concerns, you believe that lord Melville examined with any accuracy the contents of the deed before he executed it?

Another Lord.—I really am afraid, that a witness who was in London, must not state his belief of what lord Melville did in Scotland.

The question was waived.

A Lord.—Give to the Court an account of the whole transaction concerning the release; and, in giving to the Court an account of the whole of that transaction, begin with stating what was the occasion or necessity for having that release at all?

Mr. Trotter.—The necessity originated in my wish to have all my affairs settled with lord Melville, as I always apprehended (I hope I may be allowed to say) that his lordship was not careful of preserving his papers or accounts, so as to be satisfactory to his heirs or successors; and that there might be no difficulty or argument about showing that a final settlement had been made, to either his lordship's heirs or to my own, I was anxious that a release should pass, by which it only became necessary that one voucher should be preserved. I had proposed it some time before it was carried into execution, and my mind became every day still more impressed with the necessity of having this executed; and in some conversation with his lordship I may have proposed it again, and told him that I would forward releases for his lordship, to be signed in Scotland, if he would give me leave; but this I state, more from knowing that that must have been the circumstance, than from an actual recollection of the time or place when such conversation passed. I then applied to my solicitor in London, to draw out a release for such purpose; and as he was my intimate friend and counsellor, as well as solicitor, he proceeded very much from his own knowledge of my situation and connexion with lord Melville, in drawing up that release: the draft was submitted to me, as it has been brought to my recollection by the honorable managers, who have possessed themselves of that draft, otherwise I had forgot the circumstance; but I find that I had seen that draft, by several words being written upon it in my own writing: it was afterwards brought to me by Mr. Spottiswoode, fairly copied out, and, to the best of my recollection, forwarded by me to his lordship in Scotland, and he returned it to me, by which the transaction was finally closed.

A Lord.—What do you mean by returned it?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville returned the release, signed by his lordship, to me—and I executed it in London.

A Lord.—State what there was in the correspondence upon the subject of this release, subsequent to the time when lord Melville left London for Scotland?

Mr. Trotter.—I recollect no correspondence whatever about it, nor do I believe that any correspondence ever existed.

A Lord.—Had you at any time been examined by the commissioners?

Mr. Trotter.—I had not.

A Lord.—Was any person, on the part of lord Melville, present at the composing that deed in London?

Mr. Trotter.—There was not.

A Lord.—What was done in consequence of that deed?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any thing that was done in consequence of that; I do not know what is alluded to.

A Lord.—Whether, in point of fact, any books and accounts were destroyed, or had been destroyed, either previous or subsequent to that deed?

Mr. Trotter.—Subsequent to the deed; I thought it no longer necessary to preserve lord Melville's vouchers.

A Lord.—Previous to the deed?

Mr. Trotter.—Previous to the deed I do not recollect any being destroyed.

Lord Chancellor.—Let the deed be referred to.

Then the following extract from the Release was read:

“And they have either mutually delivered up to each other, or resolved and agreed mutually to cancel and destroy all the vouchers or other memorandums and writings that at any time heretofore may have existed, passed, or been interchanged between them, relative to the said accounts, and the different items and articles of which the said accounts are composed or consist.”

A Lord.—You having attended to the recital of the deed, state whether, as it is put in the alternative, either that they had been destroyed or were resolved to be destroyed: had there, to your knowledge, been any books or accounts delivered up or destroyed, previous to the execution of that deed?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not know it, but I believe lord Melville seldom kept his vouchers at all: with regard to myself, I had destroyed no voucher previous to that time.

A Lord.—The question is, whether you had, previous to the execution of this deed, delivered up or destroyed any books or accounts referable to the subject of that release?

Mr. Trotter.—I had not to the best of my recollection.

A Lord.—Have you subsequent to that time?

Mr. Trotter.—I have, as I thought it no longer necessary to preserve them; that being the object of getting a release.

A Lord.—How soon after being in possession of a salary of 500*l.* a year, did you find yourself to be in a condition to be a lender of money?

Mr. Trotter.—I explained to this Court yesterday, that I was put in possession of a sum of money as soon as I was appointed to the office, by which I was enabled to become a lender of money.

A Lord.—You have stated that you made a proposition to lord Melville, which his lordship indignantly rejected; did you ever make any such proposition at any other time?

Mr. Trotter.—I never did.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville ever allude to that proposition afterwards?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that his lordship ever did.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville ever say any thing to you, subsequent to the time of your having made that proposition, from whence you collected a supposition on the part of his lordship that you were so using the public money?

Mr. Trotter.—Never.

A Lord.—Does the paymaster of the navy give any security?

Mr. Trotter.—None.

A Lord.—Do you know whether, in the course of office, the treasurer of the navy takes any oath?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe none.

A Lord.—You have said that lord Melville was charged interest upon the money advanced upon this India stock, at the time when the interest was greater than the dividend; can you point out at what time that interest was charged?

Mr. Trotter.—The honourable manager has shown that the interest very nearly corresponded with the dividend, and consequently no sum could be charged; but to the best of my recollection there was only 13,500*l.* of that stock instead of 14,500*l.* upon which the honourable manager has calculated; in which case the interest would have exceeded the dividend, and of course I debited his lordship with one, and credited him with the other.

A Lord.—Having stated that you in fact did charge interest, that must have arisen from the interest being greater than the dividend: will that fact depend upon whether you are not mistaken with regard to the sum being 13,500*l.* or 14,500*l.*?

Mr. Trotter.—No, it may be from an error of the present moment in my calculation, because I did not debit lord Melville with that specific overplus, but I debited him with the interest, and I credited him with the dividends; by which it arose in my mind, at the moment I spoke, that the interest was greater than the dividend, and of course from that manner of entering the interest and the dividend, it became a charge upon lord Melville.

A Lord.—Do you know the date of the appointment of the naval commissioners?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not.

A Lord.—Do you recollect when the naval commissioners issued their precept to the Navy-pay-office for the return of their balances?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect it at this moment.

A Lord.—Do you recollect at what time, or within a month of the time, when the return was made to the commissioners of naval inquiry requiring the balances of the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Trotter.—That return was made I believe in the month of January 1803, but the precept had been issued many months before, I believe.

A Lord.—How soon was that return made before you gave directions for the execution of this release?

Mr. Trotter.—A very short time I believe.

A Lord.—At the time you were so anxious to have this release executed, were you acquainted that lord Melville was supposed to be in a declining state of health?

Mr. Trotter.—If the fact was so, I was undoubtedly acquainted with it, but I do not recollect at this moment that that weighed upon my mind.

A Lord.—Had the knowledge of that return any effect on your mind in procuring this release?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it had.

A Lord.—At the time when you received permission from lord Melville, to draw the public money from the Bank, and to place it in your own name in the hands of Messieurs Coutts, or at any subsequent time, did you receive any injunction from his lordship, not to apply any part of that money to your own use?

Mr. Trotter.—I received no such injunction; but I received no prohibition—I mean I received no permission to do so.

A Lord.—Was your reason for not repeating the proposition the fear of giving offence to the noble lord?

Mr. Trotter.—I was afraid of giving offence to the noble lord; and that it would induce his lordship to relinquish an advantage which I was in hopes his lordship would ultimately derive from it.

A Lord.—Whether, though no such permission had been given by lord Melville for the removal of money from the Bank to Messieurs Coutts's you could not nevertheless have applied the money to your own use?

Mr. Trotter.—I answered that question yesterday, by saying I could certainly have done so, though I might have looked upon it as still a greater act of delinquency upon my part.

A Lord.—You have said, that the first idea of the proposition of a release, arose from the conversation between lord Melville and yourself; can you assign any date to that conversation?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe it was as far back as our general settlement in the year 1800.

A Lord.—Did you in that conversation propose that there should be instructions and directions for the mutual destruction of vouchers?

Mr. Trotter.—I never mentioned that clause in the release to his lordship, nor did I recollect that such clause existed in that release, till I was reading it once at the time the honourable manager called upon me to read it; so little impression had it made upon my mind, and so little meaning had I in desiring it to be put in.

A Lord.—You said that the interest fell short of the dividends; do you mean that the dividend upon the stock did not produce as much money as the interest upon the money lent?

Mr. Trotter.—That was the impression of my mind when I spoke yesterday; but that was upon a calculation which I made yesterday; which I find that, although erroneous, is not materially so, only ten pounds, I believe.

A Lord.—Were any of those accounts and vouchers, which it was the object of the release to have mutually destroyed or given up, at that time in the hands of lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—Lord Melville delivered no vouchers to me, and I do not know whether he has destroyed them at this moment or possesses them or not, I know nothing of them.

A Lord.—What was the name of that solicitor and friend who prepared this deed?

Mr. Trotter.—Mr. John Spottiswoode of Sackville-Street.

A Lord.—Was that gentleman generally employed in law affairs respecting Scotch property?

Mr. Trotter.—He was, I believe.

A Lord.—Was not that Mr. Spottiswoode a man of considerable eminence in his profession?

Mr. Trotter.—He was of considerable eminence, and a most eminent character also.

A Lord.—Does it consist with your knowledge that that release was drawn by Mr. Spottiswoode, according to his own professional knowledge, as to what would be the right form of such a release; or, were any directions given by you, with respect to any clauses that should be inserted in it?

Mr. Trotter.—I gave no specific directions respecting that clause, but we had a conversation upon it: I am sure it must have proceeded from his advice, although I do not recollect that neither.

A Lord.—Was that clause in the release, which states the consent of both parties to the registration of that instrument in the public records of Scotland, suggested by you or by Mr. Spottiswoode?

Mr. Trotter.—I know so little of deeds of that description, that I did not know that such a clause was in the deed.

A Lord.—Does it consist with your knowledge, that according to that clause, this instrument is or is not to be publicly recorded?

Mr. Trotter.—I have never taken any steps towards having it publicly recorded: if it has been publicly recorded, it must have been by Mr. Spottiswoode, before it came to my hands.

A Lord.—Having stated that the intimation which you had received from the commissioners had an operation on your mind, when you directed the release to be prepared, was the operation of that fact upon your mind, to your knowledge, communicated to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I ever stated any thing upon that subject to lord Melville?

A Lord.—Do you know whether any other person ever stated to lord Melville that, on account of that transaction with the commissioners, it would be expedient that such a release as this should be executed?

Mr. Trotter.—No such fact consists with my knowledge.

A Lord.—When you communicated to lord Melville your advice, that the money should be removed from the Bank to Mr. Coutts' shop, had you at that time formed any intention of applying the money to private purposes?

Mr. Trotter.—It is not impossible that I had made use of the public money before that time; but I had it not in contemplation, to the best of my remembrance, that this would add any facility to my doing so in future after that time.

A Lord.—How long was it after the money had been placed at Mr. Coutts' that you first began to employ it, in the various ways in which you have stated you did employ it, for your private use and benefit?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe I had begun to employ it before it had gone there; and I continued it after it had gone there; there was no interruption that I know of.

A Lord.—You have stated that it would appear, from the Chest account and the account current, that the public money had been employed; and you have also stated that when you presented the accounts to lord Melville, lord Melville did not examine the accounts in your presence. Did you ever call the attention of lord Melville to the items of the accounts so delivered, as items that would show that he applied the public money to private use and benefit?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect that I ever did, or made any observation of that nature to his lordship.

A Lord.—Then are we to understand that you being the paymaster of lord Melville, and yourself apprized that you were applying public money for private purposes, suffered lord Melville to take those accounts into his possession, without suggesting to him that such matter would appear from examination of the account?

Mr. Trotter.—As lord Melville never communicated to me the application which he meant to make of these sums, I did not think myself at liberty to make any observation to his lordship upon that transaction.

A Lord.—Having stated that you frequently drew upon the Bank beyond the amount of the bills assigned for payment, did you ever distinctly or otherwise communicate that fact to lord Melville?

Mr. Trotter.—I was not sensible at the time that I did it; I never had it in contemplation whether I drew a greater or a smaller sum than the bills assigned for payment. I was guided by the sum which I found remaining unclaimed in my hand, which would not be wanted, without making any calculation of the sort. I did not mention it to lord Melville, not thinking it at all necessary in the general management of the business.

A Lord.—Having stated that the India stock was invested in the name of Lind, was it invested in the name of Lind, not only for the purpose of being a security for the money with which it was purchased; but also, for the further purpose of inducing lord Melville to believe, that the money had been actually furnished by Lind?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe in my evidence yesterday, I stated to your lordships that a document had lately fallen into my hands, by which I found that the stock was originally invested in the name of the person who made the purchase, that it was some time before it went into the name of Mr. Lind; it was during that time that I did not communicate any thing upon the subject to lord Melville, I believe.

A Lord.—Was lord Melville, to your knowledge, ever acquainted that that stock was in any other name than the name of Lind?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not think his lordship ever was.

A Lord.—Having stated that from time to time you presented accounts both public and private to lord Melville, and that when a settlement was asked for, his lordship postponed from time to time coming to that settlement, was there, in point of fact, any settlement till the time of the general release?

Mr. Trotter.—I stated to your lordships yesterday, that there was a general settlement of his lordship's accounts at the time his lordship left the office in May, 1800.

A Lord.—Who was it that suggested to you the propriety of keeping a Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—It was merely giving a name to an account which I found necessary to raise in debiting lord Melville with that 10,600*l.* which I found not in the Bank when I succeeded Mr. Douglas as paymaster.

A Lord.—Why did you entitle it a Chest account?

Mr. Trotter.—I recollect nothing of the circumstance; but if I may be allowed to suppose it, I should rather think that lord Melville desired me to raise an account, and to call it a Chest account.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville explain to you that that sum of 10,600*l.* was public money?

Mr. Trotter.—He did not explain it to me; there was no necessity for that, for I knew it to be so.

A Lord.—You have stated that you advanced the money with which the India stock was purchased although it stood in the name of Mr. Lind; did you receive from Mr. Lind any security for that East-India stock in his name purchased with your money?

Mr. Trotter.—I received an acknowledgment to that purport.

A Lord.—Did that acknowledgment state for whom the purchase was made?

Mr. Trotter.—It did not; at least it did not mention lord Melville's name, but my own.

A Lord.—If the speculation had succeeded, had lord Melville any means of getting at this money; especially if you were dead?

Mr. Trotter.—I am free to say it never entered my consideration.

A Lord.—Since you took no acknowledgment from Mr. Lind, that the stock was purchased with the public money, suppose that speculation had turned out advantageously, what security had lord Melville for the fruit of it?

Mr. Trotter.—None but my own books having fully described the transaction.

A Lord.—Give a more particular answer to that question?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not think I have it in my power to do so.

A Lord.—No written acknowledgment having been given by Mr. Lind to you in consequence of the investment of the stock in his name, would not lord Melville have been bound to pay the money to Mr. Lind, though Mr. Lind had never advanced it?

Mr. Trotter.—I do not recollect any document that passed between us, except an acknowledgment from Mr. Lind, that the 2,000*l.* stock belonged to me.

A Lord.—Was there any written acknowledgment given by Mr. Lind, that that stock was purchased with your money, and not with Mr. Lind's?

Mr. Trotter.—Yes, there was.

A Lord.—Whether you did not put lord Melville in the situation of having no advantage from this speculation, if it turned out an advantageous speculation; and yet to have been a loser, by being compelled, in case of your death, to pay this money to Mr. Lind, as if the money had been advanced by him?

Mr. Trotter.—I did not consider lord Melville in that situation, the transaction was fully described in my book; and those I have appointed to be my executors, I am certain would have done justice to lord Melville as well as to myself.

A Lord.—Whether any person, except yourself, in the Navy-pay-office, received any advantage, directly or indirectly, from the use of the public money?

Mr. Trotter.—I believe that some of the sub-accountants have derived some small advantages, but I am not at all acquainted with them, I can speak to nothing but my own transactions.

A Lord.—Can you take upon you to swear, that in all your transactions in which you have employed the public money, lord Melville has been benefited, he being previously privy to such transactions, and from which he expected a benefit?

Lord Chancellor.—I cannot put a question which assumes a fact that has not been proved.

The question was waived.

A Lord.—The draft of a release has been given in evidence; your lordships recollect the witness told you there were notes upon the face of it in his own hand-writing; I wish the draft may be put into his hand, and that he may point out the notes which are in his own hand-writing.

Another Lord.—I submit to your lordships this draft cannot be given in evidence in this way, because, if it is to be proved at the bar as matter of evidence, the counsel on the other side may cross-examine upon it.

Lord Chancellor.—That draft has not yet been given in evidence.

A Lord.—My mistake arose from this: your lordships must all recollect the witness stated that he had seen his notes upon this draft.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons now propose to give in evidence the order of council for the regulation of the Navy-pay-office, which was dated at the court of St. James's, 9th of August, 1786; and, for the purpose of identifying that order of council, they call upon sir Stephen Cottrell.

Then Sir Stephen Cottrell, knight, was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that book before you?

Sir Stephen Cottrell.—A volume of the council registers.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there in that book an order dated the 9th of August, 1786, purporting to be for the regulation of the Navy-pay-office?

Sir Stephen Cottrell.—There is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you got the memorial upon which that order in council was founded?

Sir Stephen Cottrell.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish that also to be produced in evidence before your lordships, it purports to be signed—Henry Dundas.

Lord Chancellor.—Is the signature acknowledged?

Mr. Plumer.—I admit the signature.

Then the memorial was read, from the register of the privy council, and is as follows:

“The Memorial of Henry Dundas.

“To the King's most Excellent Majesty in Council.

“Most humbly sheweth,

“That the office, which he has the honour to hold as treasurer of your majesty's navy, was settled by an order of king William in council, the 25th day of May, 1699, since which time the business of the same has been greatly augmented, and many additions made to the establishment. It has been regulated by a late act of parliament founded upon the reports of the commissioners of accounts, and the mode of conducting it altered in various particulars. Your memorialist is satisfied that these regulations will be attended with the most beneficial consequences. With this view, his duty to your majesty and to the public has actuated him to give an attentive consideration to the whole conduct and establishment of the office; and, in full persuasion of being able to execute the business of it in a manner consistent with the late regulations, he most humbly presumes to submit for your majesty's approbation, an arrangement of the whole, calculated upon principles of real economy, and formed upon a system to expedite with dispatch the various branches of the department entrusted to his charge.

“HENRY DUNDAS.”

ESTABLISHMENT of the NAVY PAY-OFFICE.

|                                                                  | £.  | s. | £.  | s. |
|------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|----|-----|----|
| Paymaster .....                                                  | 0   | 0  | 500 | 0  |
| PAY BRANCH.                                                      |     |    |     |    |
| Deputy Paymaster .....                                           | 400 | 0  |     |    |
| Chief Clerk for Pay-ment of Wages at } Plymouth                  | 230 | 0  |     |    |
| Ditto .....                                                      | 230 | 0  |     |    |
| Ditto .....                                                      | 230 | 0  |     |    |
| Second ditto .....                                               | 200 | 0  |     |    |
| Ditto .....                                                      | 200 | 0  |     |    |
| Ditto .....                                                      | 200 | 0  |     |    |
| First Clerk for paying Seamen's Wages in Town .....              | 200 | 0  |     |    |
| Second ditto .....                                               | 180 | 0  |     |    |
| First Clerk for making up Ships Books .....                      | 180 | 0  |     |    |
| Second ditto .....                                               | 162 | 3  |     |    |
| First Assistant Clerk for paying Wages, entering Lists, &c. .... | 90  | 0  |     |    |

|                    | £. | s. | £.    | s. |
|--------------------|----|----|-------|----|
| Second ditto.....  | 90 | 0  |       |    |
| Third ditto.....   | 90 | 0  |       |    |
| Fourth ditto.....  | 80 | 0  |       |    |
| Fifth ditto.....   | 80 | 0  |       |    |
| Sixth ditto.....   | 70 | 0  |       |    |
| Seventh ditto..... | 70 | 0  |       |    |
|                    |    |    | 2,982 | 3  |

NAVY BRANCH.

|                                                                |     |   |       |   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|-------|---|
| Cashier of the Navy attending Payment of Bills.....            | 400 | 0 |       |   |
| Chief Clerk for ditto .....                                    | 250 | 0 |       |   |
| Ledger Writer for the Navy Br. ....                            | 200 | 0 |       |   |
| First Ledger Copier .....                                      | 162 | 3 |       |   |
| Second ditto .....                                             | 90  | 0 |       |   |
| Assistant to the Cashier for paying Bills .....                | 80  | 0 |       |   |
| Ditto to the Chief Clerk for attending the Exchequer, &c. .... | 80  | 0 |       |   |
|                                                                |     |   | 1,262 | 3 |

VICTUALLING BRANCH.

|                                                                 |     |   |       |   |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|-------|---|
| Cashier of the Victualling for attending Payment of Bills ..... | 400 | 0 |       |   |
| Chief Clerk for ditto .....                                     | 230 | 0 |       |   |
| Ledger Writer.....                                              | 200 | 0 |       |   |
| First Ledger Copier .....                                       | 162 | 3 |       |   |
| Second ditto .....                                              | 90  | 0 |       |   |
| Assistant to the Cashier for paying Bills .....                 | 80  | 0 |       |   |
|                                                                 |     |   | 1,162 | 3 |

ACCOUNTANT's BRANCH.

|                                                                     |     |   |       |   |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|-------|---|
| Accountant for bringing up the old and keeping up new Accounts..... | 400 | 0 |       |   |
| Chief Clerk for ditto .....                                         | 250 | 0 |       |   |
| Second ditto .....                                                  | 162 | 3 |       |   |
| Third ditto .....                                                   | 162 | 3 |       |   |
| Fourth ditto .....                                                  | 90  | 0 |       |   |
| Fifth ditto .....                                                   | 90  | 0 |       |   |
| Sixth ditto .....                                                   | 80  | 0 |       |   |
| Seventh ditto .....                                                 | 80  | 0 |       |   |
| Eighth ditto .....                                                  | 70  | 0 |       |   |
|                                                                     |     |   | 1,384 | 6 |

INSPECTOR's BRANCH.

|                                                         |     |   |     |   |
|---------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|-----|---|
| Inspector of Seamen's Wills and Powers of Attorney..... | 300 | 0 |     |   |
| Assistant for ditto .....                               | 150 | 0 |     |   |
| Messenger .....                                         | 75  | 0 |     |   |
|                                                         |     |   | 525 | 0 |

The seven Clerks at 90*l.* per annum to be allowed 20*s.* per week for every week they shall actually attend; the seven at 80*l.* to be allowed 15*s.* per week; and the three at 70*l.* to be allowed 10*s.* in the same manner the weeks which they shall actually attend, to be certified to the Navy Board by the Paymaster; and they are hereby directed to make out Bills for the same, under the head of Additional Salaries. All travelling and other incidental expences arising in the Office, to be paid out of monies imprested into the Treasurer's hands, under the head of Money to pay Contingencies, upon orders from the Paymaster or Chief Clerk of each Branch, to the Cashier, who pays the same. And the Paymaster is hereby directed to examine the said contingent account, with the said order; which finding right, he shall certify the amount to the Commissioners of the Navy, who are hereby also directed, upon such authority, to allow the same. All fees whatever to be discontinued, excepting that of the odd pence deducted from sums paid; and no farther extra gratuities are hereafter to be allowed for bringing up the account of Ex-treasurers.

CONDUCTORS.

|                                                                          |     |   |     |   |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|-----|---|
| Chief Conductor, Money Sorter, and Officer for paying Contingencies..... | 200 | 0 |     |   |
| Money Conductor at Portsmouth                                            | 150 | 0 |     |   |
| Ditto .....                                                              | 150 | 0 |     |   |
| Ditto .....                                                              | 150 | 0 |     |   |
|                                                                          |     |   | 650 | 0 |

HOUSE AND DOOR-KEEPERS, MESSENGERS, &c.

|                                                                             |     |   |       |    |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|-------|----|
| Housekeeper .....                                                           | 40  | 0 |       |    |
| Keeper of Ships Books, Money Carrier, and Door-keeper to the Pay Room ..... | 140 | 0 |       |    |
| Messengers, five, at 75 l. each ...                                  | 375 | 0 |       |    |
| Porter to the Pay Office in Town                                            | 40  | 0 |       |    |
| Watchmen, two, at 30 l. each ...                                     | 60  | 0 |       |    |
| Bargemaster .....                                                           | 8   | 0 |       |    |
|                                                                             |     |   | 663   | 0  |
|                                                                             |     |   | 9,128 | 15 |

HENRY DUNDAS.

Mr. Whitbread.—Now we propose to read the order in council founded upon this Memorial.

Then the order in council was read, and is as follows:

“ At the Court at St. James's, the 9th of August, 1786.

“ Present,

“ The King's most excellent Majesty.

|                      |                     |
|----------------------|---------------------|
| Duke of Richmond.    | Visc. Hinchinbroke. |
| Marq. of Carmarthen. | Visc. Galway.       |
| Earl of Salisbury.   | Lord Sydney.        |
| Earl of Leicester.   | Mr. Pitt.           |

“ Whereas, the right honourable Henry Dundas, treasurer of his majesty's navy, hath represented to his majesty at this Board, that since the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy was settled by the order made in council by king William the Third, bearing date the 25th of May, 1699, the business of the said office has been greatly augmented, and many additions made to this establishment: that the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy has been regulated by a late act of parliament, founded upon the reports of the commissioners of accounts, and the mode of conducting the said office altered in various particulars. And whereas the said treasurer of his majesty's navy has, after an attentive consideration to the whole conduct and establishment of the office, submitted for his majesty's approbation an arrangement of the whole, calculated upon principles of real œconomy, and consistent with the regulations made by parliament as above, which is as follows:

ESTABLISHMENT of the NAVY PAY OFFICE.

|                                                                          | £.  | s. | £.    | s. |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|----|-------|----|
| Paymaster to the Navy .....                                              |     |    | 500   | 0  |
| PAY BRANCH.                                                       |     |    |       |    |
| Deputy Paymaster.....                                                    | 400 | 0  |       |    |
| Chief Clerk for Pay-ment of Wages at } Plymouth                          | 230 | 0  |       |    |
| Ditto.....Portsmouth                                                     | 230 | 0  |       |    |
| Ditto.....Chatham                                                        | 230 | 0  |       |    |
| Second ditto ..... Plymouth                                              | 200 | 0  |       |    |
| Ditto.....Portsmouth                                                     | 200 | 0  |       |    |
| Ditto.....Chatham                                                        | 200 | 0  |       |    |
| First Clerk for Payment of Seamen's Wages in Town .....                  | 200 | 0  |       |    |
| Second ditto .....                                                       | 180 | 0  |       |    |
| First Clerk for making up Ships Books .....                              | 180 | 0  |       |    |
| Second ditto .....                                                       | 162 | 3  |       |    |
| First Assistant Clerk for paying Wages, &c. ....                         | 90  | 0  |       |    |
| Second ditto .....                                                       | 90  | 0  |       |    |
| Third ditto .....                                                        | 90  | 0  |       |    |
| Fourth ditto .....                                                       | 80  | 0  |       |    |
| Fifth ditto .....                                                        | 80  | 0  |       |    |
| Sixth ditto .....                                                        | 70  | 0  |       |    |
| Seventh ditto .....                                                      | 70  | 0  |       |    |
|                                                                          |     |    | 2,982 | 3  |
| NAVY BRANCH.                                                      |     |    |       |    |
| Cashier of the Navy attending Payment of Bills.....                      | 400 | 0  |       |    |
| Chief Clerk to ditto.....                                                | 250 | 0  |       |    |
| Ledger Writer for the Navy Br....                                        | 200 | 0  |       |    |
| First Ledger Copier .....                                                | 162 | 3  |       |    |
| Second ditto.....                                                        | 90  | 0  |       |    |
| Assistant to the Cashier for paying Bills .....                          | 80  | 0  |       |    |
| Ditto to Chief Clerk for attending Exchequer .....                       | 80  | 0  |       |    |
|                                                                          |     |    | 1,262 | 3  |
| VICTUALLING BRANCH.                                               |     |    |       |    |
| Cashier of Victualling for attending Payment of Bills .....              | 400 | 0  |       |    |
| Chief Clerk for ditto .....                                              | 230 | 0  |       |    |
| Ledger Writer.....                                                       | 200 | 0  |       |    |
| First Ledger Copier .....                                                | 162 | 3  |       |    |
| Second ditto.....                                                        | 90  | 0  |       |    |
| Assistant to the Cashier for paying Bills .....                          | 80  | 0  |       |    |
|                                                                          |     |    | 1,162 | 3  |
| ACCOUNTANT's BRANCH.                                              |     |    |       |    |
| Accountant for bringing up the old and keeping up the new Accounts ..... | 400 | 0  |       |    |

VOL. XXIX.

|                             | £.  | s. | £.    | s. |
|-----------------------------|-----|----|-------|----|
| Chief Clerk for ditto ..... | 250 | 0  |       |    |
| Second ditto .....          | 162 | 3  |       |    |
| Third ditto .....           | 162 | 3  |       |    |
| Fourth ditto .....          | 90  | 0  |       |    |
| Fifth ditto .....           | 90  | 0  |       |    |
| Sixth ditto .....           | 80  | 0  |       |    |
| Seventh ditto .....         | 80  | 0  |       |    |
| Eighth ditto .....          | 70  | 0  |       |    |
|                             |     |    | 1,384 | 6  |

INSPECTOR's BRANCH.

|                                                         |     |   |
|---------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|
| Inspector of Seamen's Wills and Powers of Attorney..... | 300 | 0 |
| Assistant to ditto.....                                 | 150 | 0 |
| Messenger .....                                         | 75  | 0 |

525 0

The seven clerks at 90*l.* per annum to be allowed also 20*s.* per week for every week they shall actually attend; the seven at 80*l.* to be allowed 15*s.* per week; and the three at 70*l.* to be allowed 10*s.* in the same manner; the weeks which they shall actually attend to be certified to the Navy Board by the Paymaster, who are to make out bills for the same, under the head of additional salaries. All travelling and other incidental expences arising in the Office, to be paid out of monies imprested into the Treasurer's hands, under the head of money to pay contingencies, upon orders from the Paymaster or Chief Clerk of each branch, to the officer who pays the same; and the Paymaster is to examine the said contingent account with the said orders; which finding right, he shall certify the amount to the Commissioners of the Navy, who are upon such authority, to allow the same.—All fees whatever to be discontinued excepting that of the odd pence deducted from sums paid; and no farther extra gratuities are hereafter to be allowed for bringing up the accounts of Ex-treasurers.

CONDUCTORS.

|                                                                         |     |   |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|
| Chief Conductor, Money Sorter and Officer for paying Contingencies..... | 200 | 0 |
| Money Conductor at Portsmouth                                           | 150 | 0 |
| Ditto ..... Plymouth...                                                 | 150 | 0 |
| Ditto ..... Chatham ...                                                 | 150 | 0 |

650 0

HOUSE AND DOOR-KEEPER, MESSENGERS, &c.

|                                                                             |     |   |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---|
| Housekeeper .....                                                           | 40  | 0 |
| Keeper of Ships Books, Money Carrier, and Door-keeper to the Pay Room ..... | 140 | 0 |
| Messengers, five, at 75 l. per annum                                 | 375 | 0 |
| Porter at the Pay-office in Town                                            | 40  | 0 |
| Watchmen, two, at 30 l. each ...                                     | 60  | 0 |
| Bargemaster .....                                                           | 8   | 0 |

663 0

9,128 15

"His majesty having taken the said representation, and the proposed establishment of the Navy-pay-office, into his royal consideration, and having received the opinion of a committee of his majesty's most honourable privy council thereupon, is pleased, with the advice of his privy council, to approve of the said proposed establishment of the Navy-Pay-office, and to order (as it is thereby ordered), That the right honourable the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury, and the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral of Great Britain, do give all the necessary directions for carrying the same into effect.

"W. FAWKENER."

A Lord.—Before your lordships proceed, I wish to state that in reflecting on the evidence I have heard, there appear to be such contradictions in the evidence of Mr. Trotter, that it appears to me fair to him, and necessary for your lordships proper understanding of his evidence, that he should be once more examined.—It strikes me that in fairness to him it had better be on another day than on this day.—A witness after being such a length of time under examination, cannot recollect himself so well as on another day.—I am prepared to go on, but if it strikes your lordship as it strikes me I only give notice that I shall move for his attending this house upon the next day of our meeting.

Mr. Morris.—It has been already stated to your lordships that various sums of money were paid into the hands of sir William Forbes and company, and Mansfield and company, on account of the noble defendant. On the part of the Managers, I have to propose to your lordships, to call witnesses who shall establish before your lordships, out of what fund these monies were paid, and how they were applied.—My lords, that they were paid out of the money in the hands of Mr. Trotter, and that they were applied to the advantage of the noble lord, inasmuch as they operated to reduce the sum with which the noble lord was chargeable, for interest upon the sums he had overdrawn. The first witness whom I have to call before your lordships for that purpose will be Mr. Robert Trotter.

Then Robert Trotter, esq. was called in, and, having been sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Morris.—Are you not a writer to the signet, and brother to Mr. Alexander Trotter, the last witness?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I am.

Mr. Morris.—Did you in the year 1787. receive any directions from your brother, Mr. Alexander Trotter, to pay any money on account of the noble defendant, into the house of sir William Forbes and company, and of Mansfield and company?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Morris.—Did you pay these sums into the hands of those persons, and what were the sums?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I did pay them.

Mr. Morris.—What were the sums?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I paid in to messieurs Mansfield, Ramsay, and company, 3,374*l.*

Mr. Morris.—What paper is that in your hand?

Mr. R. Trotter.—A letter from my brother to me.

Mr. Morris.—It is a letter which was in evidence before your lordships yesterday, from which Mr. Alexander Trotter refreshed his memory.

Mr. R. Trotter.—And to sir William Forbes 2,000*l.*

Mr. Morris.—Are you speaking to the fact from your own recollection, or only because you see it in that letter?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I did not recollect the least of it till I looked into my books.

Mr. Morris.—Are those books, by which you refreshed your memory, books of your own keeping?

Mr. R. Trotter.—They are books written by my own clerks.

Mr. Morris.—Are they not your own books?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes.

Mr. Morris.—Have you any doubt of the fact of having paid the sums?

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know that you have paid these sums?

Mr. Adam.—I beg to know whether these books are in his own hand-writing?

Mr. R. Trotter.—No, in the hand-writing of my clerk.

Mr. Adam.—I submit to your lordships he cannot refresh his memory from those books.

Mr. Morris.—Look at the signature to that account.

Lord Chancellor.—What is that paper?

Mr. R. Trotter.—An account between my brother and me, of the 31st of Dec. 1787.

Lord Chancellor.—Is that account signed by you?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—Does that account contain the sums in question?

Lord Chancellor.—State the fact to the House.

Mr. R. Trotter.—I have no doubt that the fact is perfectly exact, because it was an account furnished by myself.

Mr. Morris.—Does that account enable you to say that the sums were so paid into these houses?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I have no doubt but they were.

Mr. Morris.—What were the sums?

Mr. R. Trotter.—3,374*l.* to messieurs Mansfield, Ramsay and company, and 2,000*l.* to sir William Forbes and company.

Mr. Morris.—What is the date of those payments?

Mr. R. Trotter.—The 23rd of July 1787.

Mr. Morris.—Did you, in pursuance of the directions of that letter, transmit any receipts from those houses upon payment of those sums of money?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes, I sent them to my brother---when I say so, I speak from looking into my letter and these accounts, because I have no recollection of the transaction myself.

Mr. Morris.—Are these accounts signed by yourself?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes.

Mr. Morris.—Do you recollect having made any other payments in 1789, to the same houses, on account of the noble defendant?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I did, at least I see so from my books.

Mr. Morris.—Is that account signed by you?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—Does that enable you to state that you made these payments in 1789?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I have no doubt of it.

Mr. Morris.—What was the amount of those payments?

Mr. R. Trotter.—2,000*l.* to sir William Forbes and company, and 3,000*l.* to messieurs Mansfield and company.

Mr. Morris.—What is the date of those payments?

Mr. R. Trotter.—The 2,000*l.* to sir William Forbes and company, was paid upon the 14th of July, 1789 and the 3,000*l.* to messieurs Mansfield and company, upon the 17th of the same month and year.

Mr. Morris.—Did you also transmit receipts of those payments to your brother?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I do not believe I did at that time; but afterwards, upon settling accounts, the vouchers for those payments were delivered up. I see, by the bottom here, that my brother acknowledges having received all the vouchers of the last account.

Then Robert Trotter, esq. was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Adam.—Whether you have any recollection of these circumstances, except from the entries in your books and the accounts you have seen?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I have not the least.

Mr. Adam.—Can you from any collateral circumstances, bring to your recollection these payments?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Only from the accounts and from the books.

Mr. Morris.—Is the account to which you refer, as refreshing your recollection, the signed account to which you before alluded?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It is.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then sir William Forbes, bart. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Morris.—Are you a Banker at Edinburgh?

Sir William Forbes.—I am.

Mr. Morris.—Did lord Melville keep an account with you?

Sir William Forbes.—He did, and he does still.

Mr. Morris.—Was that account, in 1787, against the noble defendant?

Sir William Forbes.—It was.

Mr. Morris.—Is it the practice of your house, to charge with the payment of interest all sums overdrawn on account, by any person keeping money with your house?

Sir William Forbes.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—From that being the general usage of the house, do you believe that was the course with respect to lord Melville?

Sir William Forbes.—It was.

Mr. Morris.—Were the accounts of lord Melville with your house regularly transmitted to him?

Sir William Forbes.—Our general practice is to transmit the accounts at the end of the year; and lord Melville's accounts were sent—I will not positively say they were sent every year, sometimes they might be omitted; but, in general, our practice is always to send the accounts.

Mr. Morris.—Was any objection ever made by lord Melville to the sum of 2,000*l.* being charged over and above the sum received?

Sir William Forbes.—Not that I ever knew of, and I believe he made none.

Mr. Morris.—Was any objection ever taken as to the second thousand pound in 1789, as well as the two thousand in 1787?

Sir William Forbes.—No, not to my knowledge.

Then sir William Forbes was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Adam.—Whether all the letters of your correspondence which you had with lord Melville, have not been transmitted to the managers---and how long ago?

Sir William Forbes.—In July last, we received a requisition, from the committee of the Impeachment, to transmit copies of the letters, and copies of the accounts that should relate to lord Melville's accounts, from the year 1784 to 1800. Those copies were all sent up to the managers at that period; there are many other letters which did not relate to those accounts, which of course we did not take any notice of.

Mr. Adam.—Have all the letters which relate to the accounts on both sides been transmitted?

Sir William Forbes.—I certainly believe that copies of them have.

Mr. Adam.—Either individually from you or from your house?

Sir William Forbes.—Yes.

Mr. Adam.—Have all the accounts, or copies of all the accounts, between you and lord Melville, during all the time his lordship has dealt with your house, been transmitted to the managers?

Sir William Forbes.—Only during the period included in the requisition, from 1782 to 1800; they have all been transmitted.

Mr. Adam.—Were those likewise transmitted in the month of July last?

Sir William Forbes.—Not all; the first requisition of the honourable managers went from 1784 to 1800.—we afterwards received a letter from Mr. Whitbread, wishing to have two years further back, stating that the committee had made a mistake; we wrote, that without a fresh order, we could not with propriety send them; when that order came, about a month ago, for us to send up the originals, we thought we could have no difficulty in sending up the copies of the two former years, and we did send them accordingly.

Mr. Adam.—Whether from your books or from your knowledge of the state of your account, it appears that lord Melville stood indebted, or otherwise, to the house, at that period?

Sir William Forbes.—My lord Melville has stood indebted to the house during the whole of that period.

Mr. Adam.—Has it been the custom of your house regularly to charge interest for that balance?

Sir William Forbes.—Constantly; I merely speak with the exception, in point of fact, of a trifling sum of money 19*l.* 7*s.* which I see allowed to lord Melville for money as in our hands; but I do not think that any exception scarcely to the general rule.

Mr. Adam.—Has money been advanced by you, during that period, to lord Melville upon his bond?

Sir William Forbes.—It has.

Mr. Adam.—Has his lordship had money advanced to him, upon the guarantee and security of any friends, since that time?

Sir William Forbes.—He has.

Mr. Adam.—Has he paid interest upon those loans?

Sir William Forbes.—Most certainly.

Mr. Adam.—Am I to understand that his lordship has paid interest during the whole period of those loans?

Sir William Forbes.—Yes, up to the first of January last—the interest is commonly paid once a year.

Mr. Adam.—Whether it is not customary, for bankers in Scotland to allow interest upon money left in their hands by their customers?

Sir William Forbes.—It is.

Mr. Adam.—How much do they allow?

Sir William Forbes.—Upon an account current they allow three per cent,—if it is lodged upon a note to lie six months it is generally four per cent.

Mr. Adam.—Whether you have at different times yourself personally, and your house likewise in their capacity of bankers, pressed lord Melville for the payment of the sums of money that were due to you?

Sir William Forbes.—Never myself, but our house did write to lord Melville, to say that they should be very glad if it would be convenient for his lordship to reduce the balances, because they were at that time large.

A Lord.—For what length of time have you been a banker in Scotland?

Sir William Forbes.—Ever since the year 1761.

A Lord.—Has not your contract of co-partnership frequently expired?

Sir William Forbes.—Several times.

A Lord.—Upon those occasions is it the custom for your partners to execute mutual releases?

Sir William Forbes.—As our partnership has generally been continued under the same partners, sometimes with the exception of those who have died in the interval and new ones have come in—as the same partners generally continued on the firm of the house, we seldom have been so scrupulous as to execute releases except once when a partner died who left a minor son.

A Lord.—Did that release contain a clause obliging the partners to destroy vouchers?

Sir William Forbes.—No, I do not believe it did.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Morris.—The next witness I shall have to call before your lordships, will be Mr. James Mansfield.

Then Mr. James Mansfield was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Morris.—I wish you to state to the Court whether you are not a banker at Edinburgh?

Mr. Mansfield.—I am.

Mr. Morris.—Had lord Melville any account with you?

Mr. Mansfield.—He had.

Mr. Morris.—In the year 1787, was not lord Melville indebted to your house?

Mr. Mansfield.—He was.

Mr. Morris.—Was any payment made into your house on account of lord Melville, in the year 1787, and to what amount?

Mr. Mansfield.—Upon the 23rd of July.

Mr. Plumer.—Are those books in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Mansfield.—They are not.

Mr. Morris.—Have you any doubt of the fact of that payment having been made?

Mr. Mansfield.—None.

Lord Chancellor.—By what means are you satisfied of the fact?

Mr. Mansfield.—By referring to our cash-book.

Mr. Morris.—Has any account been delivered to lord Melville, or the agents of lord Melville, of the state of his accounts with that house?

Mr. Mansfield.—There have been several delivered to his agents.

Mr. Morris.—Was any objection then taken to the accuracy of that account?

Mr. Mansfield.—None.

Mr. Morris.—Can you state the amount of the sum so paid in to the account of the noble lord?

Mr. Plumer.—Did the witness deliver the account himself to any agent of lord Melville?

Mr. Mansfield.—I did not.

Mr. Morris.—Is it the practice of your house to transmit such accounts to persons keeping money with you?

Mr. Mansfield.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—What was the state of lord Melville's account in the year 1787?

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I submit, that at present the honourable managers are not in a situation to give any evidence on that subject.

Mr. Morris.—Was the noble lord indebted to your house at that time?

Mr. Mansfield.—He was.

Lord Chancellor.—How do you know that?

Mr. Mansfield.—By referring to our books.

Mr. Morris.—Is it the usage of your house to charge interest upon the sums that are overdrawn by your customers?

Mr. Mansfield.—It always is.

Mr. Morris.—Had lord Melville given any securities, which were then in the possession of your house, in respect of which he was liable to pay interest?

Mr. Mansfield.—No further at that time than a draft upon the house.

Mr. Morris.—Did the payment of those sums into the accounts operate to the reduction of the interest which was payable by lord Melville?

A Lord.—Without the production of those securities, or notice given to lord Melville, if he has them, to produce them, we cannot hear any thing about them?

Lord Chancellor.—Certainly not.

Mr. Morris.—I understood Mr. Trotter had proved the payment of the sum into the house of this gentleman.

Lord Chancellor.—As far as the payment of a specific sum is proved; but the state of the account cannot be proved by that book.

Mr. Morris.—The way in which I submit it to your lordship is this: inasmuch as it is the usual course of the house, to transmit an account of the state of their accounts, to persons dealing with the house, that your lordships would presume that the general usage was followed in this instance, and that therefore those accounts taken from the books, to which the witness has referred, become evidence, notice having been given to the noble lord to produce the original.

Mr. Plumer.—I admit the notice.

Lord Chancellor.—You have not proved in fact that any such accounts were transmitted to lord Melville: you are presuming that; if you had proved that the accounts had been evidence, Do you know that the accounts were transmitted to lord Melville?

Mr. Mansfield.—I do not know whether they were transmitted to his lordship.

Mr. Morris.—Do you know that they were transmitted to the agents of the noble lord?

Mr. Mansfield.—I certainly do.

Mr. Morris.—Who were the agents of the noble lord to whom those accounts were transmitted?

Mr. Mansfield.—Mr. James Newbigging, Mr. Robert Dundas, or Mr. Hugh Warrender.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you personally know that either of those persons whom you have named was the authorized agent of lord Melville?

Mr. Mansfield.—I understood them to be such.

Mr. Plumer.—Did they act in that capacity?

Mr. Mansfield.—They acted in that capacity.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know of your own knowledge, of the transmission of the accounts to either of those three persons you have named, and to which of them—did you ever see them delivered to them?

Mr. Mansfield.—No.

Mr. Plumer.—Who carried them?

Mr. Mansfield.—One of our clerks.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you recollect who?

Mr. Mansfield.—It is impossible.

Mr. Morris.—Have you had any conversation with lord Melville, upon the subject of his accounts with your house?

Mr. Mansfield.—Never, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. Morris.—Are the books before you the books of your house?

Mr. Mansfield.—They are.

Mr. Morris.—Can you, by referring to those books, speak of your own knowledge to the state of the accounts?

Lord Chancellor.—They are not his own hand-writing, and it is impossible he can speak of his own knowledge to the transaction. Unless a copy of that account had been sent to lord Melville, and notice had been given to him to produce that account so rendered to him, it is impossible to make this evidence.

Mr. Morris.—Does not your lordship think the witness might refer to a particular item in that book, in order to see what was the amount of the sum upon which interest was charged?

Lord Chancellor.—I think not.

Mr. Morris.—Was any security ever given by the noble lord for the balance resulting from that account?

Mr. Mansfield.—Yes, there was.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know that fact?

Mr. Mansfield.—Yes, I do.

Mr. Morris.—What was the nature of that security?

Lord Chancellor.—What is become of that security?

Mr. Mansfield.—The security was royal bank stock.

Lord Chancellor.—What is become of it? does that security still remain with your house?

Mr. Mansfield.—No, the accounts were closed several years ago.

Mr. Morris.—Do you know, of your own knowledge, to whom that security was delivered?

Mr. Mansfield.—It was transferred back to his lordship.

Mr. Morris.—Do you know that fact of your own knowledge?

Mr. Mansfield.—Yes, I do.

Lord Chancellor.—How do you know that fact?

Mr. Mansfield.—From our books.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know it from your own knowledge, or from any entry in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Mansfield.—Not from my own hand-writing. I know nothing of it except from my books.

A Lord.—I apprehend that a transfer of royal bank stock must be proved by the books of the company.

Lord Chancellor.—Certainly.

Mr. Morris.—Was that account ever settled between your house and my lord Melville to your knowledge?

Mr. Plumer.—I submit to your lordships that the existence of an account has not been proved.

Mr. Morris.—There is an account proved, inasmuch as there is a sum of money proved to have been paid in to the account. Has lord Melville at any time settled an account with you?

Mr. Mansfield.—Yes, he has.

Mr. Morris.—Was that account, so settled, made up from the books before you?

Mr. Plumer.—This gentleman, I dare say, unguardedly has answered questions, in several instances, where he does not speak from his own personal knowledge. I wish to know whether the settlement of an account with lord Melville is known to the witness of his own knowledge.

Lord Chancellor.—Did you settle any account personally with lord Melville, so as to be able to swear to the fact?

Mr. Mansfield.—I certainly did not.

Mr. Morris.—Did you settle it with an agent of lord Melville?

Mr. Mansfield.—I did not.

Mr. Morris.—On what ground did you state, a few minutes ago, that you knew lord Melville had settled the account?

Mr. Mansfield.—From vouchers that I had seen, signed by lord Melville.

Lord Chancellor.—Where are the vouchers?

Mr. Mansfield.—They are in our repositories.

Mr. Morris.—It will ill become the managers to press this part of the case any further, till we can get the vouchers.

Lord Chancellor.—The rules of evidence are so perfectly clear upon this subject, that I am persuaded the managers know better than to press it.

Mr. Whitbread.—With regard to a certain advance that was made by the house of Coutts and company, through the agency of Mr. Robert Trotter, to the amount, altogether, of the sum of 25,000*l.* a circumstance that has been stated to your lordships, and spoken of by Mr. Trotter as having been an advance made by him out of public money to a respectable house in Scotland, at interest, for a considerable time; I would beg to ask one question of this witness. Do you, of your own personal knowledge, know that there was any such advance made to that amount from the house of Coutts and company?

Mr. Mansfield.—Yes.

Mr. Morris.—Do you recollect about what time that advance took place?

Mr. Plumer.—What paper is that you are about to refer to?

Mr. Mansfield.—It is a copy of an account kept by Robert Trotter with the house of Mansfield, Ramsay and co.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that a copy examined by yourself?

Mr. Mansfield.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—Do you know about what time that advance from the house of Coutts and company took place?

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know, of your own personal knowledge, that there was an advance from the house of Coutts and company to the house of Mansfield, Ramsay, and company, of 25,000*l.*, without referring to that paper?

Mr. Mansfield.—I recollect perfectly well Mr. Robert Trotter being in London, and writing to us to draw upon him for a certain sum of money which we did draw, payable to Coutts and Company, that amounted, at different times, to 25,000*l.*

Mr. Plumer.—The gentleman is telling us the contents of a letter, written by a person in London, this gentleman being then in Scotland.

Mr. Whitbread.—We have the original letter to put in, addressed to the house of Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company. Mr. Robert Trotter will prove it.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Robert Trotter, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Morris.—Is that letter in your own hand-writing?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—From that letter do you collect that you directed the house of Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, to draw upon Coutts' for 10,000*l.*?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I did.

Mr. Morris.—What is the date of that letter?

Mr. R. Trotter.—The 15th of August, 1787.

Mr. Morris.—Look at this letter; is this your own hand-writing?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—Does that enable you to say, that you gave directions to Mansfield and Company to draw for another sum of 10,000*l.*?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It does.

Mr. Morris.—Did you give further directions to the house of Mansfield and Company, to draw for a further sum of 5,000*l*.?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I remember giving directions to draw for those two ten thousands, and for five thousand more.

Mr. Morris.—Upon whose account was that money paid by the house of Coutts and Company?

Mr. R. Trotter.—My brother Alexander's account.

Then Robert Trotter, esquire, was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—I observe some documents have been put into the witness's hand,—when did you part with those letters?

Mr. R. Trotter.—About two months ago.

Mr. Plumer.—To whom?

Mr. R. Trotter.—The committee of managers on lord Melville's impeachment.

Mr. Plumer.—Have all your papers been delivered to the committee of managers too?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Have they ever since remained in their possession?

Mr. R. Trotter.—That is, all accounts and letters from the year 1786 to 1800.

Mr. Plumer.—All your private letters and papers relative to the accounts?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes, they were all delivered over to the committee, and they kept a great number of them; others they returned back.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether the committee did not inspect your letters, and deliver back such as appeared to you not to relate to the accounts?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes, and gave a receipt for what they kept.

Mr. Plumer.—What means of knowledge have you of the fact of the actual payment by Coutts and Company, to Mansfield and Company, of those sums you spoke of?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I never heard more of it than afterwards, when Mansfield's house gave me credit for those sums.

Mr. Plumer.—Have you any other knowledge of that fact, than its being contained in an account subsequently rendered?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes, I remember the transaction perfectly well.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you see the money paid?

Mr. R. Trotter.—No, I know no further than getting credit from Mr. Mansfield's house for that money.

A Lord.—I wish that the books which have been given in evidence may be delivered in.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

THE EIGHTH DAY.

Thursday, May 8, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the
§

Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor. — Gentlemen, Managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Morris.—My lords, in the examination on Tuesday last, it was in evidence before your lordships, that two sums of money were paid on account of the noble defendant, into the hands of sir William Forbes and Company, bankers, at Edinburgh; it was proved before your lordships, that the account of the noble lord with that banking-house was overdrawn, that it was the practice of that house to charge with interest the accounts of persons keeping cash with the house, whenever the accounts of those persons were overdrawn; with respect to the other part of the case, the payment of money into the banking-house of Mansfield and Company, it was in evidence before your lordships, that two sums were paid into the hands of those bankers, on account of the noble lord; and that it was the practice of that house to charge interest, in respect of sums overdrawn by persons keeping cash with them. But, my lords, the managers for the Commons were not in a condition to lay before your lordships evidence of the state of the account of the noble lord with that house. Mr. Mansfield, who was the witness, from whom the managers for the Commons expected to derive that testimony, could not speak to his own knowledge of the delivery of that account to the noble lord, or to his agents. My lords, we expect that we shall be in a condition to lay satisfactory evidence, upon that subject, before your lordships; but if we are not, that part of the case will rest upon the evidence which is already in your lordships' possession; namely, as to the fact of those sums of money having been paid by the direction of Mr. Alexander Trotter, into the house of Mansfield and Company; which house, it is in evidence before your lordship's was the private banking-house of the noble lord.

My lords, there was another sum stated to your lordships in evidence, the sum of 25,000*l*. as paid by Mr. Robert Trotter, the brother of Mr. Alexander Trotter, into the house of Mansfield and Company, on account of Mr. Alexander Trotter.—I shall now call Mr. Robert Trotter, who will prove that he received, on account of his brother, interest at the rate of four per cent upon that sum of 25,000*l*.—that the amount of the sum which he so received as interest, was credited by him in account with his brother; and that his brother, Mr. Alexander Trotter, had all the advantage resulting from that interest so allowed.

Then Robert Trotter, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Morris.—Look at that account, and state to the Court whether that account is signed in your own hand-writing?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It is.

Mr. Morris.—Refreshing your memory by that account you now hold in your hand, are you able to state to the Court that interest was received by you on account of that sum of 25,000*l.*?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I know it was, my lords.

Mr. Morris.—What is the account which you have in your hand, and by whom is it signed?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It is an account between my brother and myself, wherein I give him credit for interest 802*l.* and for 1,164*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. Morris.—For interest upon what sums?

Mr. R. Trotter.—There was one sum of 10,000*l.* another sum of 10,000*l.* and a sum of 5,000*l.* that was the whole interest I ever received upon those sums, and it was for two years.

Mr. Morris.—Had Mr. Alexander Trotter credit for those sums?

Mr. R. Trotter.—Yes, he had in this very account.

Then Robert Trotter, esquire, was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Adam.—Were those sums of money received upon your brother's account alone?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I received the whole of them through the hands of Mr. Mansfield upon Mr. Coutts.

Mr. Adam.—Was it for your brother alone?

Mr. R. Trotter.—It was for my brother alone.

A Lord.—You have stated that you received those different sums of 802*l.* and 1,164*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* for two years; fix the dates?

Mr. R. Trotter.—I will read, with your lordships' permission, the article which will tell precisely the day.

Then the paper was delivered in, and is as follows:

Dr. ALEXANDER TROTTER, Esquire, London, in Account Current (No. 1.) with ROBERT TROTTER, Edinburgh. Cr.

| 1788.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | £.     | s. | d. | 1787.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | £.     | s. | d. |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|----|----|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|----|----|
| Sep. 30. To two following remittances sent this night, viz.1. Sir William Forbes and Co. on Moffat, Kensington,and B. at 40 d-d.....2. Thomas Kinnear and Son's bill on Smith, Payne,and Smith, at 40 d-d.....                                                                                                                                                                                        |        |    |    | Aug. 18. By Mansfield, Ramsay, and Co's. bill this day upon ThomasCoutts, Esq. and Co. paid by them on your account.....Exchange allowed by Messrs. Mansfield and Co.....                                                                                                            | 10,000 | 0  | 0  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 25     | 0  | 0  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 10,025 | 0  | 0  |
| 1789.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |        |    |    |
| Sep. 25. To sum placed by Messrs. Mansfield, Ramsay, and Co. ofEdinburgh to the credit of Thomas Coutts Esq. and Co. ofLondon, in the accounts betwixt them as per my accountwith Messrs. Mansfield and Co. settled this day, and whichsum Messrs. Coutts and Co. were to pass to your owncredit in your account with them; and all which was donein consequence of your own directions ..... |        |    |    | Sep. 3. By ditto's bill this day upon Messrs. Coutts and Co. at sight,and paid by them on your account ..... £. 10,000 0 0Exchange as above..... 25 0 0                                                                                                                              | 10,025 | 0  | 0  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |        |    |    |
| Nov. 9. To my bill on Messrs. Coutts and Co. at sight to your orderremitted you this night .....                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 25,000 | 0  | 0  |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |        |    |    |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |        |    |    |
| Dec. 26. To sum carried to your credit in our account-current (No. 3.),and which being the balance due on this account, com-pletely settles and discharges the same .....                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 827    | 0  | 0  | 1788.April 3. By cash received from you in order to be lent to Messrs.Mansfield and Co. as above ..... £. 5,000 0 0Exchange as above..... 12 10 0                                                                                                                                | 5,012  | 10 | 0  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |        |    |    |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    | Sep. 30. By one year's interest at 4 per cent. received from Messrs.Mansfield and Co. on the above sum of £ 10,025 due 18thAugust 1788 ..... £. 401 0 0Ditto on the other sum of £. 10,025 due 3rdSept. 1788 ..... 401 0 0                                                   | 802    | 0  | 0  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    | 1789.Sep. 25. By Interest at 4 per cent. received this day from Messrs.Mansfield and Co. as per account settled with them thisday, viz.From 18th August 1788 on ..... £. 10,025 0 0From 3rd September 1788 on ..... 10,025 0 0From 3rd April 1788 on..... 5,012 10 0 | 1,164  | 10 | 4  |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |        |    |    |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |        |    |    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 27,029 | 0  | 4  |

I hereby acknowledge this account to be finally settled as above.

ALEX. TROTTER.

Edinburgh, 26th December, 1789.

Errors excepted,

5th January, 1790.

Ro. TROTTER.

Mr. Whitbread.—My Lords, the Commons now propose to proceed to corroborate the testimony given by Mr. Alexander Trotter, with regard to various transactions charged in their articles: I mean, with respect to the second part of the case, to corroborate the statements which have been made with regard to the account current, with regard to the Chest Account, and with regard to the money placed at Messieurs Coutts', with the connivance of lord Melville, with regard to the insecurity of the monies so placed, and with regard to the facilities of the office.—The Commons propose now to call Mr. Edmund Antrobus, a partner in the house of Messrs. Coutts.

Then Edmund Antrobus, esq. was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a partner in the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long have you been a partner in that house?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Very near thirty years.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you generally acquainted with all the transactions of that house, with regard to their customers?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that Mr. Alexander Trotter has been for a considerable length of time a customer of that house?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I do know it.

Mr. Whitbread.—How many accounts has Mr. Alexander Trotter, or has he had with the house, opened under separate heads, from the commencement of his accounts?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—As far as I recollect at this moment, he had five.

Mr. Whitbread.—What accounts had he?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—He had one in his own name without any other designation—he had one called his separate account, another his private account, and one in his own name, in trust for Adam Jellicoe.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there not also a paymaster's account?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—And there was also an account in his name as paymaster.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it the custom of the house of Messieurs Coutts that their accounts should be signed by their customers in their books?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—It is very frequently done, but it is not necessarily so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did Mr. Alexander Trotter sign his accounts in the books?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—He has signed some of them; I do not think he has signed the whole of them.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had lord Melville an account opened at the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—He had.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has a copy of that account been delivered to lord Melville?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—A copy of that account has been transmitted to his lordship.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has that account been signed by lord Melville?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The account was transmitted to his lordship with a duplicate, the duplicate of which he returned, signed.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that the duplicate now in your hand?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—This is the duplicate of the account—it is I believe signed by lord Melville, but I never saw his lordship sign his name.

Mr. Plumer.—I admit the signature to be lord Melville's hand-writing.

Then the paper was delivered in, and is as follows:

Dr. The Right Honorable Henry Dundas . . with . . Messrs. Thomas Coutts and Co. : . Cr.

| 1787.    |                                                                                                                      | £.    | s. | d. | 1787.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | £.    | s. | d. |
|----------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|----|----|----------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|----|----|
| Mar. 22  | To cash paid George Hogg                                                                                             | 500   | 0  | 0  | Mar. 21  | By cash received of Alexander Trotter Esquire, per receipt                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 1,700 | 0  | 0  |
| April 13 | To ditto                                                                                                             | 500   | 0  | 0  | May 21   | By ditto.....per ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| 20       | To bearer.....                                                                                                       | 350   | 0  | 0  | July 20  | By ditto.....per ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 2,126 | 0  | 0  |
| May 17   | To W. Bell's bill.....                                                                                               | 156   | 0  | 0  | Aug. 3   | By ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 53    | 10 | 6  |
| 31       | To bearer...                                                                                                         | 100   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| June 13  | To ditto                                                                                                             | 500   | 0  | 0  | 1795.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 14       | To ditto                                                                                                             | 220   | 0  | 0  | Feb. 2   | By ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 4,000 | 0  | 0  |
| July 7   | To George Hogg                                                                                                       | 500   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 28       | To yourself                                                                                                          | 2,039 | 0  | 0  | 1796.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| Aug. 6   | To ditto                                                                                                             | 120   | 0  | 0  | Feb. 2   | By ditto ..... per receipt                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 431   | 9  | 6  |
| 20       | To bearer.....                                                                                                       | 50    | 0  | 0  | 9        | By ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 1,183 | 3  | 11 |
| Oct. 9   | To Alexander Trotter                                                                                                 | 40    | 0  | 0  | 11       | By W. Simpson on the Bank, remitted by R. Dundas.....                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 500   | 0  | 0  |
| 1795.    |                                                                                                                      |       |    |    | June 28  | By Hugh Warrender Esqr's. account                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 200   | 0  | 0  |
| Feb. 3   | To £.2,178 7 0 India Stock a 183½ per cent                                                                           |       |    |    | July 9   | By W. Simpson on the Bank, remitted by H. Warrender                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 988   | 1  | 2  |
|          | £.3,997 5 5                                                                                                          |       |    |    | Oct.     | By Alexander Trotter Esquire's account                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
|          | Brokerage .....2 14 7                                                                                                |       |    |    | Dec. 31  | By ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| 1796.    |                                                                                                                      | 4,000 | 0  | 0  | 1797.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| Jan. 30  | To bearer                                                                                                            | 50    | 0  | 0  | Jan. 7   | By £.1750 7 3 consolidated 3 per cents (produce of Navy bills) from our name at 56 per cent                                                                                                                                                                   |       |    |    |
| Feb. 2   | To ditto                                                                                                             | 431   | 9  | 6  |          | £.980 4 1                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |       |    |    |
| 3        | To W. Bell's bill                                                                                                    | 130   | 0  | 0  |          | Private transfer                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |       |    |    |
| —        | To ditto                                                                                                             | 130   | 0  | 0  |          | 2s. 6d.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |       |    |    |
| —        | To Katherine Gray's bill                                                                                             | 96    | 0  | 0  |          | Brokerage                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |       |    |    |
| 8        | To bearer.....                                                                                                       | 300   | 0  | 0  |          | £.2 3s. 9d. ....                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 2     | 6  | 3  |
| —        | To ditto                                                                                                             | 332   | 10 | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 977   | 17 | 10 |
| —        | To ditto                                                                                                             | 100   | 0  | 0  | 14       | By cash received of Alexander Trotter Esquire, per receipt                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| 13       | To W. Bell's bill.....                                                                                               | 130   | 0  | 0  |          | By particulars of a Navy Bill funded in consolidated 3 per cents viz. No. 80. dated 19th October 1796, £.1,000 and interest £.1,006 9 3 producing at the rate of £.173 18 3 consolidated 3 per cents for each £.100 sterling, £.1,750 7 3 Consols 3 per cents |       |    |    |
| Mar. 14  | To Lady Jane Dundas.....                                                                                             | 150   | 0  | 0  | 23       | By 6 months dividend to 5th instant on £.1,750 7 3 Consol 3 per cents arising from Navy Bills funded                                                                                                                                                          | 26    | 5  | 1  |
| 29       | To bearer.....                                                                                                       | 125   | 0  | 0  | April 25 | By Alexander Trotter Esqr's. account                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 2,000 | 0  | 0  |
| April 5  | To ditto                                                                                                             | 167   | 0  | 0  | June 7   | By ditto ..... ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| May 23   | To ditto                                                                                                             | 100   | 0  | 0  | July 29  | By ditto ..... ditto                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 1,500 | 0  | 0  |
| —        | To ditto                                                                                                             | 339   | 0  | 0  | Aug. 21  | By James Chapman per receipt.....                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 500   | 0  | 0  |
| June 4   | To ditto                                                                                                             | 200   | 0  | 0  | Sept. 1  | By Alexander Trotter Esq.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 1,500 | 0  | 0  |
| July 7   | To M. Bridges half year's rent of a house at Wimbledon Common, due at Lady Day last, from Lady Haddo to John Walford | 31    | 10 | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 9        | To 35 days interest on £.988 1 2 discounted, and on the overdrafts of your account to this day                       | 8     | 18 | 10 |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 12       | To bearer.....                                                                                                       | 480   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 13       | To W. Bell's bill.....                                                                                               | 60    | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| Oct. 21  | To a Navy bill No. 80, dated 19th October 1796, £.1,000 interest 2 days                                              | 4     | 4  |    |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
|          | Discount 8½ £.85.915 0 0                                                                                             |       |    |    |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
|          |                                                                                                                      | 915   | 4  | 4  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
|          | Brokerage ...                                                                                                        | 1     | 5  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
|          |                                                                                                                      | 916   | 9  | 4  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| Dec. 20  | To bearer.....                                                                                                       | 16    | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 29       | To ditto                                                                                                             | 100   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 1797.    |                                                                                                                      |       |    |    |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| Jan. 12  | To ditto                                                                                                             | 474   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 13       | To ditto                                                                                                             | 500   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| —        | To 1st payment of 10 per cent on £.10,000 new Loan.....                                                              | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 14       | To cash paid bearer                                                                                                  | 300   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 27       | To ditto                                                                                                             | 214   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| Feb. 9   | To ditto                                                                                                             | 100   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |
| 21       | To ditto                                                                                                             | 100   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |       |    |    |

Dr. The Right Honorable Henry Dundas . . with . . Messrs. Thomas Coutts and Co. . . Cr.

| 1797.    |                                                                                               | £.    | s. | d. |          |                                                                                       | £.     | s. | d. |
|----------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|----|----|----------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|----|----|
| Mar. 14  | To cash paid bearer .....                                                                     | 68    | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| 17       | To 2nd payment 10 per cent on £.10,000 new Loan.....                                          | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| April 21 | To 3rd ditto on ditto .....                                                                   | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| May 2    | To bearer.....                                                                                | 130   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| June 2   | To 4th payment 10 per cent on £.10,000 new Loan.....                                          | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| July 17  | To bearer.....                                                                                | 20    | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| 21       | To 5th payment of 10 per cent on £.10,000 new Loan.....                                       | 1,500 | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| Aug. 25  | To 6 ditto on ditto .....                                                                     | 1,500 | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| Sept. 2  | To bearer.....                                                                                | 250   | 0  | 0  | 1797.    |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
|          | To a power of attorney for acceptance dividends, and sale of India Stock                      | 0     | 11 | 6  | Sept. 27 | By Alexander Trotter Esq.                                                             | 3,000  | 0  | 0  |
|          | To a ditto ..... for ditto of Consolidated 3 per cent .....                                   | 0     | 11 | 6  | Nov. 11  | By Alexander Trotter Esq. account .....                                               | 689    | 0  | 1  |
|          | To a ditto ..... for ditto of Reduced 3 per cent .....                                        | 0     | 11 | 6  | 1798.    |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
|          | To a ditto ..... for ditto of 5 per cent 1797 .....                                           | 0     | 11 | 6  | Feb. 16  | By received.....                                                                      | 1,000  | 0  | 0  |
|          | To the full payment on £.10,000 Loyalty loan                                                  |       |    |    | April 4  | By Alexander Trotter Esq.                                                             | 500    | 0  | 0  |
|          | £ 3,000 0 0                                                                                   |       |    |    | June 26  | By James Chapman per receipt .....                                                    | 500    | 0  | 0  |
|          | Discount 8 7 8                                                                                |       |    |    | Nov. 28  | By ditto .....                                                                        | 500    | 0  | 0  |
|          |                                                                                               | 2,991 | 12 | 4  | Dec. 15  | By ditto .....                                                                        | 429    | 18 | 0  |
| Oct. 7   | To Mr. Alves .....                                                                            | 250   | 0  | 0  | 1799.    |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| Nov. 14  | To ditto .....                                                                                | 705   | 0  | 0  | Feb. 11  | By ditto .....                                                                        | 500    | 0  | 0  |
| 1798.    |                                                                                               |       |    |    | April 4  | By Alexander Trotter Esq.                                                             | 1,000  | 0  | 0  |
| Feb. 17  | To Thomas Wilson.....                                                                         | 1,000 | 0  | 0  | May 14   | By Mayne and Co. on Browne and Co. ....                                               | 3,207  | 10 | 2  |
| April 4  | To bearer... ..                                                                               | 500   | 0  | 0  | Oct. 18  | By James Chapman per receipt .....                                                    | 500    | 0  | 0  |
| July 2   | To ditto .....                                                                                | 180   | 0  | 0  | Dec. 5   | By ditto .....                                                                        | 200    | 0  | 0  |
| Aug. 20  | To Mr. Alves .....                                                                            | 50    | 0  | 0  | 1800.    |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| Sept. 4  | To Forbes and Co. ....                                                                        | 150   | 0  | 0  | May 21   | By cash received of Mark Sprot, Esquire, the produce of £.11,250 0 0 New 5 per Cents. |        |    |    |
| Oct. 22  | To ditto .....                                                                                | 30    | 0  | 0  |          | £.10,757 16 3                                                                         |        |    |    |
| Dec. 4   | To John Walney.. ..                                                                           | 500   | 0  | 0  |          | £.8,433 14 11                                                                         |        |    |    |
| 1799.    |                                                                                               |       |    |    |          | Reduced £.5,313 5 2                                                                   |        |    |    |
| Jan. 15  | To H. S. Alves .....                                                                          | 250   | 0  | 0  |          | £.3,566 5 1                                                                           |        |    |    |
| 29       | To Lady Jane Dundas.....                                                                      | 100   | 0  | 0  |          | Consols... £.2,282 8 0                                                                |        |    |    |
| Feb. 19  | To H. S. Alves .....                                                                          | 250   | 0  | 0  |          | £.1,000 0 0                                                                           |        |    |    |
| 23       | To ditto .....                                                                                | 150   | 0  | 0  |          | India Stock £.2,098 15 0                                                              |        |    |    |
| April 6  | To ditto .....                                                                                | 200   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       | 20,452 | 4  | 5  |
| 9        | To ditto .....                                                                                | 220   | 0  | 0  |          | (Sold by Mr. Sprot and transferred by us.)                                            |        |    |    |
| 15       | To bearer.....                                                                                | 5     | 11 | 6  | 22       | By value of your and Mr. Robert Dundas's bond and security of this date               | 13,000 | 0  | 0  |
| —        | To ditto .....                                                                                | 64    | 13 | 6  | June 26  | By James Chapman per receipt .....                                                    | 500    | 0  | 0  |
| 16       | To ditto .....                                                                                | 9     | 9  | 0  | Sept. 5  | By Forbes and Co. on Moffat and Co. remitted by Robert Dundas .....                   | 259    | 4  | 0  |
| 27       | To ditto .....                                                                                | 20    | 14 | 6  | 23       | By Robert Dundas on Child and Co. remitted by ditto.                                  | 375    | 0  | 0  |
| —        | To ditto .....                                                                                | 50    | 0  | 0  | Nov. 18  | By ditto ditto ditto .....                                                            | 250    | 0  | 0  |
| 18       | To ditto .....                                                                                | 12    | 9  | 3  | Dec. 6   | By Forbes and Co. on Moffat and Co. ditto ...                                         | 692    | 3  | 0  |
| 19       | To ditto .....                                                                                | 8     | 8  | 0  | 1801.    |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| —        | To ditto .....                                                                                | 38    | 0  | 8  | March 7  | By ditto ditto ditto .....                                                            | 692    | 3  | 0  |
| 22       | To ditto .....                                                                                | 70    | 0  | 0  | 25       | By Robert Dundas Esq. per receipt .....                                               | 500    | 0  | 0  |
| 24       | To H. S. Alves.....                                                                           | 100   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| May 15   | To the Bank, the annual voluntary contribution of the auxiliary army serving in Portugal..... | 3,207 | 10 | 2  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| 16       | To bearer.....                                                                                | 370   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| July 16  | To ditto .....                                                                                | 75    | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| Oct. 23  | To H. S. Alves.....                                                                           | 75    | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| Dec. 12  | To yourself .....                                                                             | 100   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |
| 28       | To John M. Meheux .....                                                                       | 250   | 0  | 0  |          |                                                                                       |        |    |    |

Dr. The Right Honorable Henry Dundas . . with . . Messrs. Thomas Coutts and Co. . . Cr.

| 1803.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | £.    | s. | d. |         |                                                                           | £.     | s. | d. |
|----------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|----|----|---------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|----|----|
| Mar. 28  | To cash, paid interest on £.11,500 from 21st May to 14th September 1802, and on £.10,750 remaining of yours and the Honorable Robert Dundas's bond and security, from 14th Sep. to this day ..... £.469 17 10 |       |    |    | Dec. 29 | By balance of your account as the Right Hon. Henry Dundas.....            | 227    | 14 | 7  |
|          | In further part of the principal.....6,350 0 0                                                                                                                                                                |       |    |    | 1803.   |                                                                           |        |    |    |
|          |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 6,819 | 17 | 10 | Mar. 28 | By cash received of Greene and Tennant per receipt                        | 6,800  | 0  | 0  |
| May 25   | To a transfer of India stock from the Honorable Robert Dundas's name ...                                                                                                                                      | 1     | 6  | 6  | June 13 | By cash received of Mr. Alves per receipt.....                            | 400    | 0  | 0  |
| June 13  | To cash paid in part of £.4,400 remaining of your Lordship's and the Honorable Robert Dundas's bond and security, per £.13,000 £.400 0 0                                                                      |       |    |    | July 13 | By the Midsummer dividend on £.2,000 India stock in our name .....        | 105    | 0  | 0  |
|          | 77 days interest on ditto ..... 46 8 2                                                                                                                                                                        |       |    |    | 1804.   |                                                                           |        |    |    |
|          |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 446   | 8  | 2  | Jan. 14 | By the Christmas do. on do. in do. less tax .....                         | 99     | 15 | 0  |
| Dec. 31  | To 6 months interest to 13th instant, on £.4,000 remaining of do. for do. 100 0 0                                                                                                                             |       |    |    | July 18 | By the Midsummer do. on do. in do. do. ....                               | 99     | 15 | 0  |
|          | Property tax from 5th April ..... 6 17 8                                                                                                                                                                      |       |    |    | 1805.   |                                                                           |        |    |    |
| 1804.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 93    | 2  | 4  | Jan. 19 | By the Christmas do. on do. in do. ....                                   | 99     | 15 | 0  |
| June 23  | To do. to 13th instant on do. .... £.100 0 0                                                                                                                                                                  |       |    |    | July 18 | By the Midsummer do. on do. in do. do. ....                               | 98     | 8  | 2  |
|          | Property tax ..... 5 0 0                                                                                                                                                                                      |       |    |    | 22      | By Alexander Trotter Esq.                                                 | 2,356  | 15 | 1  |
|          |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 95    | 0  | 0  | 26      | By the Honorable Robert Dundas per receipt.....                           | 2,754  | 7  | 8  |
| Dec. 31  | To do. to 13th instant on do. .... £.100 0 0                                                                                                                                                                  |       |    |    | 1806.   |                                                                           |        |    |    |
|          | Property tax ..... 5 0 0                                                                                                                                                                                      |       |    |    | Jan. 16 | By the Christmas dividend on £.2,000 India Stock in our name less tax ... | 98     | 8  | 9  |
| 1805.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 95    | 0  | 0  | Feb. 3  | By £.2,000 India Stock at 186 per cent                                    |        |    |    |
| June 24  | To do. to 13th instant on do. .... £.100 0 0                                                                                                                                                                  |       |    |    |         | £.3,720 0 0                                                               |        |    |    |
|          | Property tax ..... 5 9 5                                                                                                                                                                                      |       |    |    |         | Transfer                                                                  |        |    |    |
|          |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 94    | 10 | 7  |         | £.0 8 0                                                                   |        |    |    |
| July 27  | To the Exchequer, on account of your Lordship's first Treasurership of the Navy, ending the 10th April .....                                                                                                  |       |    |    |         | Brokerage                                                                 |        |    |    |
|          | Imprest money received £.5,111 2 9½                                                                                                                                                                           |       |    |    |         | £.2 10 0                                                                  |        |    |    |
|          | Bill money and porters ..... 0 3 6                                                                                                                                                                            |       |    |    |         |                                                                           | 2      | 18 | 0  |
|          |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 5,111 | 6  | 3  |         |                                                                           | 3,717  | 2  | 0  |
| 30       | To a transfer of India stock                                                                                                                                                                                  | 0     | 4  | 0  |         |                                                                           | 20     | 15 | 2  |
| Sept. 17 | To the Exchequer, for a tally for the sum of £.5,211 2 9½, paid in the 27th July .....                                                                                                                        |       |    |    | 4       | By received.....                                                          |        |    |    |
|          |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 0     | 12 | 0  |         |                                                                           | 16,877 | 17 | 0  |
| Dec. 31  | To 6th months interest to the 13th instant on £.4,000 remaining of your Lordship's and Robert Dundas's bond per £.13,000 ... £.100 0 0                                                                        |       |    |    |         |                                                                           |        |    |    |
|          | Property tax ..... 6 5 0                                                                                                                                                                                      |       |    |    |         |                                                                           |        |    |    |
| 1806.    |                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 93    | 15 | 0  |         |                                                                           |        |    |    |
| Feb. 3   | To 52 days do, from the                                                                                                                                                                                       |       |    |    |         |                                                                           |        |    |    |

Dr. The Right Honorable Henry Dundas . . with . . Messrs. Thomas Coutts and Co. . . Cr.

| 1806. |                                     | £.     | s. | d.   |
|-------|-------------------------------------|--------|----|------|
|       | 13th December to this day on do.... | £.28   | 9  | 10   |
|       | Property tax.....                   | 1      | 15 | 6    |
|       |                                     |        | 26 | 14 4 |
|       | In full of the principal... 4,000   | 0      | 0  |      |
|       |                                     | 4,026  | 14 | 4    |
|       |                                     | 16,877 | 17 | 0    |

Examined and settled this account with Messrs. Thomas Coutts and Company, which I approve, no balance remaining on either side; and I have received the vouchers.

London,
the 4th February 1806.

MELVILLE.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the vouchers delivered up to lord Melville or his agent, when that account was so signed?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Lord Melville's agent brought the account to the banking-house in the Strand, when the vouchers were delivered up to him.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who was the agent?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Mr. Le Blanc.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether to your knowledge Mr. Alexander Trotter's account at your house was ever overdrawn?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—It has been overdrawn.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that the credit of Mr. Trotter's account at your house was in part supplied by public money?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I know it was supplied by drafts of Mr. Trotter upon the Bank, drawn on account of the treasurer of the navy, and from the magnitude of the sums I can have no doubt but it was supplied by public money.

Mr. Plumer.—For the sake of regularity I must beg to observe upon a question of that nature, which involves several points which are not evidence. In the first place, the witness has spoken to the contents of certain drafts upon the Bank. Had he seen them, that is parol evidence of their contents. The next thing is, they were carried to the Bank. And there are a variety of circumstances that are not evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—I can assure your lordships, I am very proud of being a disciple of the learned gentleman. I will begin as he has instructed me.

(To Mr. Antrobus.)—Have you ever seen any drafts of Mr. Trotter on the Bank, for supplying the credit of his account at Mr. Coutts?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were they drafts upon the Bank of England?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—They were.

Mr. Plumer.—That is giving parol evidence of the contents of drafts, which drafts must speak for themselves.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are those drafts in your possession?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—They are not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were they delivered to Mr. Trotter?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Those drafts, the instant they were paid, would, of course, be left at the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—We will call a person from the Bank of England to show, that those drafts were delivered at the Bank of England.

Mr. Plumer.—If the honourable manager is now speaking of drafts drawn by Mr. Trotter on the Bank to supply his account, I will not put him to the necessity of proving that. The word was "account"—generally.

Lord Chancellor.—The question was whether Mr. Trotter had an account with Mr. Coutts; and the witness having stated five separate accounts, and that Mr. Trotter had besides a private account of his own, he was asked whether he had ever supplied the credit of that account by drafts drawn upon the Bank for public money; he said he had; and, therefore, he had no reason to doubt that it was public money he was drawing out of the Bank, for the purpose of supplying Alexander Trotter's account.

Mr. Plumer.—If that is understood, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did Mr. Trotter's credit consist of large permanent balances, or was it extremely fluctuating, in the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—It was generally a very fluctuating account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did the drafts upon the Bank of England go to supply partly all Mr. Trotter's accounts at your house?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—They certainly did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Which account do you except?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I mean the private account, and the account in trust for Mr. Adam Jellicoe. I cannot speak with certainty to the other three, but I think the drafts went occasionally to all the other three.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons propose to produce the books of Mr. Coutts, where it will be seen to what accounts those drafts were paid; and, as the Court spoke yesterday about the delivery of certain books to the Parliament office, the Commons beg that delivery may be postponed till they have had the farther opportunities of reference which may be necessary.

Generally, then, I understand the witness to say, that, excepting the private account and the account in trust for Mr. Adam Jellicoe, the cash from the Bank of England, drawn by Mr. Trotter, went to supply, in part at least, the funds of the other three accounts?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I do say so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether any interest was allowed by your house upon any of the balances in your hands?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Never.

Mr. Whitbread.—I should now wish, that a clerk in the house of Messieurs Coutts, of the name of Chapman, should be called.

Mr. Plumer.—Will the honourable manager call this witness again.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons will have occasion to call him again.

Mr. Plumer.—Then I will postpone my cross-examination of him.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know to which of the other accounts the greater part of those drafts were carried?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—To the account in Mr. Trotter's own name, without any other designation.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Chapman was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Chapman.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long have you been a clerk there?

Mr. Chapman.—Upwards of eleven years.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you acquainted, generally, with all the books and transactions of that house?

Mr. Chapman.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you examined the books of that house, with a view to ascertain the balances of Mr. Trotter's account, month by month, credit or debit?

Mr. Chapman.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the paper I now put into your hand, in your hand-writing?

Mr. Chapman.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you examined it with a view to the aggregate balance—the result of all Mr. Trotter's accounts?

Mr. Chapman.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you inform the Court, of your own knowledge, what was Mr. Trotter's balance in the hands of Messieurs Coutts, on the 31st December, 1787, excepting the account in trust, for Mr. Adam Jellicoe?

Mr. Plumer.—Before that question is put, I beg the Court will permit me to ask this question, as preliminary: whether the books, from which I understand that paper to be collected, are books kept by yourself?

Mr. Chapman.—I have drawn that result from the books of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and Company.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are the accounts, contained in those books, signed by Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Chapman.—They are.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you acquainted with Mr. Trotter's hand-writing?

Mr. Chapman.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are the books in Court?

Mr. Chapman.—They are.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the book in your hand a public book of the banking house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Chapman.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—On the part which lies open before you, there is an account of Mr. Alexander Trotter's.

Mr. Chapman.—There is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you find Mr. Trotter's signature there, agreeing to that account?

Mr. Chapman.—I do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that Mr. Trotter's hand-writing?

Mr. Chapman.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Which of the five accounts is that?

Mr. Chapman.—His own account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that the largest account?

Mr. Chapman.—By far.

Mr. Whitbread.—We can prove the signature to all the other accounts. Can you state what was the balance in Messieurs Coutts's hand, to the credit of Mr. Trotter, on the 31st of December 1787?

Mr. Plumer.—Do your lordships think that the signatures to those books, which would make them evidence against Mr. Trotter, are, therefore, proper evidence against the defendant? I submit it only for your lordships' consideration. I am sure, without my arguing that question, the Court will take care that improper evidence is not given.

Lord Chancellor.—To prove the fact, that the balance is against Mr. Trotter, I presume it is evidence.

A Lord.—It is evidence to prove the fact, that the balance upon that day was against Mr. Trotter; whether it will be carried farther, is another question.

Mr. Whitbread.—On the 31st of December 1787, what was the balance in favour of Mr. Trotter, upon the aggregate of all the accounts, with the exception of Adam Jellicoe's trust account always?

Mr. Chapman.—On the 31st of December 1787, the balance of Mr. Trotter's account was, creditor 1,140*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*

Lord Chancellor.—Have you formed that result from other books, and have the books from which it is derived any accounts that have not been signed by Mr. Trotter himself?

Mr. Chapman.—No.

Lord Chancellor.—Then you make that result from similar entries to this, now in court?

Mr. Chapman.—I do.

Mr. Plumer.—Does that balance you have spoken of, appear to be struck upon the face of the book, or is it one that you have yourself struck upon calculation from the books?

Mr. Chapman.—This is a balance that I struck myself from the books, but it is properly balanced in the ledger.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you strike the balances yourself in the books?

Mr. Chapman.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Upon the 31st of May, 1788, how was the balance?

Mr. Chapman.—It was then in Mr. Trotter's favour 7,251*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the balance on the 31st of May, 1790?

Mr. Chapman.—The balance then was in Mr. Trotter's favour 1,915*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was it on the 31st of March, 1792?

Mr. Chapman.—The balance was in Mr. Trotter's favour 5,580*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the balance on the 31st of October, 1793?

Mr. Chapman.—The balance in Mr. Trotter's favour was then 2,265*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the balance on the 30th of April, 1794?

Mr. Chapman.—The balance in Mr. Trotter's favour was 8,196*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the balance on the 28th of February, 1795?

Mr. Chapman.—The balance then in Mr. Trotter's favour was 47,412*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the balance on the 30th of April, in the same year?

Mr. Chapman.—The balance then in Mr. Trotter's favour was 107,971*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the balance on the 29th of February, 1796?

Mr. Chapman.—Mr. Trotter's account was then out of cash, debtor 330*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the balance on the 31st of March, in the same year?

Mr. Chapman.—His account was then in cash, creditor 14,015*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—I have omitted the date of the 31st of August, 1795. How was Mr. Trotter's balance then?

Mr. Chapman.—Mr. Trotter's account was then out of cash, debtor 2,649*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—The evidence that is now offered, if it were objected to, certainly could not be received; because unquestionably supposing the books themselves to be evidence of each account referred to, if it were insisted upon or desired, the whole of that account that is the subject of observation, must be presented to your lordships and to us. The honourable manager is selecting certain results with particular dates, which he conceives to be material in support of the prosecution, omitting to state any intermediate balances, omitting to state the items and particulars of that account, the result of which he makes the witness calculate and deliver to your lordships. I am certainly not prepared now to state—not having examined these accounts, and the honourable manager having for months examined them, and produced his results—I am not able to point out what parts of these accounts may be material on the part of the noble defendant, or whether any may be material or not. In this state of the business, I hope it will be understood, that when I do not oppose any objection to these extracts and results, the original accounts not being put upon your lordships' minutes, it is competent for us to consider them as made evidence, and to refer to each account referred to, in order that if it shall hereafter appear there is any thing proper to be produced in evidence on our part, it may be so produced. I do not wish to give your lordships unnecessary trouble, and encumber the minutes with unnecessary matter; but I hope your lordships will not think I act improperly in having this distinctly understood, in order that it may be seen what is made evidence by the course of this proceeding.

Lord Chancellor.—You are perfectly correct in the observation you have made.

Mr. Whitbread.—The books from which these results are extracted, are all in court, capable of being produced immediately to your lordships; and the learned counsel, I understand, admits this, provided he may have access to the books, which he undoubtedly may, that any of these statements may be overturned; but I understand, that whatever exception they may be liable to hereafter, they are admitted by the counsel as evidence.

A Lord.—The books are certainly evidence; but, what he is doing with the books is, he is performing that function, which, with due examination, we can discharge for ourselves, making these extracts and deductions from them. If the counsel are desirous of producing other extracts, and furnishing other conclusions, it is competent for them to do so; but the present examination is the course that prevails every day, in every court of justice; therefore there can be no possible doubt about it.

Another Lord.—I apprehend that there can be no manner of doubt, that the evidence offered to your lordships is legal evidence; for the books are the evidence now before the Court, and the calculations of the witness amount to nothing more than the witness stating upon his oath, that striking the balance on a particular day, that is the result of both sides of the account. What the effect of the proof is to be, must depend upon the proof itself, and such additional evidence from the books, as the counsel for lord Melville may think proper to offer.

Lord Chancellor.—The court is in its ordinary functions receiving this evidence. The admission of the learned counsel, on the other side is, that these entries shall be read by the witness, from the statement he has made from the books; instead of reading them from the books themselves.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons so understand it.

Mr. Plumer.—When the witness states any balance, I should wish he would state whether the balance he so gives in evidence, is a balance struck upon the book, or the result of a calculation founded upon that book?

Mr. Chapman.—I have not taken the balance to be found upon the ledger, but my own result.

Lord Chancellor.—Are the balances struck in the book, or are they the result of your own calculations, taking the books for the basis of them?

Mr. Chapman.—They are the result of my calculations.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the balance of Mr. Trotter's account on the 31st of August, 1795?

Mr. Chapman.—The balance was then, against Mr. Trotter, 2,649*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—You have been previously asked to the 29th of February, 1796, and the 31st of March; I wish now to have your answer to the last day of April, 1796?

Mr. Chapman.—On the 30th of April, 1796, Mr. Trotter's account was out of cash, debtor 2,248*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was Mr. Trotter's account on the 31st of May, in the same year?

Mr. Chapman.—It was then out of cash, debtor 2,286*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was Mr. Trotter's account on the 30th of June, 1797?

Mr. Chapman.—Mr. Trotter's account was then in cash, creditor 45,702*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was Mr. Trotter's account on the 31st of January, 1798?

Mr. Chapman.—It was then out of cash, debtor 31,776*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was the account the 30th of September, 1798?

Mr. Chapman.—It was then, creditor 258*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was Mr. Trotter's account on the 31st of August, 1799?

Mr. Chapman.—It was then out of cash, debtor 88*l.* 15*s.* 8*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was Mr. Trotter's account on the 31st of March, 1800?

Mr. Chapman.—It was then debtor 3,184*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—How was his account on the 30th of April, in the same year?

Mr. Chapman.—It was then in cash, creditor 8,523*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Take a book of Messieurs Coutts before you, having the account of Mr. Trotter on the 4th of September, 1792. What account have you now got before you?

Mr. Chapman.—The account I now have before me is called Mr. Alexander Trotter's own account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether there is an entry in the early part of the month of September, I believe on the 4th, of a debit for the purchase of India stock?

Mr. Chapman.—I find an entry for the purchase of India stock on the 4th of September, 1792?

Lord Chancellor.—Read the whole of that entry.

Mr. Chapman.—1792, September 4th, 2,000*l.* India stock, at 203¼*l.* per cent, 4,057*l.* 10*s.*

Mr. Whitbread.—What was Mr. Trotter's balance, pro and con. on the morning of that day, before there were any receipts or payments?

Mr. Chapman.—Mr. Trotter was, on the morning of that day, creditor 246*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—I ask to Mr. Trotter's own account only?

Mr. Chapman.—I am now speaking to his own account only.

Mr. Whitbread.—Now read the credit entered to Mr. Alexander Trotter's account on that day?

Mr. Chapman.—There appears on that account, one credit only—"By cash received, 8,000*l.*"

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—I will now call another witness to produce the waste-book, to inform the Court. We wish to point your lordships' attention to this 2,000*l.* India stock, which was before spoken of by the Commons, which we shall trace into the possession of lord Melville, and to show your lordships how that 2,000*l.* was ultimately disposed of.

Then Mr. William Charlton was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Charlton.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long have you been in that house?

Mr. Charlton.—Twenty-two years.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that book which lies before you?

Mr. Charlton.—The waste-book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is any part of that waste-book written by yourself? are the entries on the fourth of September, 1792, or any of them, in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Charlton.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you find an entry of the payment of a draft to the credit of Mr. Alexander Trotter on that day?

Lord Chancellor.—Referring to any entry of your own, answer that question.

Mr. Charlton.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read that entry to the Court.

Mr. Charlton.—"Alexander Trotter, 8,000*l.* his draft on the Bank of England 8,000*l.* credit, his own account."

Mr. Whitbread.—Which brings it to the account in the ledger, of which Mr. Chapman has been speaking.

Then Mr. William Charlton was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—You have no memory of the transaction, but speak entirely from the entry in the book?

Mr. Charlton.—Not the least.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Chapman was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to Mr. Trotter's own account in Mr. Coutts's ledger, 797. Do you know, of your own knowledge, whether in 1792 Mr. Alexander Trotter had any more than two accounts?

Mr. Chapman.—I cannot answer from recollection, but I believe he had more.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 13th of January, 1797?

Mr. Chapman.—This is not the right book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to Mr. Alexander Trotter, paymaster's account of the 4th of September, in the year 1792, and calculate what was the balance of Mr. Trotter's account, either for or against. On the morning of that day, how is the paymaster's account before any of the transactions of that day commenced?

Mr. Chapman.—The paymaster's account of Alexander Trotter, on the 4th of September, 1792, was out of cash, debtor 102*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Had Mr. Alexander Trotter any other accounts opened at that time besides his own account, to which you have before spoken, and his paymaster's account?

Mr. Chapman.—He had.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was that account?

Mr. Chapman.—An account called his private account.

Mr. Whitbread.—What did that private account consist of?

Mr. Chapman.—That I do not know.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the entries in the book.

Mr. Chapman.—“1792 (on the credit side), June the 23rd, by balance brought from the last ledger 25,000*l.*”

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the debit side.

Mr. Chapman.—“1792, December the 10th, to cash paid his account 10,000*l.*”---“1793, February 8th, ditto, 15,000*l.*”

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any other account opened at that time, besides his own account, his paymaster's account, and his private account, which you have last spoken of?

Mr. Chapman.—There was.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was that account?

Mr. Chapman.—An account in trust for the estate of Adam Jellicoe, esq. deceased.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—We do not wish to draw your lordships' attention to that account, because that account the Commons have put out of their consideration altogether.

Then Edmund Antrobus, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to Mr. Alexander Trotter's private account of the 4th of September 1792. Do you know to what transactions these entries relative to a sum of 25,000*l.* relate?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The credit of 25,000*l.* relates to a sum that was paid in to Mr. Mansfield, at Edinburgh, on our account, by Mr. Trotter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does that entry refer solely to that account?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—It refers solely to that money.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it independent of all Mr. Alexander Trotter's other accounts?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—And did the house of Messieurs Coutts hold that sum in trust, on account of Mr. Alexander Trotter?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—It was paid in by Mr. Robert Trotter, and held by his direction at the disposal of Mr. Alexander Trotter. Messieurs Mansfield and Company, I believe, did not know any thing of Mr. Alexander Trotter's name in the transaction.

Mr. Whitbread.—In fact, was it Mr. Alexander Trotter's money, or money upon his account?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does that entry contain any thing except that which relates to that single transaction?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—This account does not contain any thing else.

Mr. Plumer.—Did I understand you rightly that, as to this sum, which was paid in on account of Mansfield and Company, that house was not, you believe, cognizant on whose account that was paid, whether on Robert or Alexander Trotter's, or on account of Mr. Coutts's house?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I believe not.

Mr. Plumer.—They conceived it to be Mr. Robert Trotter's?

Mr. Whitbread.—I hope the learned counsel will not instruct me one way by his example, and another by his precept. It strikes me that the learned counsel has put a question which he would not permit me to put; a question upon the account, without having first established the account.

Mr. Plumer.—The question I put was founded upon the question of the honourable manager's, and the answer the witness had given.

Mr. Whitbread.—As soon as you received this 25,000*l.* you did not immediately credit Mr. Alexander Trotter with the amount?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—We did not receive the money at that time; but as soon as Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company gave us information of their having such a sum paid them, by Mr. Robert Trotter, to the credit of Mr. Alexander Trotter, we debited them for that sum, and placed the same to the credit of Mr. Alexander Trotter's private account.

A Lord.—Whether, upon the 4th of September, 1792, Mr. Alexander Trotter had, by reason of this transaction, or had not such a credit with the house of Messieurs Coutts, that he could have drawn upon them for 8,000*l.* by virtue of this last account?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—He might have done it.

A Lord.—Whether the 25,000*l.* was placed to the credit of Mr. Coutts, or of Alexander Trotter?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—In Mansfield and Company's book, it was placed to the credit of Mr. Thomas Coutts and Company, and not to the credit of Alexander Trotter.

Lord Chancellor.—And as soon as you had intimation of that, you debited Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, and put it to Mr. Alexander Trotter's private account?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Yes.

A Lord.—Do I understand you correctly, when I understand you to mean this: that Messieurs Coutts had a credit with Mansfield and Company, for 25,000*l.*, and that they gave a credit to Alexander Trotter for that 25,000*l.*; but that Alexander Trotter might have drawn upon Coutts and Company to that amount, on the fourth of September, 1792?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—As soon as Mansfield and Company had communicated to us, that they had such a credit, and we had placed it to Mr. Alexander Trotter's account, he might have drawn for it certainly.

A Lord.—How soon was that communication made by Mansfield and Company, that Messieurs Coutts had credit with them for that money?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—From looking at the book now, I find it was in the beginning of October, 1789, that we received the intimation of it from Mansfield and Company.

A Lord.—What interest was paid by Messieurs Mansfield and Ramsay upon that sum?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—They paid an interest after the rate of four per cent per annum.

A Lord.—Is it customary to draw upon bankers, without previous notice, for money lodged in Scotland, at the rate of four per cent per annum interest?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I am not acquainted with the customs of the bankers in Scotland, this was an arrangement made for the purpose of sending up the money here; but I cannot speak as to the custom of the bankers in Scotland.

A Lord.—Whether you understood from Mr. Trotter, why a particular account was opened, intitled, "The private Account," with reference to the transaction of this sum of 25,000*l.* with Mansfield and Company?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I cannot speak now as to what was done at the time, but I can easily suppose what was the reason of it; I cannot speak with certainty to any conversation at the time.

A Lord.—Do you know of any purpose of convenience that would be answered by opening an account with that distinct head?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I do.

A Lord.—What is that convenience?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—By the money being immediately at the credit of Mr. Alexander Trotter, he could call for it whenever he pleased; if it had not been so, he must have waited till he could send down to Scotland, and have the money sent up to him.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons feel that the evidence on this part is extremely intricate, but they hope they have proved, to your lordships' satisfaction, what they undertook to prove; which was, that on the 4th of September, 1792, Mr. Trotter purchased 4,000*l.* East India stock, 2,000*l.* of which, as stated in the books produced in evidence, was for the right honourable Henry Dundas; that the draft, with which that stock was paid for, was given on his own account; that the account, on the morning of that day, stood creditor in the sum of 400*l.* or thereabouts; that the only credit given in that account, on that day, was for a draft on the Bank of England of 8,000*l.*; that in Mr. Trotter's paymaster-account, which is the second account referred to, Mr. Trotter stood debtor to the house of Coutts; on the same day in this private account, which refers solely to the transaction of Mansfield, Ramsay, and Company, there was a credit to the amount of 25,000*l.* out of which Mr. Antrobus states, that Mr. Trotter might have drawn 8,000*l.*; there is another account in the books, which makes the fourth account, in trust for Adam Jellicoe, to which we do not at all refer. I take this to be the state of the evidence on this transaction at present. I beg now to refer to Mr. Chapman.

Mr. Plumer.—I beg to put one question: Whether, at this time in September, the credit of Mr. Trotter with your house was such, that supposing that draft upon the Bank, by which he had credit for 8,000*l.* had not existed, and that Mr. Trotter had drawn to that amount, would he have had credit for it?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—We should have paid his draft.

Mr. Plumer.—Were all the drafts of Mr. Alexander Trotter upon the Bank of England, drafts on account of Mr. Dundas, as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I have never seen any that were otherwise.

Mr. Plumer.—Confine yourself to those that you have seen—was it so?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—All those that I have seen have been so.

A Lord.—Were all those five accounts which have been spoken to, in that book? or are they in different books?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I believe, at this time, one of the accounts was closed, but all the accounts in the name of Mr. Trotter were kept in one book.

A Lord.—You have stated, that independently of that 8,000*l.* if Mr. Trotter had not had this credit, you would have suffered him to overdraw his account up to that amount; would you have suffered him so to have overdrawn his account, if he had not been in the situation of paymaster of the navy?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—If he had come and made the request, I think under many circumstances we should have paid his draft; it would have depended upon the circumstances attending the case; if Mr. Trotter had been a poor man, or a variety of circumstances might have altered that.

A Lord.—If Mr. Trotter had overdrawn his account, would interest have been charged upon him according to the sums that he over-drew?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I rather think not, and particularly if it had been merely a temporary advance; it appears that the account has been frequently overpaid, and there never was an interest charged upon those advances, it was merely a temporary case.

A Lord.—Then would such credit have been given without charging any interest?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I cannot speak to that; if it had been likely to be permanent, we should have desired Mr. Trotter to sign a note or bond, or give some security for it, and the interest would have commenced.

A Lord.—You said before, that you had delivered vouchers to Mr. Le Blanc—state when it was that you so delivered them?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I cannot recollect the precise date, but it was very recently; it was very soon after the date of the account being signed. The account appears to have been signed by lord Melville about the 4th of February, 1806, when it is dated; it might be probably a few days afterwards; and a few days subsequent to that, vouchers were delivered up to Mr. Le Blanc.

A Lord.—Am I to understand that this paper was signed before it was dated?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—At the time this account was transmitted to lord Melville, he was down at Bath, and when we send an account away, we generally write the sort of docket we wish the party to sign, and date it the day it is sent away; consequently, it might be a day or two after that before lord Melville signed it.

A Lord.—Whether the vouchers have, in point of fact, been delivered to lord Melville's solicitor?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—They have been delivered to Mr. Le Blanc?

A Lord.—Were any vouchers before that time delivered up to lord Melville?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The vouchers that were now delivered up, are from the commencement of the account; it is possible that some single voucher may have been delivered up, and another acknowledgment taken in lieu of it, but I do not recollect any such circumstance, nor do I believe that there was any.

A Lord.—When did lord Melville last settle his account?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I believe lord Melville never did settle his account previous to the period now spoken of.

A Lord.—Did you see these vouchers yourself delivered to Mr. Le Blanc?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I can speak almost to a certainty that I saw them delivered up—I know they were delivered up by my directions.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Chapman was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Quitting for the present the thread of the history, as to the 2,000*l.* India stock; I wish to call your lordship's attention to a certain quantity of loyalty loan, which, it is in evidence before your lordships, was purchased by Messieurs Coutts and Co. for the benefit of lord Melville; and first to have been taken (that is, the capital with which it was purchased), into the account current of Mr. Trotter, and afterwards to have been transferred to the Chest account. I beg to put into the hand of the witness, who is a clerk to Messieurs Coutts, the signed account of lord Melville which has been received by the counsel on the other side.

Mr. Plumer.—I believe some of the statements that are made, are sometimes entered upon your lordships minutes, and, therefore, they should be correct. The honorable manager supposes it has been in proof that the loyalty loan was purchased either by Mr. Trotter or Mr. Coutts. I do not remember that either of those facts were proved. I think, the witness interrogated upon the subject, said he knew nothing by whom it was purchased.

Lord Chancellor.—Nothing that the honourable managers say can go for evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—I believe it was in evidence that there was a certain quantity of the loyalty loan purchased for, and repayment made by Mr. Alexander Trotter for that purpose.

Mr. Plumer.—I did understand the evidence to be that, as to the original purchase, the witness knew nothing. He stated that it was originally purchased (for what he knew of it) with the money of lord Melville, but the subsequent instalments only he spoke of.

Mr. Whitbread.—That the payments were made by Alexander Trotter, and carried to his account, and from his account transferred to the account current, and from the account current to the Chest account. I beg to refer the witness to the debit side of lord Melville's account on the 13th of January 1797:—What do you find entered on that day?

Mr. Chapman.—It appears that on the 13th of January, 1797, there is an entry, to bearer 500*l.* and also the first payment of ten per cent on 10,000*l.* new loan 1,000*l.*

Mr. Plumer.—Have you read the whole of that last entry? if not, read the whole of it.

Mr. Chapman.—I have read the whole of it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to another payment, supposed to have been made on the same account, on the 17th March.

Mr. Chapman.—The second payment of ten per cent, on 10,000*l.* new loan 1,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to April 23rd of the same year, to a similar entry.

Mr. Chapman.—April the 23rd, 1797, the third payment on ditto 1,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 2nd of June, 1797, for a similar entry.

Mr. Chapman.—The 2nd of June, 1797, the fourth payment of ten per cent on 10,000*l.* new loan 1,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 21st of July, in the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—The 21st of July, of the same year, the fifth payment of fifteen per cent on 10,000*l.* new loan 1,500*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to the 25th of August, of the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—The 25th of August, the sixth ditto, on ditto, 1,500*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to the entry of the 27th September of the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—September 27th, the full payment on 10,000*l.* loyalty loan 3,000*l.*; discount 8*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*—2,991*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the credit side of the same account, and read an entry of the 14th of January, 1797.

Mr. Chapman.—January the 14th, 1797, by cash received of Alexander Trotter, esquire, per receipt 1,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 25th of April, of the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—April the 25th, 1797, by Alexander Trotter, esquire's account 2,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 7th of June, of the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—June the 7th of the same year, by ditto 1,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 29th of July, in the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—July the 29th, of the same year, ditto, ditto 1,500*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 1st of September, of the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—The first of September, by Alexander Trotter, esquire, 1,500*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the 27th of September, of the same year.

Mr. Chapman.—By ditto 3,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Cast up these sums on the credit side, and see whether they do not tally with the other sums in the amount of 10,000*l.* What is the sum?

Mr. Chapman.—The sum of the total is 10,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—That 10,000*l.* on the debit side, and 10,000*l.* on the credit, form the special entries that have been read, minus the 8*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*?

Mr. Chapman.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—What do you find to be the amount of the debit side of those items?

Mr. Chapman.—I find the total amount to be 10,000*l.*

Mr. Plumer.—You have been speaking of this loyalty loan, do you know that that stock called the loyalty loan did, soon after the subscription to it, considerably fall?

Mr. Chapman.—I do not.

Mr. Whitbread.—I apprehend it is in proof from this part of the books, that lord Melville's account between the 13th of January and the 27th of September, inclusive, of the year 1797, was debited by Messieurs Coutts, in the sum of 10,000*l.* That lord Melville's account, between the 14th of January and the 27th of September of the same year, both inclusive, was credited for the sum of 10,000*l.* by payments made as it stands in those books, by Mr. Alexander Trotter. Now, I propose to refer to a farther account in this book, to show when this loyalty stock was sold; and for that purpose I wish the witness to refer to the entry on the 21st of May, on the same account.

What do you find upon the credit side of lord Melville's account, on the 21st of May, 1800?

Mr. Chapman.—I find an entry;—"By cash received of Mark Sprot, esq. the produce of 11,250*l.*—New five per cents 10,757*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—I apprehend it is shown, that this loyalty loan, ending in September, 1797, having cost 10,000*l.* was sold in May, 1800, for 10,757*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* Was lord Melville credited for the amount of that sale?

Mr. Chapman.—It would appear so, from the accounts of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and Company.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you referring to the signed accounts in your hand?

Mr. Chapman.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the next entry of any sum in the same account on the credit side, and see what the figures are.

Mr. Chapman.—May the 21st, 1800, on the credit side, I find the credit of 8,433*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* Reduced 5,313*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Am I to understand that the amount of the Stock is 8,433*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* and the produce of the sale is 5,313*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*

Mr. Chapman.—It is to be so understood.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of the same day, of the sale of 3,566*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* consols, the produce of which would appear to be 2,282*l.* 8*s.*

Mr. Chapman.—There is such an entry;—3,566*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, consols, 2,282*l.* 8*s.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the next entry of the 22d of May 1800, and read it.

Mr. Chapman.—May the 22d, 1800. By the value of your and Mr. Robert Dundas's bond, and security of this date, 13,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Now cast up for the information of the Court, the four different sums 10,757*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* 5,313*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* 2,282*l.* 8*s.* and 2,098*l.* 15*s.* upon the credit of lord Melville's account, and state what they amount to?

Mr. Chapman.—The total amount is 20,452*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Now refer to an entry of May the 22d, 1800, on the debit side of lord Melville's account.

Mr. Chapman.—May the 22nd, 1800, To act of parliament new account 13,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the next entry of the same date.

Mr. Chapman.—To ditto 19,024*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Read the next entry on the debit side of the account.

Mr. Chapman.—The same date—To Mark Sprot, esq. 1,427*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Cast up the two sums 19,024*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* and 1,427*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.* and state the result?

Mr. Chapman.—The amount of those two sums is 20,452*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Does it not exactly tally with the result of the sales of the loyalty, the reduced, the consols, and the India stock, mentioned on the other side?

Mr. Chapman.—It does.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer back to the entry on the credit side of lord Melville's account, relative to the India stock.

Mr. Chapman.—On the 21st of May, 1800, 1,000*l.* India stock, 2,098*l.* 15*s.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you include that India stock in the calculation you made of the whole amount?

Mr. Chapman.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—I apprehend it is now in proof before your lordships, that lord Melville's account was credited at the house of Messieurs Coutts, on the 21st of May, 1800, in 10,755*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* being the produce of the 5 per cent stock sold; that his account was credited in 5,333*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* the amount of reduced annuities sold; in 2,282*l.* 8*s.* on account of consols sold, and 1,000*l.* India stock sold for 2,098*l.* 15*s.* making upon the sale of those stocks a credit of 20,452*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*—he was likewise credited for 13,000*l.* upon a bond and security of the same date; that he was debited, on the same day, for 13,000*l.* a payment made to his Act of Parliament account; on the same day, for the same account, in 19,024*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* and on the same day, in a payment to Mark Sprot, of 1,427*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.* precisely tallying with the credit stated on the other side. If that is proved, I shall beg to call Mr. Coutts Trotter.

Then Mr. William Chapman was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—You have been speaking of Mr. Trotter's accounts; whether, during any and what period Mr. Trotter had credit for 25,000*l.*?

Mr. Chapman.—I cannot state from recollection.

A Lord.—Is it intended that these accounts should be delivered in?

Mr. Whitbread.—Undoubtedly.

Lord Chancellor.—This will be a proper time for stating that, undoubtedly the accounts upon which you build must be brought in, and delivered into the hands of the Court, for the inspection of the Lords, or of the counsel for the defendant, if they think proper.

[The same were accordingly delivered in.]

A Lord.—I only wish to ascertain the fact, because the effect of particular items upon particular items, must depend altogether on the general effect of the whole. You have been referring to that paper when giving your evidence; had you received any notification from any person of the specific entries to which you should be examined before this Court?

Mr. Chapman.—Not on this account, but I had on Mr. Alexander Trotter's account.

A Lord.—Would you, by referring to that paper alone, be able to answer any question, touching other matters than those to which you have been examined, without such previous notification?

Mr. Chapman.—Certainly not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is this paper your handwriting?

Mr. Chapman.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does that paper contain every balance of Mr. Trotter's account, month by month?

Mr. Chapman.—It does.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons had prepared, and were ready to prove, every monthly balance in the way they did the former, but it was to save the time of the Court that we selected particular balances, and proved them which correspond exactly with the balances stated yesterday.

A Lord.—How long did you state that you had been a clerk at the house of Messieurs Coutts?

Mr. Chapman.—Upwards of eleven years.

A Lord.—If you have been no longer than eleven years clerk to the house of Messieurs Coutts, I desire to know upon what ground you speak to credits and debits of the house beginning in the year 1788?

Mr. Chapman.—I speak of them only as from the ledgers of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and Company.

A Lord.—Were those ledgers signed by Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Chapman.—Most of the accounts were.

A Lord.—Does it appear that in this period, between January 1797, and September 1797, when those several payments were made, as given in evidence, that there were not many other payments made by Mr. Alexander Trotter; because I think, if that be the case, whatever may be the effect of it, it ought to be upon the evidence.

Mr. Chapman.—It appears there have been several.

A Lord.—Read those different payments to the Court?

Mr. Chapman.—There were several payments made by lord Melville. It does not appear, by this account, that there were any made by Mr. Alexander Trotter.

Mr. Whitbread.—It appears that 10,000*l.* loyalty loan was purchased; is that the loyalty loan sold for 11,250*l.*?

Mr. Plumer.—I wish to know what evidence is proposed to stand upon your lordships' minutes. I do not quite collect now, whether it is intended that any particular account, of which an extract has been given, and the result has been given, should stand upon your lordships' minutes; that is to say, the account of that date from whence that inference is drawn; or whether it is proposed to give in the books in general, in order that any one of your lordships, or the defendant, may have liberty hereafter to adduce any part of the accounts. If it is intended by them, in the first instance, to put the accounts, from which those results are given, upon the minutes, then I understand it will be competent for all your lordships to see and to compare it.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons propose to put in the original account of lord Melville, signed by himself; which contains every item of his lordship's account in the books, and to add to that the books of Messieurs Coutts themselves, to which the learned counsel, or the Court, may have reference for every item of the account.

Mr. Plumer.—But your lordships have had given to you certain balances, struck in Mr. Trotter's account, at different periods. I desire to know whether the items which constitute that account, the result of which is only given in, are proposed to be entered upon the minutes?

Mr. Whitbread.—It is proposed to offer to your lordships all the books from which those results are taken.

Mr. Plumer.—I only wish to know with respect to each account, the balance of which is selected at different periods, whether it is proposed to put upon the minutes the items which compose that account, the balance of which is so given in?

Mr. Whitbread.—It is the wish of the Commons, to give the learned counsel the utmost information he can require upon the subject of this account, and whatever shall be judged to be the way to give it most fully, that it is the wish of the Commons to take.

A Lord.—Does that paper, you state to be in your hand-writing, contain the whole account, or only the extracts of particular items from the account?

Mr. Chapman.—I presume it is the whole account.

A Lord.—I wish to know, and clearly to understand, whether you can positively swear to that paper?—Is it signed by lord Melville?

Mr. Chapman.—The signature of lord Melville is annexed to the account, but I cannot swear to it.

A Lord.—I apprehend it will tend to explain, if I state to the Court, that the course the managers propose I understand to be this,—they have produced books which are signed by Mr. Trotter, and are therefore evidence against Mr. Trotter; how much farther that evidence can be carried depends upon what is subsequently to be proved. They have also proved particular balances at certain periods of this account, and that mode of proceeding is no more than this, which is usual,—that the several entries in the books being attested by the signature of Mr. Trotter, are sufficiently proved to be read, in order to establish the account as against Mr. Trotter. For the purpose of finding out what are the balances of the accounts so established at particular periods; in theory, though not in practice, the several items of the accounts are supposed to be read, and the individual who produces the paper of balances, is taken to swear that he has gone through the items on both sides of it, and that at the particular dates to which he speaks such are the balances; that way of representing the evidence supposes all the items, the result of which are so spoken to, to be part of the evidence before the Court.

With respect to the other account, it is signed by lord Melville himself; it is, therefore, without more distinct evidence, as far as it goes, evidence against lord Melville; that account so signed must be entered upon the minutes. The counsel on the other side, of course, if they think proper, will look to the books in order to see whether the balances have been properly given, and if they think fit to insist upon it, they will have a right (as to which they will exercise their own discretion) to put upon your lordships minutes all the items in those books; for those items, the result of which is now collected, are in evidence.

Is the balance paper in your hand—not lord Melville's account, but the other—a list of the aggregate balances, or of all the balances besides the aggregate balances?

Mr. Chapman.—It is a list of the aggregate balances; it contains also the balances separately.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does not the paper in your hand contain the balances struck separately, at the end of each month, and the aggregate balance of the whole?

Mr. Chapman.—It does; the separate balances are struck, and the aggregate balance carried out afterwards.

Mr. Whitbread.—Your lordships will have observed, that 10,000*l.* loyalty loan only, was purchased, according to the accounts, and that 11,250*l.* new 5 per cents was sold. The Commons wish to show, that an act of parliament, which passed on the twenty-third of November, 1796, performed an operation upon that loyalty loan; that the 10,000*l.* by that act, had increased to the precise sum of 11,250*l.* new 5 per cents, making these sums of 10,000*l.* and 11,250*l.* tally. The act is the 37th Geo. 3rd, cap. 10, sec. 1. This act says, that every contributor of 100*l.* is entitled to the principal of 112*l.* 10*s.* in the new 5 per cents from the 10th October, 1796. I wish to ask the witness, whether upon that calculation, the sum of 10,000*l.* stock would not appear, at the time it was sold, to be 11,250*l.*?

Mr. Chapman.—It would appear so.

A Lord.—Having proved what were the separate, and what were the aggregate balances, at the end of every month, have you enabled yourself to state, either what were the separate balances or the aggregate balances, during the currency of every month, from week to week?

Mr. Chapman.—I have not.

A Lord.—Were those monthly balances shown to Mr. Trotter, and acknowledged by him?

Mr. Chapman.—I believe not.

A Lord.—When were they shown to Mr. Trotter, and when were they acknowledged?

Another Lord.—I understand the books were shown to Mr. Trotter, and signed by him; but the witness, I understood, said the balances were made by himself, and not shown to Mr. Trotter.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Coutts Trotter, esquire, was called in, and, having been sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a partner in the house of Messieurs Coutts and Company?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you so previous to the year 1800?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you any knowledge relative to a loan advanced to lord Melville, by the house of Coutts and Company, for the sum of 13,000*l.*?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I know that such a sum was advanced by way of loan.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you the person who transacted that business between the house and lord Melville?

Mr. C. Trotter.—Principally.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had you any conversation with lord Melville, upon that subject?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I had.

Mr. Whitbread.—State what was that conversation, merely as to the matter of business?

Mr. C. Trotter.—My brother Alexander had previously spoken to me, and told me lord Melville would have occasion for such a loan; and seeing lord Melville, the conversation turned more upon the nature of the security, than upon any other subject, nor do I recollect that any other conversation passed.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the sum intended to be borrowed, always the specific sum of 13,000*l.*?

Mr. C. Trotter.—From some circumstances that have occurred lately, I think so; but I cannot say from any remembrance of it myself.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you think it was always 13,000*l.* that was intended to be borrowed?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I do not now think so.

Mr. Whitbread.—What do you think was the original sum intended to be borrowed?

Mr. C. Trotter.—From the kind of recollection which I allude to, I think it was 10,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know what was the cause of the increase?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I do not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you make any communication to lord Melville, of any thing which had passed between you and Mr. Alexander Trotter, upon this subject?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I supposed that lord Melville must have known—

A Lord.—I have often heard it said by learned judges, that the thoughts and conceptions of men are not evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you make any communication to lord Melville, of what had passed between you and Mr. Alexander Trotter?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I spoke to lord Melville, knowing and feeling that he was acquainted with the circumstance of my having spoken to my brother before.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did any thing pass between you and lord Melville, as to what had passed between Mr. Alexander Trotter and you, upon this transaction?

Mr. C. Trotter.—The impression upon my mind is, that my brother was fully acquainted with the circumstance of lord Melville wishing to have the money at that time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know, from lord Melville's conversation with you, that lord Melville had that knowledge?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I certainly think so.

A Lord.—Can you recollect what passed between lord Melville and you; or that any thing did pass, as to the nature of the security?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I think lord Melville, in that conversation communicated to me the nature of the security he had to propose for the loan, and I left him with the determination of communicating with Mr. Coutts, who was finally to decide, whether the loan was to take place or not.

A Lord.—What was the nature of the security proposed?

Mr. C. Trotter.—An assignment of his lordship's salary as keeper of the signet, an assignment of his lordship's salary as keeper of the privy seal, and also the collateral security of Mr. Robert Dundas, his son.

A Lord.—Was that ever carried into effect?

Mr. C. Trotter.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville, in the course of that conversation, ever express for what particular object he wanted that sum of money?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I do not recollect that he did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any other security besides those you have mentioned—was there not 2,000*l.* India stock?

Mr. C. Trotter.—There was.

A Lord.—Repeat again the securities given?

Mr. C. Trotter.—The securities given were, first, an assignment of his lordship's salary as keeper of the privy seal; next, an assignment of his salary as keeper of the signet; then the 2,000*l.* India stock, which I had forgotten; and the collateral security of Mr. Robert Dundas, his son.

A Lord.—I think you have made a mistake, because I believe lord Melville did not hold those offices at the same time.—Did lord Melville make any assignment of his salary as keeper of the privy seal, and keeper of the signet.

Mr. C. Trotter.—They were both joined in the security; one had it in possession, and the other in reversion.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Charlton was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—We mean to show that Mr. Charlton was the person who paid into the house of Messieurs Coutts the Bank notes which constitute the sum of 13,000*l.* and 19,024*l.* which were proved to be debited to lord Melville's account, on the 24th of May, 1800, and which were paid in to the act of parliament new account.

Then thirty-five cancelled Bank notes, of the following numbers, dates, and sums, were shown to the witness.

|                               |        |
|-------------------------------|--------|
| No. 1581.—14th May 1800 ..... | £.1000 |
| 1889.—8th May 1800 .....      | 1000   |
| 1736.—15th.....               | 1000   |
| 1613.—14th.....               | 1000   |
| 128.—9th.....                 | 1000   |
| 781.—24th April .....         | 1000   |
| 40.—17th May.....             | 1000   |
| 410.—30th April .....         | 1000   |
| 1714.—15th May .....          | 1000   |
| 320.—19th.....                | 1000   |
| 1853.—15th.....               | 1000   |
| 1906.—16th.....               | 1000   |
| 478.—10th.....                | 1000   |
| 6280.—30th April .....        | 20     |
| 1250.—14th May .....          | 1000   |
| 1644.—14th.....               | 1000   |
| 1746.—8th.....                | 1000   |
| 573.—10th.....                | 1000   |
| 498.—30th April .....         | 1000   |
| 799.—1st May .....            | 1000   |
| 168.—28th April .....         | 1000   |
| 1852.—15th May .....          | 1000   |
| 1851.—15th.....               | 1000   |
| 1395.—14th.....               | 1000   |
| 611.—12th.....                | 1000   |
| 612.—12th.....                | 1000   |
| 733.—1st.....                 | 1000   |
| 233.—24th April .....         | 1000   |
| 1696.—13th March.....         | 1000   |
| 1989.—8th May .....           | 1000   |
| 1988.—8th.....                | 1000   |
| 1987.—8th.....                | 1000   |
| 1960.—8th... ..               | 1000   |
| 4737.—24th April .....        | 2      |
| 4736.—24th.....               | 2      |

Mr. Whitbread.—Referring to the Bank notes in your hand, state whether those Bank notes were paid to the draft of lord Melville, drawn upon the act of parliament new account, on the 22nd of May, 1806?

Mr. Charlton.—Those notes do not appear to me to be paid into the Bank of England, but to Mr. Alexander Trotter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were they in payment of a draft, drawn by lord Melville on his act of parliament new account?

Mr. Charlton.—Those notes were paid for two of Mr. Dundas's drafts to Mr. Alexander Trotter; one was for 13,000*l.* the other 19,024*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Are those the notes to the amount of 13,000*l.* and 19,024*l.*?

Mr. Charlton.—They are numerous. I will look them over.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the notes you have lately had in your hand the notes which you paid Mr. Alexander Trotter, in consequence of the two drafts drawn by lord Melville, (then Mr. Dundas) payable to his act of parliament new account, and placed on the debit side of lord Melville's account with Mr. Coutts?

Mr. Charlton.—They are.

Then the following entry in Messieurs Coutts' waste book, referred to by the witness was, read:

Thursday 22nd May, 1800.

|             |                |                    |
|-------------|----------------|--------------------|
| 1000 — —    | 498            | Mr. Alex. Trotter. |
| 1000 — —    | 1581           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1889           | £. s. d.           |
| 1000 — —    | 1736           | 13,000 0 0         |
| 1000 — —    | 1613           | 19,024 12 6        |
| 1000 — —    | 128            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 781            | 32,024 12 6        |
| 1000 — —    | 40             |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 410            | Paid               |
| 1000 — —    | 1714           | Henry Dundas.      |
| 1000 — —    | 320            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1853           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1906           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 478            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1250           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1644           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1746           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 573            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 799            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 168            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1852           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1851           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1395           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 611            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 612            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 733            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 233            |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1696           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1989           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1988           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1987           |                    |
| 1000 — —    | 1960           |                    |
| 20 — —      | 6280           |                    |
| 4 — —       | 2-2            |                    |
| 12 6        | M <sup>o</sup> |                    |
| 32,024 12 6 |                |                    |

Mr. Plumer.—If the witness has the drafts, I wish they may be produced.

Mr. Whitbread.—Your lordship recollects that all the vouchers were delivered up to lord Melville.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish him to state, as well as he recollects, the import of those two drafts.

Mr. Whitbread.—Before that question is put, with submission to the Court, I should wish to ask, as they have had notice to produce those drafts, and we have proved that they were delivered up, whether they are not bound to produce those drafts, or show that they were destroyed, before they can put a question upon them.

Lord Chancellor.—Were those drafts and vouchers delivered up to lord Melville?

Mr. Whitbread.—Mr. Antrobus has proved that fact.

Mr. Plumer.—The honourable manager is under a mistake in supposing that we are bound to produce them. The non-production of them after they have given us notice, I do not dispute entitles them to give parol evidence of their contents, which they have done. All I wish is, that in speaking of their contents the witness would describe the contents of those drafts, as well as he can recollect.

Mr. Charlton.—I can only speak from the waste-book before me that those drafts were drawn. In the waste-book it is thus entered: "Mr. Alexander Trotter, 13,000*l*. The right honourable Henry Dundas 19,024*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. paid ditto; amounting to 32,024*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*."

Mr. Plumer.—Is that the whole entry?

Mr. Charlton.—That is the debit side.

Mr. Whitbread.—I apprehend it is in evidence before your lordships, from the entry read by Mr. Chapman, that these were drawn on the act of parliament new account; we have now shown by Mr. Charlton, that these drafts so drawn by lord Melville, the produce of them were paid in those specific Bank notes to Mr. Alexander Trotter; the Commons now intend to trace those notes to the Bank of England, and to show that they were paid into the Bank of England, and placed to the credit of that specific act of parliament new account.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish that the evidence of this gentleman, and what he knows, should be kept distinct from what has been proved by any other witness. I wish only to know whether the witness takes upon himself to speak respecting the drafts, on account of which those notes were paid. Is there any mention in the entry of any drafts? Can you speak of the drafts for which these notes were paid?

Mr. Charlton.—I cannot.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. John Taylor, was called in, and being sworn was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the Bank of England?

Mr. Taylor.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you a clerk in the Bank of England, previous to the month of May, 1800?

Mr. Taylor.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—As clerk of the Bank of England, did you ever receive in payment the cancelled Bank notes, now put into your hand?

Mr. Taylor.—Yes; I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—From whom did you receive those notes in payment?

Mr. Taylor.—I cannot tell.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what credit did you carry those notes?

Mr. Taylor.—To the account of the right honourable Henry Dundas; the act of parliament new account.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the amount of the notes in your hand?

Mr. Taylor.—19,024*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*.

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at this other parcel of notes. Did you, as a clerk of the Bank of England, receive also those notes?

Mr. Taylor.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what account did you carry the amount of those notes?

Mr. Taylor.—To the right honourable Henry Dundas' act of parliament account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that those were carried to the act of parliament new account also?

Mr. Taylor.—I think they are, but there is a bit stamped out of the note.

Mr. Whitbread.—When notes are cancelled, is there not a stamp driven through them, to prevent their being re-issued?

Mr. Taylor.—There is.

Lord Chancellor.—Notwithstanding that stamp, is it sufficiently legible for you to say that they are so?

Mr. Taylor.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the amount of the notes you now have in your hands?

Mr. Taylor.—13,000*l*.

Then Mr. John Taylor was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Upon what occasion is it, that you stamp pieces out of notes?

Mr. Taylor.—To cancel them, that they may not go out again, a hollow stamp is struck through them.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it the course, when bank-notes are paid into the Bank, on account of the act of parliament new account, for them to be immediately cancelled?

Mr. Taylor.—Yes, after being entered in the cash book.

Mr. Plumer.—If Bank-notes to the amount of many thousands, are paid into the Bank, it is the course, after being entered, that they should be cancelled?

Mr. Taylor.—Yes, always.

Mr. Plumer.—Then whether they are issued from the Exchequer or brought by the paymaster to any amount, as soon as they are brought, the practice is to enter and cancel them.

Mr. Taylor.—It is; come from where they will.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Henry Whiting was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the Bank of England?

Mr. Whiting.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you so in May 1800?

Mr. Whiting.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is any part of that book in your hand-writing?

Mr. Whiting.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that book?

Mr. Whiting.—It is the book of the right honourable Henry Dundas' act of parliament new account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there an entry of the 22nd of May, 1800, of 19,024*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Whiting.—There is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know in what manner that payment was made?

Mr. Whiting.—It mentions here, sundries, signifying bank-notes and other articles, I presume.

Mr. Whitbread.—We have proved that those Bank-notes were received at the Bank of England for that entry, and there was 12*s.* 6*d.* in fact in money. Turn to the next entry.

Mr. Whiting.—The next entry is 13,000*l.* Bank-notes paid to this account.

Mr. Whitbread.—In what effects?

Mr. Whiting.—In Bank-notes.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—We propose now to show, in order to follow this up, the entry in the Bank cash-book of these identical notes.

Then Mr. John Hadfield was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you a clerk in the Bank of England, in the month of May, 1800?

Mr. Hadfield.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the book that lies before you?

Mr. Hadfield.—A book called the cash-book, in which we keep the notes received from the different offices.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is any part of that book in your hand writing?

Mr. Hadfield.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether the entry now before you of the 22nd of May, 1800, is in your hand-writing?

Mr. Hadfield.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the 22nd of May, 1800; what sum do you find entered there?

Mr. Hadfield.—19,020*l.* to the credit of Henry Dundas.

Mr. Whitbread.—On what account?

Mr. Hadfield.—We do not take any notice of that in this book.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether, with the exception of 4*l.*, the notes just put into your hand correspond with the sum contained in that entry?

Mr. Hadfield.—They do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it the custom of the Bank of England to enter the one pound notes, in the entries such as you have described?

Mr. Hadfield.—Yes, but not in the same books.

Mr. Whitbread.—We cannot prove the entry of the four one pound Bank-notes, because the man who made the entry is unhappily in a state of mental derangement. Turn to an entry of the same day, and see if there is an entry of 13,000*l.*?

Mr. Hadfield.—There is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do the notes which you hold in your hand correspond with that entry, and were they paid on that account?

Mr. Hadfield.—They do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were those notes also carried to the account of the right honourable Henry Dundas?

Mr. Hadfield.—They were.

Then the following entries in the Bank cash-book, referred to by the witness, were read:

22nd May, 1800.

|               |                   |      |     |        |
|---------------|-------------------|------|-----|--------|
| 13,000 Dundas | Newland, 14th May | 1581 | ... | £.1000 |
|               | 8th               | 1889 | ... | 1000   |
|               | 15th              | 1736 | ... | 1000   |
|               | 14th              | 1613 | ... | 1000   |
|               | 9th               | 128  | ... | 1000   |
|               | 24th April        | 781  | ... | 1000   |
|               | 17th May          | 40   | ..  | 1000   |
|               | 30th April        | 410  | ... | 1000   |
|               | 15th May          | 1714 | ... | 1000   |
|               | 19th              | 320  | ... | 1000   |
|               | 15th              | 1853 | ... | 1000   |
|               | 16th              | 1806 | ... | 1000   |
|               | 10th              | 478  | ... | 1000   |

22nd of May, 1800.

|                |                     |      |     |       |
|----------------|---------------------|------|-----|-------|
| 19,020 Dundas. | Newland, 30th April | 6280 | ... | £. 20 |
|                | 14th May            | 1250 | ... | 1000  |
|                | —                   | 1644 | ... | 1000  |
|                | 8th                 | 1746 | ... | 1000  |
|                | 10th                | 573  | ..  | 1000  |
|                | 30th April          | 498  | ... | 1000  |
|                | 1st May             | 799  | ... | 1000  |
|                | 28th April          | 168  | ... | 1000  |
|                | 15th May            | 1852 | ... | 1000  |
|                | —                   | 1851 | ... | 1000  |
|                | 14th                | 1395 | ... | 1000  |
|                | 12th                | 611  | ... | 1000  |
|                | —                   | 612  | ..  | 1000  |
|                | 1st                 | 733  | ... | 1000  |
|                | 24th April          | 233  | ... | 1000  |
|                | 13th March          | 1696 | ... | 1000  |
|                | 8th May             | 1989 | ... | 1000  |
|                | —                   | 1988 | ... | 1000  |
|                | —                   | 1987 | ... | 1000  |
|                | —                   | 1960 | ... | 1000  |

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—We wish now to prove that Brabb, who made the entry of the four single pound notes, is in a state of mental derangement.

Then Mr. Thomas Rippon was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you acquainted with Mr. Brabb, formerly a clerk in the Bank?

Mr. Rippon.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know any thing of the state of Mr. Brabb's health?

Mr. Rippon.—From report I know he is at present in St. Luke's hospital.

Mr. Whitbread.—At what hour do payments cease at the Bank of England?

Mr. Rippon.—In regard to cash accounts, at five o'clock.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the book now in your hand?

Mr. Rippon.—It is the Bank book of the right honourable Henry Dundas' act of parliament new account for the year 1800.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to an entry of June the 2nd, 1800, and see whether the entry of 5,333*l.* is your own hand-writing?

Mr. Rippon.—It is; "1800, June 2nd, Henry Dundas, Old Account, 5,333*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—Does that entry purport that that sum was brought from Mr. Dundas's old account at the Bank to the new one?

Mr. Rippon.—It purports to be a draft from the old account to this account.

Mr. Whitbread.—By whom drawn?

Mr. Rippon.—This book does not show.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it a credit, carried from the old to the new account?

Mr. Rippon.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Whitbread.—We now propose to produce before your lordships a book which has been in evidence, and we wish to have read an entry on the 2nd of June, 1800, on the debit side of that account.

Then the following entry was read from a book, before delivered in, entitled "Old Account 1784.—1800, June 2nd, To myself, 5,333*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*"

Mr. Whitbread.—We will now show your lordships, that the public cash at the Bank was transferred by lord Melville to his successor on the 2nd of June, 1800. Do you find an entry in the right honourable Dudley Ryder's account at the Bank, as treasurer of the navy of a transfer to that account, from the right honorable Henry Dundas.

Mr. Rippon.—It appears by this book, by an entry dated the 2nd of June, 1800, that there was a draft from the right honourable Henry Dundas, act of parliament new account, 337,779*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Read from this book the debit to the right honorable Henry Dundas, to the same amount.

Mr. Rippon.—There appears in this book a debit on the 2nd of June, 1800, of the same sum as before, as a balance, transferred from the right honorable Henry Dundas, act of parliament new account, to the right honorable Dudley Ryder.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to a payment made on the 3rd of June.

Mr. Rippon.—By this book it appears, that on the 3rd of June, 1800, there is a credit of the right honorable Dudley Ryder, of 31,510*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* and also, on the 6th of the same month, a credit of 54,288*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Making the total balance transferred—how much?

Mr. Rippon.—The amount of the three sums I have read is, 423,578*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish to show your lordships, that that sum was actually paid out of Mr. Dundas's account, making the whole aggregate balance.—Look at the entry of the 6th of June, in that book.

Mr. Rippon.—Right honorable Henry Dundas, act of parliament new account. There are two dates in 1800. June the 6th, one by Ryder, 34,510*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* and another entry, 54,286*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—That makes up the whole transfer to Mr. Ryder.

Mr. Plumer.—I will take it now as it stood on the 6th of June, 1800. I wish to know whether that comprehended every shilling that was due from lord Melville to the public at that time, which was made over by lord Melville to his successor?

Mr. Rippon.—That appears to be the balance of the book at that time.

Mr. Whitbread.—19,000*l.* and 13,000*l.* were paid from the house of Messieurs Coutts, from a draft, as stated, into the Bank of England, and there was a transfer from lord Melville's old account to the new account of 5,333*l.* We now propose to show your lordships, that that balance, with the diminutions that had taken place between June, 1800, and July, 1805, remained in lord Melville's hands, and was paid to the Auditor's office in July, 1805.

Then Mr. William Chapman was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—This is lord Melville's signed account. Refer to an entry on the debit side of lord Melville's account, of the 27th of July, 1805, and read that entry.

Mr. Chapman.—July 27th, 1805, to the Exchequer, on account of your lordship's first treasurership of the navy, ending the 10th of April, 1783; imprest money received 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.*: bill money and porters, 3*s.* 6*d.* making together 5,111*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—Now we will show that this money was actually paid in, on lord Melville's account, at the Exchequer.

Then Mr. Bernard Cobbe was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the book you have before you?

Mr. Cobbe.—The book of account of the right honorable Henry Dundas,—lord Melville, first treasurership, navy and victualling account, 1783, and final.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does that contain the final account of lord Melville, as to his first treasurership?

Mr. Cobbe.—It does.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are those accounts signed and properly passed in that office?

Mr. Cobbe.—They are.

Mr. Whitbread.—Turn to an entry of the 27th of July, 1805, and read the entry in the discharge of lord Melville, as signed by himself, relative to the balance that was paid in.

Mr. Cobbe.—Balance remaining to be accounted for, amounts to the sum of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Does that form the final balance of the treasurership so paid in?

Mr. Cobbe.—It does.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know, of your own knowledge, the day on which this sum was paid in?

Mr. Cobbe.—I believe it was paid in on the 27th of July, 1805.

Then Mr. Bernard Cobbe was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—When was that account declared?

Mr. Cobbe.—It was declared in October, 1805.

Mr. Plumer.—When was it audited?

Mr. Cobbe.—In June, 1805.

Mr. Plumer.—Audited in June, and not declared till October, 1805?

Mr. Cobbe.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Is it usual to grant an accountant his quietus, until his account is declared?

Mr. Cobbe.—He cannot have his quietus until the account is declared.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the whole of the balance, due from lord Melville, paid by his lordship, even before the balance had been declared?

Mr. Cobbe.—It was.

Mr. Plumer.—Could that balance due from the ex-treasurership, have been paid in any where, prior to the settlement of these accounts?

Mr. Cobbe.—It sometimes happens that accountants pay in their acknowledged balance, what they acknowledge themselves, but that balance sometimes differs from the balance audited and declared.

Mr. Plumer.—But the balance actually due from the accountant, is not settled till the account is audited, is it?

Mr. Cobbe.—Certainly not.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish to know if the actual balance due upon that open account of lord Melville's first treasurership had ever been ascertained or audited prior to that time?

Mr. Cobbe.—No, it had not.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether prior to its being paid in, the balance that remains in the hand of an ex-treasurer is liable to any assignments that may be outstanding?

Mr. Cobbe.—It is generally conceived that the balance when paid in has no assignment upon it.

Mr. Plumer.—Prior to its being paid in, is the balance in the hands of the ex-treasurer subject to any assignment that may be upon that balance?

Mr. Cobbe.—That I cannot say.

Then the account was delivered in, and is as follows:

GENERAL STATE of the ACCOUNT of the Right Honourable HENRY Viscount MELVILLE, Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy and the Victualling thereof, from the 1st Day of January to the 10th Day of April 1783, (when he quitted that Office) and of Money received and paid by him from that time to the 31st Day of December, 1804; viz.

| THE CHARGE.                                                                    | £.        | s. | d. |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------|----|----|
| To Balance remaining in this Accountant's Hands, the 31st December, 1782 ..... | 945,275   | 19 | 5½ |
| Received from the Exchequer .....                                              | 1,517,164 | 6  | 6  |
| Received on Account of the Navy.....                                           | 672,684   | 8  | 10 |
| Received on Account of the Victualling .....                                   | 242,674   | 10 | 8½ |
|                                                                                | 3,377,799 | 5  | 6½ |

| THE DISCHARGE.                                                                                                                                       | £.        | s. | d. |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------|----|----|
| By paid on Account of the Navy .....                                                                                                                 | 2,597,479 | 10 | 8  |
| Paid on Account of the Victualling .....                                                                                                             | 775,208   | 12 | 1¼ |
|                                                                                                                                                      | 3,372,688 | 2  | 9½ |
| Balance remaining to be accounted for, amounts to the Sum of Five Thousand One Hundred and Eleven Pounds Two Shillings and Nine-pence Farthing ..... | 5,111     | 2  | 9½ |
|                                                                                                                                                      | 3,377,799 | 5  | 6½ |

The Right Honorable HENRY Viscount MELVILLE, late Treasurer of His Majesty's Navy, declares upon his Honor, the above Account to be just and true, to the best of his Knowledge and Belief.

MELVILLE.

Before AR. MACDONALD, Chief Baron, the Thirtieth Day of January, 1805.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—For the sake of regularity I believe it will be necessary that the sums and numbers of the Bank-notes which have been put in should be entered upon your lordships' minutes; we put them in for that purpose.—Here we leave this part of the case, and the Commons proceed to the proof of the advance made for the purchasing India stock; meaning hereafter to resume the evidence as to the 2,000*l.* India stock, and 1,000*l.* India stock; the 2,000*l.* which appears according to the evidence to be at present in the hands of lord Melville, and 1,000*l.* sold in May, 1800.

Then Coutts Trotter, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—Having stated that you had a conversation with lord Melville, from which you collected that his lordship intended to borrow 13,000*l.* but that from certain circumstances which have occurred since that time, you take it only to have been intended to have borrowed 10,000*l.* State any circumstance which has occurred since that time, to alter any recollection you before expressed upon that subject.

Mr. C. Trotter.—The difference as to the sum to which I alluded was, that I in the first instance conceived it to have been a loan of 13,000*l.*, till upon an examination before the honourable managers, an inquiry was made of me, whether it was not originally 10,000*l.*, and that circumstance brought it to my recollection that it might have been so, although I cannot positively say that it was.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Your lordships will recollect, Mr. Trotter stated that lord Melville had been desirous of becoming the possessor of some India stock, and that he had directed him to make a purchase of India stock. Your lordships will also recollect, Mr. Trotter stated, that he had directed India stock to be purchased. The Commons now propose to prove to your lordships the purchase of that India stock, to the amount of 12,000*l.* They will prove that by Mr. Antrobus, the person who purchased it; they will prove it continued in the name of Mr. Antrobus, from the time when it was first purchased in 1790 to 1791; that in the year 1791, that 12,000*l.* was transferred from the name of Mr. Antrobus to the name of Mr. Montague Lind; that it continued in his name some short time, and was then transferred to a brother of Mr. Montague Lind of the name of Francis Lind, in whose name it continued for a few weeks only.

Mr. Montague Lind is dead, but we shall call Mr. Francis Lind, and he will state that he was merely trustee of that stock; that it was by him conveyed back to Mr. Montague Lind, and from him to Mr. Coutts; by Mr. Coutts it was sold, and the proceeds of that stock amounting to 28,333*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* together with 4,410*l.* the proceeds of the 7,000*l.* 3 per cents of which your lordships have also had evidence, amounting altogether to 32,743*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* were paid to lord Melville, and by lord Melville paid into the Bank of England, in the year 1800, in discharge of a part of the 50,000*l.* which your lordships have also in evidence he then stood indebted to the public. I propose to call Mr. Philip Antrobus.

Then Philip Antrobus, esquire, was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Are you a stock-broker?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—I am.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Did you, on the 27th of August, 1789, purchase for Mr. Alexander Trotter any India stock?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—In August 1789, I bought 6,000*l.* East India stock, by order of Messieurs Coutts and Company.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—In whose name was that stock purchased and placed?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—In my own name.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Did you, on the 27th of May 1790, purchase any more India stock by the order of Messieurs Coutts and Company?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—Upon the 27th of May, I purchased 6,000*l.* more India stock.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—In whose name was that stock placed?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—In my own name.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—What was the cost of the two, the 6,000*l.* and the 6,000*l.* India stock?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—The first 6,000*l.* was 10,507*l.* 10*s.*—the second 6,000*l.* was 9,302*l.* 10*s.*

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does that make together 19,810*l.*?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—It does.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Did you give Mr. Trotter any memorandum on account of this stock?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—I did.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—What was that memorandum?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—It was acknowledging that I held the stock, in trust, for Mr. Trotter, and that I engaged to transfer it upon demand.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—To whom did you pay the dividends arising upon this stock?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—To Mr. Trotter, or upon his account, at his banker's.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you know when you transferred this stock?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—About a twelvemonth from the last purchase, I think.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—To whom was it transferred?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—To Mr. Montague Lind. Then Philip Antrobus, esquire, was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Do you speak of this being transferred to Mr. Montague Lind, from your own recollection of it?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—In about a twelvemonth after the original purchase?

Mr. P. Antrobus.—About a twelvemonth after the last purchase.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. John Hatfield Kennedy was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Are you a clerk in the Transfer-office, in the India-house?

Mr. Kennedy.—I am.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Look at that account --- is that a copy of the East-India Company's transfer ledger?

Mr. Kennedy.—It is.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Read an entry of the 1st of June, of a transfer of 12,000*l.* by Mr. Antrobus to Mr. Lind.

Mr. Kennedy.—"1st of June 1791, by Philip Antrobus 12,000*l.*"

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does it appear there to whose credit it is transferred?

Mr. Kennedy.—It does not appear here.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does it appear from what lies before you, that there was the sum of 12,000*l.* transferred from Mr. Antrobus?

Mr. Kennedy.—There was a transfer on the 1st of June, 1791, from Mr. Philip Antrobus to Mr. Montague Lind, of 12,000*l.*

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Look at the same paper, and see if 1,000*l.* does not appear to be transferred from Mr. Montague Lind to the right honourable Henry Dundas?

Mr. Kennedy.—On the 23rd of February 1791, there appears to be 1,000*l.* transferred to the right honourable Henry Dundas.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does that 1,000*l.* appear to be transferred from this particular stock of Mr. Montague Lind?

Mr. Kennedy.—It does not appear from what particular account, except from Mr. Montague Lind.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Is there any other stock from which it could be transferred in the name of Montague Lind?

Mr. Kennedy.—Not on that day.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Then must it not be transferred from that stock?

Mr. Kennedy.—Yes, it appears to be part of the 12,000*l.* that stood in the name of Montague Lind.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—That reduces the 12,000*l.* to 11,000*l.*—I now propose to read another entry, showing the transfer of that 11,000*l.* from Montague Lind to Francis Lind.—Turn to an entry of the 17th January 1793?

Mr. Kennedy.—On that day there appears to be a transfer of 11,000*l.* to Francis Lind from Montague Lind.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—I am now about to show that the 11,000*l.* with 2,000*l.* was transferred back again from Francis Lind to Montague Lind on the 29th January, 1793.

Look at that paper, is that an examined copy of the transfer book of the India company?

Mr. Kennedy.—Of the ledger of the East India company.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Turn to an entry of the 29th of January, 1793.

Mr. Kennedy.—On that day there appears to be a transfer of 13,000*l.* from the name of Francis Lind to Montague Lind.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Sergeant Best.—I now propose to call Mr. Francis Lind, to show that he only held the stock in trust.

Then Mr. Francis Lind was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Was the 13,000*l.* stock, which appears to have stood in your name, your own property, or did you only stand as a trustee?

Mr. Lind.—To the best of my knowledge and belief, I never was told to whom this stock belonged.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Had you any property in that stock yourself?

Mr. Lind.—Not in the least.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you know at whose disposal you held that stock?

Mr. Lind.—I do not know.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you know any thing of a transfer back again from you of that stock, that was standing in your name?

Mr. Lind.—I have not the least recollection of the circumstance.

A Lord.—This stock was transferred from the name of Montague Lind to your name, were you at that time made acquainted with that transaction?

Mr. Lind.—To the best of my knowledge I was not.

A Lord.—When did you first learn that the transfer had been made from the name of Montague Lind to your own name?

Mr. Lind.—I have but a faint recollection of the circumstance; to the best of my remembrance, I either met my brother at the India-house or accompanied him there. He told me he was going to make a transfer of India stock; I asked him on what account; he said, merely to disqualify himself, not to be plagued with candidates at the election.—I said, I am similarly circumstanced, and I am plagued, why should not you?—He said, because it is not my own stock, but he never informed me, to the best of my belief, to whom the stock belonged, and I never asked him the question.

A Lord.—When you transferred the stock out of your own name, back again to Montague Lind, upon whose application did you do so?

Mr. Lind.—I had really no recollection of the circumstance; till this account was produced to me I did not recollect any part of the subject.—Had I conceived it would ever be the subject of investigation I should certainly have endeavoured to impress the recollection of it upon my mind.

A Lord.—Did you go in person to transfer it?

Mr. Lind.—I must of course, if I did transfer it; but I do not recollect that I did.

A Lord.—Have you any knowledge whatever who was the owner of the stock for whom you held it in trust?

Mr. Lind.—No knowledge whatever.

A Lord.—But you know it was not your brother?

Mr. Lind.—Yes, perfectly so. I mean, I do not know that it was my brother's.

A Lord.—Do you know any thing at all about who was the owner of the stock, except from the conversation you stated you had with your brother, Montague Lind?

Mr. Lind.—No other; and he did not then tell me to whom the stock belonged.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. John Hatfield Kennedy was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Turn to an entry on the first December, 1795?

Mr. Kennedy.—There appears to be a transfer from the name of Montague Lind, of 13,500*l.* to Thomas Coutts and Company.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Now turn to an entry of the 26th of February, 1801.

Mr. Kennedy.—There appears to be a transfer from the names of Thomas Coutts, Edmund Antrobus, and Coutts Trotter, esquires, of 5,500*l.* to the name of Eliezer Philip Solomons.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Turn to the 25th of November, 1802.

Mr. Kennedy.—There appears a transfer of 8,000*l.* from the same account to Mark Sprot.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does not that close the account of 13,500*l.*?

Mr. Kennedy.—It makes up the amount.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Edmund Antrobus, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Turn to Mr. Trotter's signed account of the 21st of May, 1800.

Mr. E. Antrobus.—"May 21st, 1800, of Mark Sprot, esquire, the produce of 13,500*l.* India stock, 28,333*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*—to 7,000*l.* reduced annuities 4,410*l.* sold by him, and transferred by us from our names."—But this alludes only to the 7,000*l.* the reduced being transferred.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Whether those two sums, 28,333*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* and 4,410*l.* make 32,743*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—They do.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Turn now to the debit side of the same account to the 22nd of May. Do you see from thence how this money was disposed of?

VOL. XXIX.

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I cannot.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you find there a sum of 20,000*l.*?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I do not find any such sum.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you find a sum of 12,743*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Not of that date.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you find any such sum upon the 24th of May?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Yes, 12,743*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Sergeant Best.—To whom is that sum entered?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—To the right honourable Henry Dundas.

Mr. Plumer.—Did both these stocks stand in the name of you and your partners?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The India stock stood in the name of Mr. Coutts, myself, and Mr. Coutts Trotter; the 7,000*l.* reduced, stood in Mr. Coutts's own name.

Mr. Plumer.—Did these several stocks, or either of them, belong to the house of Mr. Coutts? or were they trustees, and for whom?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The stock certainly did not belong to us, or to any of the partners; but it belonged to Mr. Alexander Trotter.

Mr. Plumer.—Was he credited by your house with the dividends?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—He was.

Mr. Plumer.—Were those stocks under his control?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Yes, absolutely.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know of any other stocks that were also under the control of Mr. Alexander Trotter. Did not the 10,000*l.* loyalty loan stand in the same predicament?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The 10,000*l.* loyalty loan stood in the name of Mr. Henry Dundas; we had an order from Mr. Trotter, to sell the stock, and to hold it at the disposal of Mr. Trotter.

Mr. Plumer.—At what time?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I must request permission to look at the order itself. (The witness referred to the order.) This order is dated 28th September, 1797.

The same was read, and is as follows:

"Messrs. Thomas Coutts and co. I have executed powers of attorney in your favour, to enable you to receive the dividends, and likewise for the sale of consolidated 3 per cents, reduced 3 per cents, and 5 per cents, 1797, standing in my name at the Bank; also for my India stock: and I desire that the dividends you will from time to time receive on these funds, may be placed to the credit of Alexander Trotter's account; and that you will take any directions he may at any time give respecting the sale of all, or any part, of those stocks, and apply the produce in any manner he may direct, for which this is your authority.

"HENRY DUNDAS.

"Somerset place, 28th September, 1797."

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know what is the amount of the stocks, referred to in that order?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I cannot speak from recollection.

Mr. Plumer.—Can you, by reference to any books, ascertain that fact? Are those the same stocks, for the dividends on which you gave credit to lord Melville?

Mr. Sergeant Best.—It has been proved by Mr. Trotter, that lord Melville had credit for the dividends upon all these stocks.

Mr. Plumer.—Perhaps by referring to Mr. Trotter's account, you may be able to state what these stocks were?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—I cannot by referring to any book whatever tell, as the sums are not particularly expressed; but I can see the sums of both stocks that stood in lord Melville's name, the credit of which we placed to Mr. Trotter's order; but the sums are not stated.

Mr. Plumer.—Were the dividends, subsequent to the time of that order, carried to the credit of Mr. Alexander Trotter?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—They were.

Mr. Plumer.—By referring to that account of Mr. Trotter's, you would be able to state what the dividends were, and, of course, what the stocks were?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—There appears to have been carried to the credit of Mr. Trotter's account a dividend upon 8,433*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* reduced 3 per cents, in Mr. Dundas's name,—upon 11,250*l.* 5 per cents, 1797, in Mr. Dundas's name.—and 3,566*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* consols in Mr. Dundas's name. The dividend upon 1,000*l.* India stock, I think, we must have placed to Mr. Dundas's own account.

Mr. Plumer.—Turn to an entry in Mr. Trotter's account of January 1798. To whose credit are the dividends upon the India stock carried?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—There are two sums of India stock in Mr. Trotter's account that day; the Christmas dividend upon 6,680*l.* India stock, which from an entry I conclude stood in the name of Alexander Trotter, and a similar dividend upon 13,500*l.* which stood in the name of Mr. Coutts, myself, and Mr. Coutts Trotter.

Mr. Plumer.—To whose credit are the dividends of both those carried?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—To Mr. Alexander Trotter's.

Mr. Plumer.—Read the next entry on the same day?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The Christmas dividend on 4,178*l.* 7*s.* India stock, in the right honourable Henry Dundas's name, is also carried to the credit of Mr. Alexander Trotter.

Mr. Plumer.—Was there, to your knowledge or belief, any other stock belonging to lord Melville?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—There was not.

Mr. Plumer.—Were the dividends of all those carried to the account and credit of Mr. Trotter?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—The dividends of all those were carried to the account of Mr. Trotter. I do not know whether it would not be proper for me to state here, in explanation of what I have just said, with regard to the whole of this stock, that I have, since this matter became a subject of public investigation, reflected a good deal upon it, and have some recollection that Mr. Trotter once told me that the capital of this India stock—

Mr. Plumer.—Any thing that Mr. Trotter told the witness is not evidence, certainly.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Francis Lind was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—Did any dividend become payable upon this 13,000*l.* stock, whilst the stock stood in your name?

Mr. Lind.—It appears, by the account, that the re-transfer was made in the course of a very few days after the transfer.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know any thing about the stock?

Mr. Lind.—I do not.

Lord Chancellor.—Was there any dividend that you know any thing about while it stood in your name?

Mr. Lind.—Not any.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Sergeant Best.—It appears by the books it stood only twelve days in Mr. Lind's name. Your lordships find, by the evidence, that the proceeds of these two sums amount to 32,743*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* Your lordships recollect that Mr. Trotter stated that 20,000*l.* part of 23,000*l.* with which it was first purchased, was taken by himself; the remainder of that sum I propose to prove was drawn out by a draft of Mr. Trotter's, on the house of Messieurs Coutts, in which we have proved it to have been deposited, and that it was paid in to the account of lord Melville, at the Bank, in the year 1800.

Then Mr. William Charlton was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—You have told us you are a clerk at Messieurs Coutts and company.—What book is that you have in your hand?

Mr. Charlton.—The waste book.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Turn to an entry of the 24th of May, 1800.

Mr. Charlton.—I have it before me.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—What do you find entered there?

Mr. Charlton.—12,743*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does it appear by the book, whether that was paid to a draft of Mr. Trotter's on that day?

Mr. Charlton.—It was on the 24th of May.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Have you any account of the Bank notes, with which that draft was paid?

Mr. Charlton.—Yes.

Then several cancelled Bank notes of the following numbers, dates, and sums, were shown the witness:

|            |                    |        |
|------------|--------------------|--------|
| No. 1993.— | 8th May, 1800..... | £.1000 |
| 1673.—     | 14th —————         | 1000   |
| 1592.—     | 7th —————          | 1000   |
| 1490.—     | 14th —————         | 1000   |
| 1491.—     | 14th —————         | 1000   |
| 364.—      | 10th April .....   | 1000   |
| 178.—      | 17th May.....      | 1000   |
| 179.—      | 17th —————         | 1000   |
| 180.—      | 17th —————         | 1000   |
| 533.—      | 20th —————         | 1000   |
| 534.—      | 20th —————         | 1000   |
| 1839.—     | 8th —————          | 1000   |
| 1326.—     | 19th —————         | 500    |
| 9.—        | 17th —————         | 200    |
| 5052.—     | 1st —————          | 40     |
| 4749.—     | 24th April .....   | 2      |
| 15581.—    | 26th —————         | 1      |

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Have you the Bank notes in your hand, with which that payment was made?

Mr. Charlton.—I will examine them, with your lordships, leave (the witness examined the notes), I believe they are.

Then the following entry in the waste book of Messieurs Coutts and company, referred to by the witness, was read:

| Saturday, 24th May, 1800. |   |   |                |                 |
|---------------------------|---|---|----------------|-----------------|
| 1000                      | — | — | 1673           | Mr. Spry.       |
| 1000                      | — | — | 1592           |                 |
| 1000                      | — | — | 1490           | £. s. d.        |
| 1000                      | — | — | 1491           |                 |
| 1000                      | — | — | 1993           | 12,743 2 6 Paid |
| 1000                      | — | — | 364            | Alex. Trotter.  |
| 1000                      | — | — | 178            |                 |
| 1000                      | — | — | 179            |                 |
| 1000                      | — | — | 180            |                 |
| 1000                      | — | — | 533            |                 |
| 1000                      | — | — | 534            |                 |
| 1000                      | — | — | 1839           |                 |
| 500                       | — | — | 1326           |                 |
| 200                       | — | — | 9              |                 |
| 40                        | — | — | 5052           |                 |
| 3                         | — | — | 1 & 2          |                 |
|                           | 2 | 6 | M <sup>o</sup> |                 |
| 12,743                    | 2 | 6 |                |                 |

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Now I propose to call a witness from the Bank, to prove the Bank notes were paid into the Bank, on lord Melville's account.

Then Mr. John Lincoln was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Are you a clerk in the Bank?

Mr. Lincoln.—Yes, I am.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Look at these Bank-notes; do you know when, and on whose account these Bank-notes were paid into the Bank?

Mr. Lincoln.—They were paid into the Bank, on the account of Mr. Dundas, act of parliament new account.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—When were they paid in?

Mr. Lincoln.—On the 24th of May, 1800.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Edmund Antrobus, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

A Lord.—You have said that you had directions from lord Melville, to receive the instructions of Mr. Trotter, relative to the stocks. Had you any directions from Mr. Trotter, within the scope of that authority?

Mr. E. Antrobus.—Certainly not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. John Hatfield Kennedy was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.—What paper is that you have in your hand?

Mr. Kennedy.—A copy from the stock ledger, of the East India company, of the account of the right honourable Henry Dundas, now lord viscount Melville.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you find there any stock in the name of lord Melville?

Mr. Kennedy.—I do; there appears to be 1000*l.* from the account of Montague Lind, on the 23rd of August, 1791; 2,000*l.* from the account of sir George Richardson, deceased, the 4th of September, 1792—

Mr. Plumer.—I beg the witness may read the whole of that entry.

Mr. Kennedy.—“1,000*l.* on the 23rd of August, 1791, from Montague Lind, to lord Melville; 2,000*l.* on the 4th of September, 1792, from sir George Richardson, deceased.”

Then the account was delivered in, and is as follows:

"EAST INDIA STOCK.

The Right Honourable HENRY DUNDAS, Melville Castle, North Britain, now Baron of DUNIRA, and Viscount MELVILLE of Melville Castle, in the County of Edinburgh.

|           |                           |       |    |    |
|-----------|---------------------------|-------|----|----|
| 1793.     | Dr.                       | £.    | s. | d. |
| April 18. | To Charles De St. Leu ... | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| 1794.     |                           |       |    |    |
| Jan. 28.  | To Mark Sprot .....       | 450   | 0  | 0  |
| Dec. 4.   | To ditto .....            | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| 1800.     |                           |       |    |    |
| May 20.   | To James Barnett .....    | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| July      | To Balance .....          | 3,178 | 7  | 0  |
|           |                           | <hr/> |    |    |
|           |                           | 6,628 | 7  | 0  |

|          | Cr.                                         | £.    | s. | d. |
|----------|---------------------------------------------|-------|----|----|
| 1791.    |                                             |       |    |    |
| Aug. 23. | By Montague Lind .....                      | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
| 1792.    |                                             |       |    |    |
| Sept. 4. | By Sir George Richardson,deceased ..... | 2,000 | 0  | 0  |
| 1793.    |                                             |       |    |    |
| Dec. 3.  | By Scrip .....                              | 450   | 0  | 0  |
| 1795.    |                                             |       |    |    |
| Feb. 3.  | By Abraham Lalande .....                    | 2,000 | 0  | 0  |
|          | By John Beardmore .....                     | 178   | 7  | 0  |
| 1797.    |                                             |       |    |    |
| July 22. | By Alexander Trotter.....                   | 1,000 | 0  | 0  |
|          |                                             | <hr/> |    |    |
|          |                                             | 6,628 | 7  | 0  |

ACCOUNT of DIVIDENDS on the above.

| When due.                                                  | By whom received.  |
|------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------|
| From 5th January 1792 to January 1794, both inclusive..... | ROBERT DUNDAS.     |
| 5th July 1794 to 5th July 1797, ditto .....                | ALEXANDER TROTTER. |
| 5th January 1798 to 5th July 1800, ditto .....             | EDMUND ANTROBUS.   |

East India House, the 29th January, 1806.

J. H. KENNEDY, Assistant Transfer Accountant."

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—I presume the account will be entered in the evidence?

Mr. Sergeant Best.—We particularly desire that it may be.—The Commons conceive they have now proved, that 13,500*l.* India stock, was purchased by Mr. Trotter, for lord Melville, with the public money; that the sum of 11,250*l.* for the loyalty loan, was paid for lord Melville, with the public money; that 7,000*l.* three per cent reduced annuities, were purchased for lord Melville, with the public money. They conceive they have further proved the sum of 4,000*l.* paid into the Bank of Scotland, on lord Melville's account; and also the sum of 5,333*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* The Commons now propose to prove, by a calculation, the amount of the interest which lord Melville has saved, applying particularly to those sums which are paid into the Bank of Scotland, upon which your lordships have it in evidence, he, lord Melville, would have been charged with interest; and also the dividends he has received; they amount to 21,571*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* which lord Melville has derived from the use of the public money, which the managers have traced into his hand, upon these stocks.

Then Joseph Kaye, esq., was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows :

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Have you made any calculation, as to the profit made upon the different sums which have just been mentioned?

Mr. Kaye.—I have.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does the paper that you hold in your hand contain those calculations?

Mr. Kaye.—It does.

Mr. Plumer.—Do your lordships think that this is a proper subject of evidence? Matters of calculation by the solicitor for the prosecution, upon the data in evidence, which all your lordships are competent to make for yourselves? It is no account ever entered into; it is drawing into the shape of evidence, opinions delivered by the solicitor for the prosecution, summing up his results, and giving his opinion in evidence, respecting the figures that have been before proved. Surely that is not a proper subject of proof; it is no fact, no account; it is a calculation made by the witness, and it is only for the purpose of prejudice, and to have put upon the minutes, that, which, if it be proper to be done, every one of your lordships may do for yourselves.

Mr. Adam.—I conceive this to be by no means admissible evidence. In the first place, the learned manager states, as an assumption of his, that here are certain matters proved; my lords, I say, therefore, that the data are assumed in the first instance. If the data be assumed, it is impossible for your lordships to receive any calculation upon those assumed data as evidence. In the next place, even if the data were not assumed, I conceive this is not evidence, but that it is observation. I take it the proper time will come, when the manager who shall be fixed upon to sum up, and observe upon the evidence, that has been given to your lordships, will have an opportunity of stating those observations, which are results of evidence. But to call a person to prove upon his oath, the result of calculations upon assumed data, is attempting to sum up the evidence upon oath, instead of leaving it to that sort of observation which will come in its proper place, when the managers shall be heard in the summing up this evidence; and therefore, I am sure your lordships will not think it right, that even this assembly should be allowed to hear calculations upon oath, where the data is assumed, and the calculations are not matter of evidence, but merely of observation.

A Lord.—I submit to your lordships, that the data stand where they did; they must stand or fall by the proof. There is nothing more common than to put to a witness, provided such and such a sum has been received—what is the amount of interest, and it is merely casting upon the witness, the labour of doing that, which all the lords might do with a pen themselves; but which is done through the medium of the witness, in a more compendious manner; the data and facts stand as they did, it is a mere hypothetical question to the witness.—If the fact stands so and so, what is the arithmetical result?

Lord Chancellor.—I take it to assume no facts whatever: it proceeds on certain data. If you take away the foundation upon which it is made, which is matter for the Court afterwards, there is an end of the superstructure.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Is that calculation, which you hold in your hand, a correct calculation upon these sums?

Mr. Kaye.—It is as correct as I can make it. I believe every figure will be found right.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—It may save your lordships' time, if this should be read and delivered in.

Lord Chancellor.—Have you any objection to that, Mr. Plumer?

Mr. Plumer.—None at all; I wish to ask a question, or two.

Then Joseph Kaye, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—When did you make these calculations?

Mr. Kaye.—I believe I made the last correction in them yesterday.

Mr. Plumer.—When did you begin to make these calculations?

Mr. Kaye.—I cannot state the precise day; it was since the trial began; one day last week, I think.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you make them all yourself, or were you assisted by any body?

Mr. Kaye.—I made them all myself.

Mr. Plumer.—From what did you take the data?

Mr. Kaye.—I must state the items, in order to answer that question. The first item is 13,500*l.* India stock; I took that from the data of the credit in the signed accounts in these books of Messieurs Coutts and company, to the day that was carried to the credit of Mr. Trotter, as has appeared in evidence.

Lord Chancellor.—All the witness has done, is to establish, by calculation, that such a stock, from such a time, will produce so much. He does not himself prove any fact, and the calculations he has made must therefore depend upon the facts which are proved by others.

Mr. Plumer.—Does that document contain all the data upon which the calculation is made?

Mr. Kaye.—Yes, the learned counsel may refer to every document that has been given in evidence. The entries of the books have been given in evidence, from which I have taken this account.

Mr. Plumer.—You are solicitor for the managers for the House of Commons?

Mr. Kaye.—I am.

Mr. Plumer.—And likewise for the Bank?

Mr. Kaye.—I am.

A Lord.—How often have you found it necessary to make any alteration in your calculations?

Mr. Kaye.—Only once; I put the whole 14,500*l.* India stock together, and as they have been disposed of separately, I have divided them, so as to make it more intelligible; and also the two sums that was paid into the house of sir William Forbes and company, and Mansfield and company, I had put them in one sum; I have since taken them separately, so as to form the interest fractionally.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether, in the statement of the total, there is included the difference between the prime cost of the India stock, and its ultimate proceeds?

Mr. Kaye.—There is.

Mr. Plumer.—Does that comprehend part of what you carry to lord Melville's debit?

Mr. Kaye.—It does.

Mr. Plumer.—Is there any credit given in this account for the interest paid to Mr. Trotter, from year to year, for the loan of this money?

Mr. Kaye.—There is the whole interest of the 23,000*l.* for the whole period. Eleven thousand odd hundred pounds I think.

Mr. Plumer.—Does this include not barely an account of interest, but likewise the gain by the difference in the value of the stock when it was bought, and of the stock when it was sold?

Mr. Kaye.—It does; it contains the profits on the stock, both the India stock, the 7,000*l.* reduced, and the loyalty.

Mr. Plumer.—By profits, I understand you to mean the difference in what it produced ultimately when sold, not the annual profits?

Mr. Kaye.—No, not the annual profits; for example, the loyalty stock cost 10,000*l.* it sold for 10,757*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* then I considered the 757*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* as profit.

Mr. Plumer.—And in the India stock there is 7,000*l.* or 8,000*l.* debited, as the difference between its original cost and final sale?

Mr. Kaye.—I have taken the difference certainly—I have stated it in this way—the 13,500*l.* stock is credited in May 1800, at 28,339*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*—the 1,000*l.* which stood in lord Melville's name, which was transferred in 1791, was sold and credited in his account with Coutts for 2098*l.* 15*s.* that makes 14,500*l.* India stock 30,431*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*—Then I have taken the dividends upon the two first years which is eight per cent, the dividends upon the last eight years were at ten guineas per cent, that would make a total of 44,931*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*—Then I have deducted from that the 23,000*l.* which it is stated to have cost, and the interest on that 23,000*l.* for the ten years, in the same way as I have debited the dividends for ten years, which amounts together to 34,500*l.* so that the profits upon the India stock, and the excess of the dividends above the interest, would amount to 10,431*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—Then upon the India stock alone there arises a profit according to your calculation of about 10,000*l.*

Mr. Kaye.—Yes, the profit and excess of dividends above the interest.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Does this account include the 10,600*l.* on the Chest account?

Mr. Kaye.—No, here is nothing here upon the Chest account—nothing but the loyalty.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons having now shown the progress of this 13,500*l.* India stock, and the payments made by Mr. Alexander Trotter, in consequence of the proceeds of that stock, into the Bank on lord Melville's account (the act of parliament new account), they now wish to show that 1,000*l.* of the whole sum which was bought, was transferred to lord Melville personally: which 1,000*l.* was sold at the time, and the credit of that given to lord Melville's account, as making up from the bank of Messieurs Coutts part of his act of parliament account; they now wish to show that this 13,500*l.* was not in fact sold, but was pledged for the value of the stock at the day, and for this purpose they wish to call Mr. Coutts Trotter again.

A Lord.—Before Mr. Trotter is called, I wish to suggest whether this paper should be entered on your lordships' minutes; if it should turn out that there is no foundation for these facts, it will have an improper effect, by having been entered.

Another Lord.—All the inconvenience that might result from this entry, would be obviated by stating, that if it is proved, or shall be proved, that such and such facts exist, that is the calculation of the profits; but that will not be an admission of the facts.

A Lord.—I submit, whether it is not proper to ask the witness on what suppositions he makes these calculations.

On what suppositions, or admissions, do you make these calculations which you have given to the court?

Mr. Kaye.—The first item of 13,500*l.* India stock I have taken at the value which was paid into Mr. Trotter's account.

A Lord.—Is not the foundation of your making these calculations, a supposition that these are the facts?

Mr. Kaye.—Yes.

A Lord.—Read the title.

Mr. Kaye.—"A statement of the profits made by investments in the funds, on account of lord Melville, and by advances made for interest of money." Then on the 21st May, 1800, I credit the account for the 13,500*l.* India stock, the sum paid into Mr. Trotter's account at Coutts's by Mr. Sprot. The remaining India stock I have taken at the amount at which Messieurs Coutts credited his lordship in the account signed by his lordship. Then the loyalty 5 per cent stock, I have taken as having cost 10,000*l.*, as paid by Messieurs Coutts; supposing it to have cost that sum, and to have produced 11,250*l.* Then I have taken the 7,000*l.* three per cents annuities, at the sum which they cost in June 1797, when they were purchased.

A Lord.—I submit that this might be all set right, if the honourable manager would put one question to the witness. Supposing such and such facts to have been proved, is that the calculation?

Another Lord.—Is that calculation formed on the assumption by you, that all the facts stated in that paper are proved?

Mr. Kaye.—Most certainly.

A Lord.—Is not one of the assumptions, on which that calculation was made, that the India stock was sold at a profit?

Mr. Kaye.—Yes, because that sum of money was paid in as the value of the stock on that day, at the time of closing lord Melville's account, and therefore I take it upon that assumption.

The paper was delivered in, and is as follows:

|                                                                                                                 | £.       | s. | d. | £.     | s. | d.          |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------|----|----|--------|----|-------------|
| £.13,500 India Stock, in May 1800 .....                                                                         | £.28,333 | 2  | 6  |        |    |             |
| £.1,000 sold for .....                                                                                          | 2,098    | 15 | 0  |        |    |             |
|                                                                                                                 |          |    |    | 30,431 | 17 | 6           |
| Dividends, for Two Years, at 8 per Cent is .....                                                                | £. 2,320 | 0  | 0  |        |    |             |
| Dividends for Eight Years, at £.10 10 per Cent is .....                                                         | 12,180   | 0  | 0  |        |    |             |
|                                                                                                                 |          |    |    | 14,500 | 0  | 0           |
| Stock cost .....                                                                                                | £.23,000 | 0  | 0  | 44,931 | 17 | 6           |
| Interest thereon for Ten Years at 5 per Cent is .....                                                           | 11,500   | 0  | 0  | 34,500 | 0  | 0           |
| Net Profit on India Stock.....                                                                                  |          |    |    |        |    | 10,431 17 6 |
| £.11,250 Loyalty sold in May 1800, for.....                                                                     |          |    |    | 10,757 | 16 | 3           |
| Add Three and a Half Year's Dividend .....                                                                      |          |    |    | 1,968  | 15 | 0           |
|                                                                                                                 |          |    |    | 12,726 | 11 | 3           |
| This Stock cost in 1797 .....                                                                                   |          |    |    | 10,000 | 0  | 0           |
| Net Profit on the Loyalty Loan .....                                                                            |          |    |    |        |    | 2,726 11 3  |
| £.7,000 3 per Cent Reduced Annuities, sold in May 1800, for.....                                                |          |    |    | 4,410  | 0  | 0           |
| Add Three Years' Dividends .....                                                                                |          |    |    | 630    | 0  | 0           |
|                                                                                                                 |          |    |    | 5,040  | 0  | 0           |
| This Stock cost in June 1797 .....                                                                              |          |    |    | 3,543  | 15 | 0           |
| Net Profit on the 3 per Cent Reduced .....                                                                      |          |    |    |        |    | 1,496 5 0   |
| £.2,000 India Stock purchased in September 1792, was in May 1800 of the Value of .....                          |          |    |    | 4,197  | 10 | 0           |
| Add Seven and a Half Year's Dividend at £.10 10 per Cent.....                                                   |          |    |    | 1,575  | 0  | 0           |
|                                                                                                                 |          |    |    | 5,772  | 10 | 0           |
| This Stock, in September, 1792, cost .....                                                                      |          |    |    | 4,057  | 10 | 0           |
| Net Profit on this India Stock .....                                                                            |          |    |    |        |    | 1,715 0 0   |
| Total Profit by Investment in the Funds .....                                                                   |          |    |    |        |    | 16,369 13 9 |
| Thirteen Years Interest on £.5,374 paid to Sir William Forbes and Co. and Mansfield and Co. at 5 per Cent ..... |          |    |    |        |    | 3,493 2 0   |
| Eleven Years Interest of £.4,000 paid ditto at 5 per Cent .....                                                 |          |    |    |        |    | 2,200 0 0   |
|                                                                                                                 |          |    |    |        |    | 22,062 15 9 |

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.--I mean to show, that the stock was pledged, and that the sum of money was the same whether pledged or sold; for it was the value of the stock the day it was paid in.

Then Coutts Trotter, esq. was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Sergeant Best.--Have you any knowledge of the power or control over a certain sum of 13,500*l.* India stock, being given by Alexander Trotter to Mark Sprot?

Mr. C. Trotter.—There was an order given by Mr. Trotter, to hold that sum of stock at the disposal of Mr. Mark Sprot.

A Lord.—That authority must, I apprehend, have been in writing.

Mr. Whitbread.--Was that direction given in writing, or verbally?

Mr. C. Trotter.—It was given in writing.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you that writing in your possession?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I have it. This is the paper.

The same was read, and is as follows:

"London, the 21st of May, 1800.—Messieurs Thomas Coutts and Company, I desire you will transfer to Mark Sprot, esq. or to whoever he shall direct, the sum of 7,000*l.* reduced 3 per cent annuities, and 13,500*l.* East India stock, standing in your names, at my disposal.

"ALEX. TROTTER."

Then Coutts Trotter, esq. was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect, in the year 1797, that loan which went by the name of the Loyalty loan?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I do perfectly.

Mr. Plumer.—For how long did it continue to fall after the first subscription?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I am unable to state the precise time; but it was under its original value for a considerable time.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it so throughout the year 1797, in which it was originally subscribed?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I do not speak from perfect recollection; but I believe it was.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect how much it fell below par?

Mr. C. Trotter.—I think I remember, that at one time, the five per cent stock was at seventy-two or seventy-three; but I cannot speak as to the fact upon my oath.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know what it was taken at?

Mr. C. Trotter.—One hundred and twelve pounds ten shillings stock for every hundred pounds money, which brings it somewhere to about ninety pounds.

Mr. Plumer.—Then would any one that had sold it have lost the difference of between seventy-two and ninety pounds by the sale?

Mr. C. Trotter.—Decidedly so.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mark Sprot, esq. was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether you accepted of the control over a certain sum of India stock, amounting to 13,000*l.* from Mr. Alexander Trotter, in the month of May, 1800?

Mr. Sprot.—I think I did, but I cannot be certain.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you advance a sum of money upon certain stock, East India and other stock, through the solicitations of Mr. Alexander Trotter, at that time?

Mr. Sprot.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—To what amount?

Mr. Sprot.—I think to 51,700*l.* I have seen it since, to refresh my memory.

Mr. Whitbread.—On whose account did you make that advance?

Mr. Sprot.—To the Honourable Robert Saunders Dundas.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you obtain complete power over those stocks as your own, in consequence of that advance?

Mr. Sprot.—I certainly had complete power to have had it whenever I pleased.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom did you pay the 51,700*l.* that you have mentioned?

Mr. Sprot.—I paid it to Alexander Trotter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive a draft, or the produce of a draft, of lord Melville, to the amount of 1,427*l.* to even the account between the loan and the stock you had received, as a pledge for that loan?

Mr. Sprot.—I never received a draft of lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive a sum of 1,427*l.* in order to make that even?

Mr. Sprot.—I received it from Mr. Alexander Trotter, as far as my memory goes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Cannot you refer to your banking-book, in which you have the exact amount of the sum?—Turn to the book, May 22nd, 1800.

Mr. Sprot.—I have not got the book here.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect that you did receive that sum of 1,427*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.*?

Mr. Sprot.—I do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know from whom you received that?

Mr. Sprot.—I think, to the best of my knowledge, it was from Alexander Trotter. I am sure it was.

Mr. Whitbread.—On whose account did you receive it?

Mr. Sprot.—On the honourable Robert Saunders Dundas's account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you transact money business largely at any time for Mr. Alexander Trotter?

Mr. Sprot.—I have borrowed money of Mr. Alexander Trotter, and have lent him considerable sums; large sums.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever purchase navy or victualling bills, or other government securities, for Alexander Trotter, and for his benefit and advantage?

Mr. Sprot.—I once purchased navy bills to the amount of, I said, ten or twelve thousand pounds; but I find in a book I have found since, there is an account of the navy I purchased for him.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to your book, and state what is the quantity of navy bills you so purchased?

Mr. Sprot.—That would take up a long time to do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were the navy bills you so purchased for Alexander Trotter, at any time, at a discount?

Mr. Sprot.—I have no memory of that.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect Alexander Trotter borrowing a sum of money of you, in preference to the sale of his navy bills?

Mr. Sprot.—I remember his borrowing money of me; a considerable sum. I have reason to think it was to prevent his selling his navy bills.

Then Mark Sprot, esq. was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Adam.—Had you any pecuniary transactions with lord Melville in your life?

Mr. Sprot.—Never.

Mr. Adam.—Have you any acquaintance with lord Melville?

Mr. Sprot.—A very slight one. I have had the honour, two or three times, of being in lord Melville's company; but never a word of money, or any thing of that kind passed.

Mr. Adam.—Were not you applied to by Mr. Trotter, in 1800, to advance money to him on certain stock?

Mr. Sprot.—I was.

Mr. Adam.—State the particulars of that transaction, to the best of your recollection, and with whom it was?

Mr. Sprot.—Mr. Trotter told me, that he wished I would do him the favour of lending him, upon India stock and reduced loyalty stock: I agreed to lend it him. He proposed to me to lend it to the honourable Robert Dundas. I then had a meeting with the honourable Robert Dundas, and I said I would not lend it upon heavy stock; such as India and loyalty too, which was a heavy stock; but that I wished to lend it upon 3 per cent consols and India. The sum wanted was fifty thousand and odd pounds; upon which I had a meeting with him next day, and that 1,400*l.* mentioned, was to reduce the stock; that the dividend of India, and the dividend of loyalty, should be 5 per cent, equal to the sum lent, 5 per cent.

Mr. Adam.—Then was it upon that account that you received from Mr. Trotter, 1,427*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.*?

Mr. Sprot.—It was.

Mr. Adam.—Had you any intercourse with lord Melville during the course of that transaction?

Mr. Sprot.—None.

Mr. Adam.—Was the stock disposed of, or not?

Mr. Sprot.—It was rather long-winded. I was anxious to get my money; I had stayed two or three years, and I wrote either to the honourable Robert Saunders Dundas, or to Mr. Trotter, begging permission to sell the stock, for I did not think things were clear.

Mr. Adam.—Look at the paper I have put into your hand: is that your hand-writing?

Mr. Sprot.—It is; and this can tell the very dates.

Mr. Adam.—Was that paper written by you at the time of the transaction?

Mr. Sprot.—It was.

Mr. Adam.—Can you, by having your memory refreshed from that paper, specify the particulars of the transaction?

Mr. Sprot.—Yes, I can: the sum of India stock was 14,500*l.* which was valued at the price of the day, 210*l.*; the consols 35,529*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* valued at 60*l.*; that made 51,767*l.* 15*s.* the sum that I lent.—There is interest from the 21st of May 1800, to the 21st of May 1801, 2,588*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.*—Then there is cash paid Alexander Trotter 30th October. This was to bring the interest to a date.—I remember Mr. Trotter said, you have got this fourteen hundred odd pounds; now the interest will bring it to this date, to the 30th of October, it makes the interest 5 per cent, and the interest of the sum lent 5 per cent.

Mr. Adam.—You say you have had various money transactions with Mr. Trotter, lending money and borrowing money; whether these money transactions with Mr. Alexander Trotter, were not all entirely upon Mr. Alexander Trotter's own account?

Mr. Sprot.—His own account.

Mr. Adam.—Have you any knowledge or belief, that any other person whatever was concerned in this transaction?

Mr. Sprot.—None.

Mr. Adam.—Or that they were for the benefit or advantage of any other person?

Mr. Sprot.—None.

Mr. Whitbread.—I object to the word in the question as to belief, because the learned counsel has done so. The witness should be confined to his knowledge.

Mr. Sprot.—I do not know it of my own knowledge.

Mr. Adam.—Whether you had any knowledge at the time of these transactions, that the money advanced to you, at different times, by Mr. Alexander Trotter, was public money?

Mr. Sprot.—None; I might surmise and conjecture, as he was paymaster of the navy, but I had no knowledge of it.

Mr. Adam.—Had you any knowledge of Mr. Trotter and his connexions, and whether his nearest connexions were not persons in considerable opulence?

Mr. Sprot.—Mr. Coutts's father and Mr. Trotter's father were partners. Mr. Trotter's brother is a partner in the house of Thomas Coutts and Company; and he has a brother, a man of considerable fortune; and he has several very considerable connexions; and I having put my stock, as a security to Mr. Trotter, into Mr. Coutts' name, I was led to think it might be Mr. Coutts' money; I had borrowed money, and have money of him now, upon government security; and did not know whether Alexander Trotter might not be the channel of conveyance.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—It appears now from the evidence, that the loan was not upon the 13,500*l.* but upon 14,500*l.* with the addition of 1,000*l.* Have you any knowledge that this sum of money so advanced by loan, to the amount of fifty-one thousand odd hundred pounds was for lord Melville?

Mr. Plumer.—The witness has already said, as I understood, that he had never any conference with lord Melville; therefore, whatever he knows must be upon the information of others.

Mr. Sprot.—I am not certain of that, neither could I upon my oath say, whether Mr. Trotter mentioned lord Melville's name or not.

Mr. Sergeant Best.—Do you know of your own knowledge, whether this money was advanced for lord Melville's purposes or not?

Mr. Sprot.—I do not know.

Mr. Adam.—What was the nature of the security you received beside the stock itself?

Mr. Sprot.—A missive letter Mr. Robert Dundas gave me, saying he had borrowed so much money upon that stock, and I engaged to account to him for the dividends, and he was to allow me interest for the money.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then the Paper shown by the Counsel for Viscount MELVILLE to the Witness, was delivered in, and is as follows:

| 1800.                                                            | £.     | s. | d. |
|------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|----|----|
| May 21, £.14,500 at 210                                          |        |    |    |
|                                                                  | 30,450 | 0  | 0  |
| 35,529 13 Con. 60 ...                                            | 21,317 | 15 | 0  |
|                                                                  | 51,767 | 15 | 0  |
| Interest from 21st May 1800, till 21st May 1801.....             | 2,588  | 7  | 9  |
| Cash paid Alexander Trotter, Esq. 30th October .....             | 862    | 15 | 10 |
| Interest from 21st May 1801, to 21st May 1802 .....              | 2,588  | 7  | 9  |
| Interest from 21st May 1802, to 1st Feb. 1803, is 256 Days ..... | 1,815  | 8  | 5  |
|                                                                  | 59,622 | 14 | 9  |
| 1803.                                                            | £.     |    |    |
| February 1, To 14,500 India Stock                                | 26,809 | 3  | 7  |

| 1800.                                                                          | £.               | s. | d. |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------|----|----|
| July 22, By Div <sup>d</sup> $\frac{1}{2}$ Year,                               |                  |    |    |
|                                                                                | £14,500 Ind. 761 | 5  | 0  |
| Ditto ... 35,529 13 Con. 532                                                   | 18               | 10 |    |
|                                                                                | 1,294            | 3  | 10 |
| 1801.                                                                          |                  |    |    |
| July 13, By One Year's Dividend,                                               |                  |    |    |
| Ditto.....                                                                     | 2,588            | 7  | 9  |
| 1802.                                                                          |                  |    |    |
| July 13, By ditto, ditto .....                                                 | 2,588            | 7  | 9  |
| 1803.                                                                          |                  |    |    |
| January 13, By Half Year's ditto ...                                           | 1,294            | 3  | 10 |
| Feb. 1, By Sale of 35,529 13 Cons. at 70 $\frac{1}{2}$ —70 $\frac{1}{2}$ ..... | 25,048           | 8  | 0  |
|                                                                                | 32,813           | 11 | 2  |
| 14,500 India Balance .....                                                     | 26,809           | 3  | 7  |
|                                                                                | 59,622           | 14 | 9  |

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

NINTH DAY.

Friday, May 9, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, Managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the Lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, your lordships will be pleased to recollect that it is in evidence before you, that a letter was written by lord Melville to the commissioners of naval inquiry, in the month of June, 1804. It is also in evidence before your lordships, by the testimony of Mr. Sergeant Praed, that a message was sent to lord Melville, desiring that he would appear before the naval commissioners, at any time that should be most convenient to him. My lords, the Commons now propose to put in evidence before your lordships, the letter of lord Melville, in answer to that summons, or requisition, they so sent, either verbally, or in writing. The Commons will call, to prove this letter, Mr. Williams, the secretary: Mr. Sergeant Praed, not having been at that time a commissioner of naval inquiry. Your lordships will observe the letter is dated on the 3rd of November; that lord Melville acknowledges having received their request on the 2nd of November, two days before he made his appearance; it being in evidence that he appeared before the naval commissioners on the 4th.

Mr. Plumer.—I hope the honourable manager will excuse my just mentioning, that I understood it was proposed to give a piece of evidence which is preliminary to this; I mean, the first letter that was written by the commissioners of naval inquiry to lord Melville. Your lordships may recollect, on a former day, that letter was not forthcoming, but it was proposed to introduce it on a subsequent day. It seems to relate to the subject in question, and, therefore, if your lordships please, this will be the proper place to introduce it.

Mr. Whitbread.—We propose to introduce every letter sent to lord Melville; I believe the precepts are to be found in the books; the secretary will read the original precepts from the books, and so take this letter in its turn; and of course, upon the minutes, all the letters will be entered according to their dates.

Mr. Plumer.—I only mention it because it was reserved on a former day, and proposed to be introduced in its proper place.

Lord Chancellor.—Have you got that letter, Mr. Plumer?

Mr. Plumer.—We have not got it; Mr. Sergeant Praed, I understood, said he would produce the entry that they have of that letter, in their book, on a subsequent day.

Mr. Whitbread.—It is so proposed to do.

Then Mr. John Williams was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you secretary to the commissioners of naval inquiry?

Mr. Williams.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer in your book to the original entry of any correspondence between the naval commissioners and lord Melville. What book is that you have in your hand?

Mr. Williams.—The book containing the entry of the letters and the precepts of the commissioners of naval inquiry.

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the letter antecedent to the 30th of June, 1804.

Mr. Williams.—It is a precept, dated 26th June, 1804, to the right honourable lord viscount Melville, requiring to be furnished with an account.

Then the following entry in a book, entitled Precept Book, was read.

“ To whom issued      Subject.

Right honourable lord
viscount Melville.

“ Requiring to be furnished with an account of monies (exclusive of your salary as treasurer of the navy) received by you, or any person on your account, or by your order, from the paymaster of the navy, between the 1st of July, 1785, and 31st of December, 1800, specifying the times when such monies were received, and also the times when, and the persons by whom, the same were returned to the Bank or the paymaster.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that the first precept, or letter, that appears upon the books of the commissioners of naval inquiry, addressed by them to lord Melville?

Mr. Williams.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the letter of the 30th of June,* which is now in evidence, lord Melville's answer to that precept?

Mr. Williams.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you any precept, or letter, to lord Melville, antecedent to the date of the 3rd of November, 1804?

Mr. Williams.—A letter was written by the commissioners to lord Melville, on the 2nd of November, 1804.

The same was read from the letter book produced by the witness, and is as follows:

“ 2nd November, 1804.

“ My lord;

“ Being desirous of receiving some information from your lordship relative to the management of the business of the Pay-office of the navy during your treasurership; we request you will let us know what day in the next week, and at what hour, it will be most convenient to your lordship to attend us for that purpose.

“ We have the honour to be, &c.

CH. M. POLE.

EWAN LAW.

JOHN FORD.

HENRY NICHOLS.

W. MACKWORTH PRAED.”

“ Right honourable lord viscount Melville.”

* See the letter, page 308.

Mr. Whitbread.—This letter is signed by lord Melville?

Mr. Plumer.—I admit that the signature is lord Melville's.

The same was read, and is as follows:

“ Admiralty, 3rd November, 1804.

“ Gentlemen;

“ I have this morning received your letter of the 2nd instant. If nothing unforeseen occurs to prevent me, I will call at your office upon Monday, at eleven o'clock.

I have the honour to be,

Gentlemen,

Your most obedient humble servant,

MELVILLE.”

“ To the Commissioners
of Naval Inquiry.”

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the precept for the return of the balances.

Mr. Williams.—The first precept to the treasurer of the navy, is dated the 17th of January, 1803, requiring an account of the balances of public money.

Mr. Whitbread.—Your lordships observe that this was nearly a year and a half before the first letter to lord Melville; the precept for the return of the balances having been issued in the early part of 1803.

Mr. Plumer.—To whom was that precept, for the return of the balances issued?

Mr. Williams.—It was directed to the treasurer of the navy, and sent to his office.

Mr. Whitbread.—The gentleman who was treasurer of the navy at that time, will be called before your lordships, and will give evidence on that subject. Mr. Bathurst was then treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Williams.—In addition to that precept, there was another on the 26th of January, 1803, requiring in addition to the account already called for by the precept of the 17th instant, an account of the balance of public money in the hands of the different cashiers or sub-accountants of the treasurer of the navy, made up to the first of January, in each year, from 1790.

Then the following entries in the same book were read:

| To whom issued.        | For what.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | Date.           | When delivered. | When Return made. |
|------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------|-----------------|-------------------|
| Treasurer of the Navy. | Account of Balance of Public Money in his Hands, made up to the 1st January in each Year from 1790, under each respective Head of Service, with the Amount of the Sums standing in his Name at the Bank at such periods.                                                          | 17th Jan. 1803. | 17th Jan. 1803. | 2nd Feb. 1803.    |
| To whom issued.        | For what.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | When issued.    | When delivered. | When Return made. |
| Treasurer of the Navy. | Requiring, in Addition to the Account already called for by Precept of the 17th instant.An account of the Balance of Public Money in the Hands of the different Cashiers or Sub-accountants of the Treasurer of the Navy, made up to the 1st January in each Year, from 1790. | Jan. 26th 1803. | Jan. 26th 1803. | 2nd Feb. 1803.    |

Mr. Whitbread.—I now propose to put into the hands of the witness, papers which purport to be returns to this precept. What are those papers?

Mr. Williams.—The first is an account of the balances of public money in the hands of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, his different cashiers or sub-accountants, made up to the 31st of December in each year, since 1790, with the amount of the sums standing in the treasurer's name in the Bank at such periods.

Mr. Plumer.—That paper is not evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read a letter from the treasurer of the navy, dated Navy-pay-office, February the 2nd, 1803, signed Charles Bragge.

Lord Chancellor.—Have the counsel for the defendant any objection to this letter being read?

Mr. Plumer.—Even if Mr. Bathurst's handwriting were authenticated, it appears to me that it would not be evidence.

A Lord.—It would be of no use if Mr. Bathurst were here, unless he could state that he himself had made the inquiry, and that such was, upon his immediate investigation of the book, the result of the balance as now stated; and it will therefore probably be useless to wait for the appearance of that gentleman, who, if he came could not prove the fact, if he had not made the investigation himself.

Mr. Whitbread.—We propose to prove that this letter was sent by Mr. Bathurst, together with the balances made up by Mr. Wilson, in the Navy-pay-office. Mr. Wilson does not appear to be in immediate attendance; we will therefore proceed on another head, and call Mr. Meheux.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then John Meheux, esq., was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you an officer at the board of control for the affairs of India?

Mr. Meheux.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long have you held any situation there?

Mr. Meheux.—From the first establishment of that board in September 1784.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who was president of that board at the time you first took your seat there?

Mr. Meheux.—The late lord Sydney.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who succeeded lord Sydney?

Mr. Meheux.—Lord Grenville.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who succeeded lord Grenville?

Mr. Meheux.—Lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did lord Melville continue in that situation?

Mr. Meheux.—From 1793 till the 19th of May, I believe, 1801.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive a salary for lord Melville, as president of the board of control, after the time that a salary was annexed to that office?

Mr. Meheux.—No, not from that time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever receive the salary for lord Melville?

Mr. Meheux.—I do not know that I did ever absolutely receive it, because I received the whole sum of money for the payment of the office, at the India House, and paid lord Melville's proportion of it, on lord Melville's account, into Drummonds' house.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you pay any proportion of it to any other person?

Mr. Meheux.—Never.

Then John Meheux, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—When did lord Melville become president of the board of control?

Mr. Meheux.—From the moment he first entered that office he began to do duty.

Mr. Plumer.—When was that?

Mr. Meheux.—From September, 1784.

Mr. Plumer.—From September, 1784, till May 1801, lord Melville did the whole business of that extensive department?

Mr. Meheux.—I may say he did, almost exclusively. I might almost go farther, and say quite, with the other members that were of the board, junior to him.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the business of the office at that time, and particularly at the first periods of it, a business that required very great and constant attention?

Mr. Meheux.—Very great and constant, without any salary, I believe, till 1793.

Mr. Plumer.—Then, for the first nine years of that time, lord Melville executed the duties of that extensive department, without any salary at all?

Mr. Meheux.—Without any salary whatever.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect that was the period when the first establishment took place of the board of control, 1784?

Mr. Meheux.—Certainly; and I believe they first met on the 3rd of September, 1784, at the Treasury.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then George Fennell, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What was your situation in the Navy-pay-office, in the year 1786.

Mr. Fennell.—On the arrangement in the office, in consequence of the order in council dated the 9th of August, 1786, I went into the accountant's branch, established by that order in council, as second clerk.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you arrive at the head of that branch?

Mr. Fennell.—In January, 1788, I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has that branch continued its proper functions in the Navy-pay-office, up to this time?

Mr. Fennell.—No.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did its functions cease?

Mr. Fennell.—Altogether in the year 1800.

Mr. Whitbread.—When were they first interrupted?

Mr. Fennell.—Some of the clerks were withdrawn so early as in the years 1794 and 1795.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the reason of those clerks being withdrawn?

Mr. Fennell.—I understand—

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know the reason? Do not state what you understand; but what you know.

Mr. Fennell.—They were withdrawn to assist the other branches in the current business, which was accumulating in consequence of the pressure of the war.

Mr. Whitbread.—Of how many clerks had that branch originally consisted?

Mr. Fennell.—Nine.

Mr. Whitbread.—How many clerks were at first withdrawn?

Mr. Fennell.—They were withdrawn very gradually; I believe, only one at first.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were others withdrawn soon, or at any time after?

Mr. Fennell.—In the course of two or three years. I cannot speak precisely.

Mr. Whitbread.—State how they were gradually diminished, to the time when they ceased altogether?

Mr. Fennell.—As I before stated, in the latter end of the year 1794 and 1795, there were four of them employed in the inspector's branch; and another branch was established, I believe, in the year 1795: except myself, the clerks were altogether withdrawn in the latter end of the year 1797.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did you continue to act singly in that branch, after the rest were withdrawn?

Mr. Fennell.—During the years 1798 and 1799.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you yourself finally removed?

Mr. Fennell.—I was, from January 1800, employed to assist in the pay branch.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you removed altogether to Chatham, or to any other out-port?

Mr. Fennell.—I was removed to Chatham, in consequence of the illness of a gentleman there, in January 1800.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did you continue at Chatham?

Mr. Fennell.—Till May of the same year.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the accountant's branch entirely without any person belonging to it, during your absence?

Mr. Fennell.—Entirely.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the accountant's branch now restored?

Mr. Fennell.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did its restoration take place?

Mr. Fennell.—Completely, only since within this month.

Mr. Whitbread.—How many clerks are there now employed in the accountant's branch?

Mr. Fennell.—There are now six, beside myself, employed.

Mr. Whitbread.—When were you first sent back to take your appropriate business in the accountant's branch?

Mr. Fennell.—In February, 1803.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know, that during the time lord Melville was treasurer of the navy, the public money was placed by his paymaster at the house of Messieurs Coutts and Company?

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know where the public money was placed during the time lord Melville was treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Fennell.—I understand—

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know it? State only what consists with your own knowledge?

Mr. Fennell.—I know it was kept at Messieurs Coutts's, because I received a draft there.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you received a draft upon the house of Coutts for public money?

Mr. Fennell.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you know at that time that it was so deposited contrary to act of parliament?

Mr. Plumer.—This is asking the witness to give an opinion upon the act of parliament.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you call the attention of your principal, Mr. Bragge Bathurst, at any time to the circumstance of public money being placed at a private banker's?

Mr. Fennell.—I did.

Then George Fennell, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—While the accountant's office existed, did not the clerks in that office do their business jointly with the navy board?

Mr. Fennell.—They did.

Mr. Plumer.—Were not the clerks in the navy board withdrawn before the clerks in the accountant's office were withdrawn?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot speak positively to that.

Mr. Plumer.—Who had the control over the clerks of the navy board: who had the direction of that withdrawing?

Mr. Fennell.—The navy board had certainly the control over their own clerks.

Mr. Plumer.—How many clerks were there, who used to assist from the navy board, whilst they went on with their joint operations, before any were withdrawn?

Mr. Fennell.—I believe, four.

Mr. Plumer.—Were all the four withdrawn, or were only some of them withdrawn?

Mr. Fennell.—I do not recollect; I believe I should have stated that there were more than four employed at one time; I believe there were two sets as they are called, employed for some time, but I do not recollect for how long a time.

Mr. Plumer.—Of how many did the two sets consist?

Mr. Fennell.—Of four in each set, I believe. I never was employed in that particular branch myself, and I cannot speak positively.

Mr. Plumer.—Were not all the eight clerks, in consequence of the pressure of business arising from the war, withdrawn for other business?

Mr. Fennell.—I understand so.

Mr. Plumer.—Were not the clerks that were withdrawn from the accountant's office absolutely wanted in the other departments, from the increased business of the war?

Mr. Fennell.—I cannot speak positively to that; that was not in my department.

Mr. Plumer.—Could the accountant's clerks have gone on with the business alone, when the navy board's clerks were withdrawn?

Mr. Fennell.—Certainly not.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—I now propose to call Mr. Bragge Bathurst, a member of the House of Commons.

Then the right honorable Charles Bragge Bathurst was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you at any time treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Bathurst.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—When were you appointed to that office?

Mr. Bathurst.—In November, 1801, I think.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did you continue in that office?

Mr. Bathurst.—Till the Spring of 1803.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who was your paymaster during that time?

Mr. Bathurst.—Mr. Trotter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where was the public money belonging to the Navy-pay-office lodged when you first accepted the office of treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Plumer.—I submit this is irrelevant to the present subject; what was done during the time the right honorable witness was treasurer, constitutes no part of the present inquiry.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons propose to show, by the evidence of Mr. Bathurst, that the office could be conducted with perfect facility, notwithstanding the money was not lodged at the house of Messieurs Coutts; and, as the learned counsel for the noble defendant, have examined as to the facilities of office in consequence of money being lodged there, the Commons contend that they have a right to examine as to the facilities of office during the time the public money was lodged according to the act of parliament.

Mr. Plumer.—I have no objection to that mode of inquiry.

Lord Chancellor.—In that point of view, and for that purpose, it clearly is evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—Where was the public money lodged at the time that you undertook the office of treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Bathurst.—I have no means of stating that.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know whether all the money was lodged in the Bank of England or elsewhere?

Mr. Bathurst.—I certainly know nothing of that.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you discover that all the money belonging to the Navy-pay-office, during the time of your holding that office, was not lodged in the Bank, or any part of it?

Mr. Bathurst.—I was so informed by Mr. Trotter, my paymaster.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive that information originally from Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Bathurst.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—At what time did Mr. Trotter give you that information?

Mr. Bathurst.—I believe on my first entrance into the office. Perhaps I should state that I understood it to apply only to a small part, which it was found necessary for the convenience of the office, to deposit into the hands of a private banker instead of the whole remaining in the Bank.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you direct the discontinuance of that practice?

Mr. Bathurst.—I did, in the course of my holding that office.

Mr. Whitbread.—At what time did you direct that discontinuance?

Mr. Bathurst.—In the course of the summer of the year 1802.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was your order complied with?

Mr. Bathurst.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were any representations made to you, or any remonstrances, on the discontinuance of that practice?

Mr. Bathurst.—Does the question mean to apply to the time previous or afterwards?

Mr. Whitbread.—Previous.

Mr. Bathurst.—Representations were made to me of the convenience supposed to accrue to the office from the practice, which I understood had prevailed, of keeping small sums of money in the hands of a private banker.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know what were the sums of money, or did you inquire what they were, which were so kept in the hands of a private banker?

Mr. Bathurst.—I did not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you receive any representation, upon the inconvenience arising from the money being replaced at the Bank, after such order of your's had been executed?

Mr. Bathurst.—I am not aware of any such representations, nor do I believe that any such were made to me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you acquainted with any inconvenience which resulted from the execution of your orders?

Mr. Bathurst.—Certainly not, personally; the office was conducted, during my time, by the paymaster, and, unless upon extraordinary occasions, representations were not made to the treasurer, I believe; certainly none such were made to me, by any person in any department in the office, or by any person having any demands upon the office.

Mr. Whitbread.—What are the duties of the treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Bathurst.—I must submit to your lordships, that I held that office for the space of about eighteen months; that I have been out of that office for three years; and that your lordships are already apprized of the manner in which that office is conducted. I will now answer any question the honourable manager may put to me.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons wish to show what the duties of the treasurer of the navy are; and we think we cannot get at that information better than from a person who has been treasurer of the navy.

Lord Chancellor.—The Court understood that the object you had in view was to show that no inconvenience had arisen, during the witness's administration of the office, from the public money being lodged at the Bank, and not at a private banker's.

Mr. Whitbread.—In that part of the examination to which your lordships' attention was then addressed, such was the object stated by the Commons. The Commons have charged, that lord Melville, being treasurer of the navy, did not conduct himself properly in the discharge of that office. The Commons, therefore, contend, that they have a right to show to your lordships, what the duties were, which he had to execute; and therefore we call on Mr. Bathurst to state, what he conceived his duties to be, at the time he was treasurer of the navy.

Lord Chancellor.—There are certain duties cast upon public officers by law.

Mr. Whitbread.—But, my lords, it may not be before your lordships what the duties of his office are; I wish merely to ask Mr. Bathurst what were the duties of his office whilst he was treasurer of the navy.

A Lord.—I could wish that the honourable managers would state, what particular violation of the duty of the treasurer of the navy by lord Melville, they mean to show by the evidence of this witness.

Mr. Whitbread.—The counsel for the defendant have been asking in the course of this day, what are the duties of the office of the board of control, and they have not been stopped in that inquiry. The Commons state in their charge, that the office of treasurer of the navy, is one of great public importance, and one, in which the public are highly interested; and they submit to your lordships, they have a right to show what are those duties which have not been duly executed by lord Melville. They charge, that he has broken that particular part of his duty, which is enjoined him by law: namely, to place the money in the Bank of England exclusively. Now they wish to show, before your lordships, what were the duties that lord Melville had to execute generally, as treasurer of the navy; and, my lords, as the Commons opened to your lordships, that as all public offices are matters of interest to the public, and the due execution of them material and important to that public, so they opened to your lordships, that the office of treasurer of the navy, was one in which the public had a superior claim upon the officer executing that office, to execute it most religiously; and for this reason, that that office was executed entirely by deputy; and that there was no laborious employment of any sort; and therefore, the salary paid for that office bound, in a more punctilious manner, the person holding it, to perform every part of the duty of that office. It is for that purpose that the Commons contend, that they have a right to examine Mr. Bathurst, as to the duties of that office.

A Lord.—My lords, the inquiry into a supposed misdemeanor in the course of an office, seems almost to preclude any question, whether we can inquire what are the duties of that office generally; and it seems to me, with all possible submission to your lordships, to be so important and proper a question, that I am extremely surprised (I do not mean to reflect upon the discretion of the honourable managers) that we have this question at so late a period in the proceeding, because the inquiry would have thrown a light upon that case in all its antecedent stages.

Lord Chancellor.—You are entitled, no doubt, to inquire into the duties of the office.

A Lord.—I only rise to express my concurrence with the noble lord, who has just spoken, with respect to the question, whether it be a duty of the office, that the money should be kept at the Bank; perhaps the act answers that question. But the duties of the office are to be collected in two ways: either the law has positively prescribed the duties, and you may collect them from the terms in which they are prescribed, or you are to collect them from the usage and practice of the office; and I apprehend that this is perfectly a competent question.

Lord Chancellor.—As far as the witness is acquainted with the usage and practice of the office, and as far as he can state how he himself was employed, and what duties he performed in the course of his treasurership of the navy, that undoubtedly he may speak to; but you cannot ask a question, the answer to which would be an inference of law, from the situation which he filled; but you may ask him, as treasurer of the navy, what he had to do, and what constituted his functions.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, I am afraid I have given your lordships unnecessary trouble, by not framing my question right, for it was for that purpose alone I made the inquiry. I would now ask Mr. Bathurst, what duties he executed as treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Bathurst.—Your lordships have been already informed that it had been the practice of my predecessor—I found that it had been the practice of the noble viscount at your lordships' bar—it had been the practice of another member of your lordships' house, whom I succeeded, Mr. Ryder,—to delegate all the power of issuing and receiving money from the Bank to the paymaster; that was done by a general power of attorney, consequently the payment transactions, which, I presume, are more immediately the subject of your lordships' inquiry, were conducted by the paymaster; references were made to me in particular cases; and in other branches of the office not relating to the payment of money, and in a variety of other transactions, references were made to me sometimes daily, sometimes at considerable intervals; but with respect to the payment and receipt of money, in all the various branches of the office, that was conducted entirely by the paymaster.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons then presume they are to understand, from the answer last given, that the paymaster acted for the treasurer in all payments, under a general power of attorney, and acted in all the routine of business, with regard to receipts and payments of money, without the interference of the treasurer?

Mr. Bathurst.—He did so; except in a case of any extraordinary reference that might be made to the treasurer.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did he perform all the principal duties of the office?

Mr. Bathurst.—Certainly so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did Mr. Trotter continue to be your paymaster to the conclusion of your treasurership?

Mr. Bathurst.—He did.

Then the right honourable Charles Bragge Bathurst was cross-examined, as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Whether payments in very small sums, sometimes under 20s., are not daily made in the office to sailors and their relatives?

Mr. Bathurst.—From what I have stated already, your lordships will perceive it is not in my power personally to answer that question.

Mr. Plumer.—Was it not the course of office that they should be paid in that manner?

Mr. Bathurst.—I have no other means of answering that question than a persuasion that there must be small sums, and of course that small demands would be paid.

Mr. Plumer.—Which department did the payment of seamen's wages in London arise in?

Mr. Bathurst.—In one of the sub-accountants I apprehend, and not of the paymaster personally.

Mr. Plumer.—The sub-accountant receiving a supply from the paymaster?

Mr. Bathurst.—The supply received from the paymaster, I apprehend to be in advances of some magnitude, supposed to be adequate to the demands in that department for a limited time.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know whether, posterior to the alterations you made in the summer of 1802, those small payments continued the same as before?

Mr. Bathurst.—I presume they did.

Mr. Plumer.—I understood you to state, that the general duties and business of the office, especially with respect to receipts and payments, were delegated altogether to the paymaster, and that you did not interfere in that business, except when your attention was called to it by reference; by whom was the reference made to you, when your attention was called to any of the business that was going on?

Mr. Bathurst.—Always by the paymaster, if he was in the office; if he was absent, as he was a short time, during the time I remained in the office, it would probably be made by Mr. Wilson, who acted in his absence for him.

Then the right honourable Charles Bragge Bathurst was re-examined, as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it a part of your duty, as treasurer of the navy, and had you the power and control over the paymaster?

Mr. Bathurst.—Certainly; I consider the paymaster as my immediate deputy, for whose acts I am responsible, and who is amoveable, I understood, at a moment.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it in consequence of the duty cast upon you, and the authority you were vested with, that you made that order to discontinue the money being in the hands of a private banker, instead of in the Bank?

Mr. Bathurst.—Certainly, in consequence of the power I conceived I had over the whole of that office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know of your own knowledge, whether the paymaster ever made any small payments with his own hands?

Mr. Bathurst.—The whole subject of payments is totally out of my personal knowledge.

Mr. Whitbread.—We wish to understand whether the payment of those small sums of money, according to the course and practice of the office, was in the hands of the paymaster and at his disposition, or in the hands of the sub-accountants?

Mr. Bathurst.—I apprehend it to be made by the sub-accountants.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that letter and the signature to it your hand-writing?

Mr. Bathurst.—It is.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons next propose to call Mr. Thomas Wilson.

Then Mr. Thomas Wilson was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you an officer in the Navy-pay-office.

Mr. Wilson.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long have you been in that office.

Mr. Wilson.—I was appointed to the office in the year 1786.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the situation you now hold in the office.

Mr. Wilson.—The situation I now hold in the office is that of chief clerk in what is called the branch for the payment of officers bills.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it not called the bill and remittance branch?

Mr. Wilson.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long have you filled that situation?

Mr. Wilson.—To the best of my recollection, from the year 1795 or 1796; I cannot be positive.

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at the signature to that paper, is that your hand-writing?

Mr. Wilson.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—What does that paper purport to be?

Mr. Wilson.—An account of the balances of public money in the hands of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, his different cashiers or sub-accountants, made up to the 31st of December in each year since 1790, with the amount of the sums standing in the treasurer's name in the Bank at such periods.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is not that a return to a precept which was issued by the commissioners of naval inquiry?

Mr. Wilson.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is there an erasure upon that paper immediately under your name?

Mr. Wilson.—There certainly appears to be so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect having written any thing that was erased in your presence, or by you, under that name?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe that Mr. Trotter had previously signed this account; but as the requisition was sent from the commissioners of naval inquiry to myself, that he afterwards thought it would be more proper that I should make the return.

Mr. Whitbread.—What were the words that stood upon the paper, before the erasure under your name?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe it was the name of Alexander Trotter.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know that it was?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot recollect the precise words.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you make up that account yourself?

Mr. Wilson.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Why did not Mr. Trotter make up that account?

Mr. Wilson.—Mr. Trotter was not then in London.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the date of that account?

Mr. Wilson.—There does not appear to be any date to the account.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the date of the letter transmitting that account?

Mr. Wilson.—The second day of February, 1803.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long had Mr. Trotter been absent from the Navy-pay-office, at the time when that return was made?

Mr. Wilson.—I have no recollection.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect the period of Mr. Trotter's return to London, after his absence?

Mr. Wilson.—I only presume that it must be about the beginning of the month of February, from the date of this letter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know precisely that it was upon the 2nd day of February, when that is dated?

Lord Chancellor.—Do you know the day on which he did return?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot swear that; I only presume he returned on the second of February.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect whether Mr. Trotter came to town upon the day when that return was made?

Mr. Wilson.—I signed this account upon the day of Mr. Trotter's return, but whether the return was sent to the commissioners of naval inquiry upon that day or the day following I cannot presume to say.

Mr. Whitbread.—Then you know that Mr. Trotter returned to London on the day on which you made up that return; it is in evidence that that return was made upon the second of February. Were you confidentially employed by Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Wilson.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you in the habit of corresponding with Mr. Trotter in his absence, as his confidential agent?

Mr. Wilson.—I was not Mr. Trotter's agent; I was his confidential friend, and was in the habit of corresponding with him.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you correspond with him daily, during his absence?

Mr. Wilson.—Almost daily.

Mr. Whitbread.—Being in the course of correspondence with him, do you know where he was just before the time that return was made to the commissioners?

Mr. Wilson.—I do not exactly know, but I presume he was at Edinburgh at the time.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect the precept from the commissioners of naval inquiry coming to the office, during the absence of Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe it did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you transmit an account of that precept to Mr. Trotter in Scotland?

Mr. Wilson.—I do not think that I transmitted either the precept or a copy of it; but I am confident that I gave Mr. Trotter information of it.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I am permitting a great deal of irregular examination. Almost every question that has been put to the witness has been an illegal question. All this is a communication between Mr. Trotter and one of his friends: what has that to do with the present defendant?

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons wish to show your lordships, that at the time this precept was issued, Mr. Trotter was absent from London, and that he was in Scotland; they wish to prove that the date of this precept corresponds with the time of his absence; they mean to show that he returned on the very day when the return was made to this precept; they have shown the date of Mr. Trotter's release; it is to bear upon that point that the Commons are making this examination.

Mr. Plumer.—If any thing turns upon where Mr. Trotter was in the month of February, or the month of January 1803, and it is proper to prove it, it must be proved by some witness who saw him, and who knew where he was. I submit to your lordships it cannot be proved in this mode, if it is in the least material.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether it be material or not, it is for the Commons to consider. I wish to know to what part of the United Kingdom the witness addressed the letters to Mr. Trotter, being in the habit of daily correspondence with him?

Mr. Plumer.—That is not competent evidence.

Lord Chancellor.—You may examine Mr. Trotter himself to this.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, Mr. Trotter has given evidence upon the subject already.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you, in the capacity of a confidential friend of Mr. Trotter, draw money during his absence, in his official concerns.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, this cannot be evidence, what he did in his character of confidential friend to somebody else than lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons wish to show that the public money was put beyond the control of the treasurer; and further, that the treasurer had so loosed his hold on the public money, that it was put beyond the reach of his paymaster; and is it not competent to the Commons to show that Mr. Trotter entrusted that power, which had been so entrusted to him, out of his own hands into the hands of another?

Lord Chancellor.—You must show that by the acts of Mr. Trotter, or by his own evidence of them.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, it may be necessary to recur to the evidence that has been given, that Mr. Trotter distinctly stated, in his evidence before your lordships, that he had given that power to the witness.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I now understand that the examination proposed to be given, relates to the authority and power which Mr. Trotter possessing as paymaster, parted with to another person. Now, whether there be any impropriety in Mr. Trotter's appointing anybody else to do any part of his business is not the question. We are not now trying Mr. Trotter, but lord Melville. If that was an improper act, you must show whether that act was done with the privity and knowledge, or by the authority of the defendant. All the acts of Mr. Trotter, right or wrong, what have they to do with the defendant, unless they were authorized directly or indirectly by him? It seems to me it cannot possibly be material to inquire what delegation of authority Mr. Trotter gave to any body else.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons contend they have a right to show, when a public officer, in defiance of his duty, has done a certain act, what was the consequence of those acts, or what it might have been; Mr. Trotter has proved that he gave unlimited authority to Mr. Wilson. The Commons wish now to ask Mr. Wilson whether he acted under that authority.

A Lord.—All the consequences that either necessarily or properly result from the authority, with which lord Melville invested his paymaster, might, I think, be given in evidence; but the consequences that result from the mere individual misconduct of his paymaster, (and such it is at present stated to be) cannot I conceive be given in evidence to affect lord Melville, unless the managers can show some subsequent knowledge on the part of lord Melville of such an authority being given to Mr. Wilson, and his recognition and approbation of it; and, unless it is proposed to give that further proof, I submit the present evidence is incompetent.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons have shown, or can show, that during the absence of Mr. Trotter, Mr. Wilson made payments to lord Melville's account with public money, which he could not have done, unless he had an authority delegated to him by Mr. Trotter to act in his absence, in his official capacity; and therefore the Commons contend that they can bring such knowledge home to lord Melville; and that he could not be ignorant of Mr. Wilson's transactions; but I will put one question to Mr. Wilson, which will set that matter in a clear point of view.

Do you recollect a transaction, with regard to a sum of 40,000*l.* in or about the year 1796, in which lord Melville had any concern?

Mr. Wilson.—I do.

Mr. Whitbread.—State that to the Court.

Mr. Wilson.—Lord Melville sent for me, and desired to know whether a sum of money could be spared from the public account; I told him that the sum of 40,000*l.* might be spared from the public account, and he desired me to bring it accordingly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you act upon lord Melville's direction in that respect?

Mr. Wilson.—Most certainly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was Mr. Trotter in London at that time.

Mr. Wilson.—I believe not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was Mr. Trotter at the Pay-office at that time?

Mr. Wilson.—Consequently he was not at the Pay-office; he was not in London.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you make a communication of that transaction to Mr. Trotter by letter?

Mr. Wilson.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did lord Melville know that you had an authority from Mr. Trotter to draw upon the public account?

Mr. Wilson.—I presume so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you act under that authority generally, or occasionally, given to you by Mr. Trotter during his absences, either in Scotland or elsewhere, subsequent to that transaction?

Mr. Wilson.—I certainly did, subsequent to that transaction.

Mr. Whitbread.—Both from the house of Messieurs Coutts' and from the Bank?

Mr. Wilson.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the mode in which you drew for the public money, subsequent to that transaction, either from Messieurs Coutts', or from the Bank?

Mr. Wilson.—When I drew money from the Bank, it was in blank checks, signed by Mr. Trotter, which were lodged in my custody; when I drew upon his account at Messieurs Coutts' I signed—"Thomas Wilson, for Alexander Trotter."

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you employed by Mr. Trotter, subsequent to this transaction, to employ public money for Mr. Trotter's private advantage?

Mr. Wilson.—Certainly I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you act upon that authority?

Mr. Wilson.—I did, certainly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you state to what extent?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot state to what extent; but certainly I did to a considerable extent.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you conversant in the business of the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Wilson.—I have a general knowledge of it.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know, of your own knowledge, whether the paymaster of the navy ever makes small cash payments to the payees, or that he makes them, by the custom of the office, through the sub-accountants?

Mr. Wilson.—Excepting the payment of fees upon money received from the exchequer, the paymaster makes no other payments, but in large round sums to the sub-accountants.

Mr. Whitbread.—Describe what the nature of the exchequer-fee-money is, as contradistinguished from the other public money of the office?

Mr. Wilson.—I have no further knowledge of it than this, that it has always been the practice of the office, ever since I belonged to it, that certain sums of money, amounting to 3,000*l.* at a time, have been issued from the exchequer, and placed in the hands of the paymaster, for the purpose of paying those fees upon money received at the exchequer.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you ever yourself had the custody of the exchequer-fee-money?

Mr. Wilson.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you derive any profit or advantage from that custody?

Mr. Wilson.—I certainly did.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the average amount of the balance left in your hands of exchequer-fee-money?

Mr. Wilson.—It never could amount to 6,000*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Might not the advantage upon the average be computed at or about 300*l.* a year?

Mr. Wilson.—I do not think it possible that it could amount to so much.

Mr. Whitbread.—When was the exchequer-fee money delivered over into your custody?

Mr. Wilson.—I speak upon conjecture, but I believe some time about the year 1800.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long did it continue in your custody?

Mr. Wilson.—Until the treasurership of Mr. Canning, when I paid over the balance of exchequer fees into his paymaster's hands.

Mr. Whitbread.—Whom did you receive the exchequer-fee-money from?

Mr. Wilson.—Mr. Trotter.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had Mr. Trotter had it, to your knowledge, a considerable time previous to the period you last mentioned?

Mr. Wilson.—I presume Mr. Trotter had it from the time of his becoming paymaster of the navy.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did Mr. Trotter waive the custody of that exchequer-fee-money expressly for your benefit?

Mr. Wilson.—I presume that he did; he certainly derived an advantage from it himself, and I made the same use of it that he did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has not the exchequer-fee-money always been considered, according to the practice of the office, as a fund totally distinct from the other cash in the office?

Mr. Wilson.—In the course of my business in the office, I do not recollect that it has ever been made use of for any other purpose, unless for private advantage.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is it a fund totally distinguished from the other funds of the office?

Mr. Wilson.—It is not—it forms a part of the minor heads of service, which the commissioners of his majesty's navy direct.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are any other payments made from that fund, except for payment of exchequer fees.

Mr. Wilson.—None; excepting, I believe, small fees have been paid upon the declaration of the accounts of the treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are any payments made out of that fund, except for fees of one description or another, according to the course and practice of the office?

Mr. Wilson.—None that I know of.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you ever converse with lord Melville upon the business of the office?

Mr. Wilson.—I do not recollect that I ever did.

Then Mr. Thomas Wilson was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—You have been asked respecting a transaction in the year 1796, of a sum of 40,000*l.* that was drawn from the Bank, and paid to Mr. Pitt. Is that the same sum of money which was afterwards the subject of public inquiry in the House of Commons.

Mr. Wilson.—I believe so.

Mr. Plumer.—You have said that you were in the habit of laying out some of the public money for Mr. Trotter's private emolument, I desire to know whether, in any instance of your having done that, it was ever done with the privity and knowledge of lord Melville?

Mr. Wilson.—I solemnly believe not.

Mr. Plumer.—You were asked respecting some small payments: I understood you to state, that those small payments are not paid by the hand of the paymaster himself. By whom are the small payments, that are daily made in London, to sailors and their relatives, that call for very small sums, made?

Mr. Wilson.—Those small payments are made in the allotment branch of the Pay-office, and the payments themselves are made by Mr. Lawson, in that office, who is chief clerk to the cashier for the allotment branch.

Mr. Plumer.—Are there not also small payments in another branch for wages to seamen?

Mr. Wilson.—I do not know that of my own knowledge, because I do not belong to that department, but I am confident that small payments are made in vast numbers in the Pay branch.

Mr. Plumer.—Are those small payments, which you say you believe are made in vast numbers in the Pay branch, many of them even under the sum of twenty shillings?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe so.

Mr. Plumer.—Do they occur daily in considerable numbers in the allotment branch, under that sum?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe so.

Mr. Plumer.—To what description of persons are those small payments made?

Mr. Wilson.—They are made to the wives and to the children of sailors.

Mr. Plumer.—Does not the clerk who pays the money derive his supply of cash for that purpose from the paymaster?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe, in the first instance, the paymaster advances a certain sum of money to the chief of that department, and that the clerk who makes those small payments is supplied from him.

Mr. Plumer.—Are those payments always made in cash?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe so.

Mr. Plumer.—Are they so down to the present time?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe so.

A Lord.—Having stated to the Court that Mr. Trotter, in his absence, used to leave blank drafts which you filled up, and then made use of them by drawing upon the Bank, Have you any reason to know that lord Melville was acquainted that that trust was so reposed in you by Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Wilson.—I have no other reason to imagine it than this, that I had an authority, by virtue of a power of attorney from Mr. Trotter, to draw upon the Bank of England, and consequently I did draw by the blank checks signed by Mr. Trotter.

Lord Chancellor.—The question proposed to you is this:—Have you reason to know that lord Melville was acquainted with the trust reposed in you by Mr. Trotter, namely, that he left you blank drafts, which you filled up, and drew upon the Bank?

Mr. Wilson.—I never had any conversation with lord Melville upon that subject; and, for any thing I know, his lordship is perfectly ignorant, whether Mr. Trotter gave me any authority whatever.

A Lord.—Am I to understand that you are not able to swear that lord Melville was privy to that trust reposed in you by Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot swear it, any further, than by the evidence I have already given to the Court.

A Lord.—Are you able to swear, of your own knowledge, that lord Melville was acquainted with this trust?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot swear, on my knowledge, because no conversation ever passed between lord Melville and me upon the subject.

A Lord.—Had you the same trust reposed in you by Mr. Trotter, during the other treasurerships of Mr. Ryder, Mr. Bathurst, and Mr. Canning?

Mr. Wilson.—I certainly had.

A Lord.—Have you any reason to know, or can you swear, that these gentlemen were acquainted with it?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot swear to it, because I never had any conversation with those gentlemen upon the subject.

A Lord.—Was the draft for 40,000*l.* upon the Bank of England exactly for that sum?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot answer that question.

A Lord.—If you had not had blank drafts from Mr. Trotter, how could you have got that sum from the Bank of England?

Mr. Wilson.—I presume that I had drawn a much larger sum from the Bank of England, and placed it to the account of Mr. Trotter at Mr. Coutts's house, and from thence, that I had drawn the sum of 40,000*l.*

A Lord.—Are you certain that the 40,000*l.* or any part of it, was drawn from Mr. Coutts's house, and not directly from the Bank?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot swear to that; but I believe from Mr. Coutts's house.

A Lord.—You have stated, that a conversation passed between you and lord Melville himself; at what time did that conversation pass?

Mr. Wilson.—I cannot recollect.

A Lord.—In what year was it?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe it was in the year 1798; but I speak merely from guess.

A Lord.—Are you sure that lord Melville asked you, whether a certain sum of money could be spared from the public account?

Mr. Wilson.—To the best of my recollection, lord Melville did put that question to me.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville desire you to ask Mr. Trotter that question, or desire you yourself to bring that money?

Mr. Wilson.—My lord Melville desired me to bring it to him, Mr. Trotter being at that time in Scotland.

A Lord.—Did lord Melville propose to give you any authority for receiving that sum of money, or did he leave you to bring it under any authority you might have, independently of his lordship?

Mr. Wilson.—His lordship made no mention of that circumstance to me at all.

A Lord.—In this conversation with lord Melville, was the sum of 40,000*l.* being to be spared from the public office mentioned by his lordship to you, or by you to his lordship?

Mr. Wilson.—By me to his lordship.

A Lord.—Was any other sum mentioned to lord Melville?

Mr. Wilson.—Not to my recollection.

A Lord.—How did that sum of 40,000*l.* occur in the conversation?

Mr. Wilson.—It was upon my own suggestion, upon the examination of the books, that I thought that sum of 40,000*l.* could be spared.

A Lord.—Did you offer the 40,000*l.* as the amount of all that, at that time, could be spared?

Mr. Wilson.—I thought so.

A Lord.—In case of the absence of the paymaster from illness, or from any other cause, was it absolutely necessary that the business of the office should be performed by some other person acting for him?

Mr. Wilson.—Most unquestionably.

A Lord.—Having said, that it was necessary that the business of the office should be forwarded, in the absence of the paymaster; did your situation in the office, at that time, point you out obviously as the fittest person in whom that trust could be reposed, when such a trust became necessary?

Mr. Wilson.—Certainly, in my situation in the office, I was not next to the paymaster to carry on that duty in his absence; but the private friendship for, and confidence Mr. Trotter had in me, pointed me out, I presume, to him for that purpose.

A Lord.—Does any instance come within your knowledge, excepting that of your own, in which such delegation has been necessary from the absence of the paymaster; and, if so, has it been made by power of attorney, or in the same manner you executed this duty of Mr. Trotter's?

Mr. Wilson.—I know of no such circumstance.

A Lord.—Having said that this 40,000*l.* was spoken of by you to lord Melville, and not by lord Melville to you, and that from the examination of the books you stated that that sum could be spared, was that examination of the books at the time of this conversation?—were the books there?

Mr. Wilson.—No.

A Lord.—Were there two conversations, or one conversation?

Mr. Wilson.—Only one conversation, until such time as I paid the money.

A Lord.—If it was from the examination of the books, that you told lord Melville 40,000*l.* could be spared from the public money, had you made that examination previous to the conversation?

Mr. Wilson.—I had a general knowledge of the state of the balances, and every morning I had occasion to look into these books, and therefore I do not know whether I did either immediately preceding that conversation, or immediately afterwards, examine the books again.

A Lord.—From what did you make your calculation that that sum could be spared?

Mr. Wilson.—It requires a general knowledge of the Pay-office to be able to ascertain that, and I possessed that information.

A Lord.—Was this communication with lord Melville, upon the subject that this money could be spared, made verbally, in conversation with lord Melville, as you have stated it, or did you make any communication to his lordship in writing?

Mr. Wilson.—None in writing, it was all done verbally.

A Lord.—When you went to lord Melville upon the subject, at the time you had the conversation, did you know what you were going about?

Mr. Wilson.—I did not.

A Lord.—Had you authority to draw upon any other account than for Mr. Trotter's private use?

Mr. Wilson.—Certainly, for the public service.

A Lord.—Had you for any other purpose than the public service?

Mr. Wilson.—Yes, Mr. Trotter's private accounts.

A Lord.—Had you any other authority, but for the public service, or Mr. Trotter's private use?

Mr. Wilson.—I had not.

A Lord.—Nor in effect did you ever draw any, except for the public service, or for the private use of Mr. Trotter?

Mr. Wilson.—Never, to the best of my recollection, unless it was on account of the Exchequer fees, of which I made a private advantage.

A Lord.—To whom did you pay that 40,000*l.*?

Mr. Wilson.—I do not know into whose hands I paid the bank-notes, but it was in the presence of lord Melville and Mr. Long of the Treasury.

A Lord.—At the time that payment was made, did you receive any acknowledgment, or receipt of having made that payment?

Mr. Wilson.—None.

A Lord.—In what manner did you enter that sum of 40,000*l.* in your account?

Mr. Wilson.—I kept no account of it myself.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then George Swaffield, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—You have proved you have been upwards of sixty years in the Navy-pay-office: have you, during any part of that time, kept any part of the public money entrusted to you, except in the Bank of England or in your own possession?

Mr. Swaffield.—Not till of late years.

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you kept any part of it of late years at the house of Messieurs Coutts.

Mr. Swaffield.—That was the only private bank I ever made use of.

Mr. Whitbread.—Why did you put your money there?

Mr. Swaffield.—Mr. Trotter required it of me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you willing so to do?

Mr. Swaffield.—It was done reluctantly.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you find any convenience resulting from having the money at Mr. Coutts's.

Mr. Swaffield.—None at all.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you find it produced any confusion in your accounts?

Mr. Swaffield.—In two instances I was rather perplexed about it.

Then George Swaffield, esquire, was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Whether this desire of Mr. Trotter to you, to keep your money at Messieurs Coutts's, was a desire to which lord Melville was to your knowledge privy?

Mr. Swaffield.—I do not know that he was.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then the right honourable George Tierney was called.

Mr. Tierney stood in the gallery appointed for the House of Commons, from whence he offered to give evidence.

Lord Chancellor.—I think there ought to be no difference between one witness and another, as to the place in which he is examined. It is the privilege of the lords to say where a witness is to be placed upon his examination.

Mr. Tierney.—My lords——

Lord Chancellor.—I apprehend we can hear no argument from a member of the House of Commons; and that, if the gentleman is to be examined, he must stand in the witness' place.

Mr. Whitbread.—While Mr. Tierney is coming round to the witness' box, I wish the clerk may be directed to read the balances proved to be signed, as delivered in by Mr. Wilson, accompanied by the letter of Mr. Bathurst, who was then treasurer of the navy.

Then the following papers were delivered in and read:

“Navy-pay-office, 2nd February 1803.

“Gentlemen;

“In conformity to your precepts of the 17th and 25th ultimo, I have the honour to transmit herewith an account of the balances of public money in the hands of the treasurer of his majesty's navy for the time being, his different cashiers or sub-accountants, made up to the 31st of December in each year, since 1790, with the amount of the sums standing in the treasurer's name, in the Bank at such periods.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen,

Your most obedient

And most humble servant,

CHARLES BRAGGE.

Commissioners of Naval Enquiry,
&c. &c. &c.”

An ACCOUNT of the Balances of Public Money in the Hands of the Treasurer of His Majesty's Navy, his different Cashiers or Sub-accountants, made up to the 31st of December in each Year, since 1790, with the Amount of the Sums standing in the Treasurer's Name in the Bank at such Periods.

| 31st December.                                                                                           | 1790.         | 1791.         | 1792.         | 1793.         | 1794.         | 1795.          | 1796.        |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------|---------------|---------------|---------------|---------------|----------------|--------------|
|                                                                                                          | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.       | £. s. d.     |
| The Treasurer of the Navy.....                                                                           | 102,897 16 1½ | 93,443 7 2    | 88,219 1 5    | 148,012 9 0   | 190,119 5 5   | 555,755 4 2    | 255,261 11 9 |
| Cashier of the Navy .....                                                                                | 10,792 2 9½   | 27,487 13 3½  | 21,856 6 7½   | 54,636 18 0   | 70,181 19 11  | 185,400 14 5½  | 63,900 9 11  |
| Cashier of Victualling .....                                                                             | 3,109 10 8½   | 26,920 11 4   | 8,684 10 7    | 20,041 15 11½ | 88,193 9 8½   | 86,070 14 7½   | 11,059 1 2   |
| Deputy Paymaster .....                                                                                   | 81,276 11 5½  | 68,007 10 0½  | 77,221 14 10½ | 73,583 9 1½   | 75,404 17 0   | 77,724 9 4     | 71,485 19 10 |
| Cashiers at Portsmouth .....                                                                             | 66,086 12 0   | 52,854 0 2    | 49,327 1 1½   | 88,200 6 4½   | 114,829 14 11 | 76,132 14 10½  | 79,231 5 1   |
| Cashiers at Plymouth.....                                                                                | 61,195 14 5½  | 51,047 5 4½   | 47,308 4 3½   | 72,074 11 0   | 94,903 8 3½   | 75,797 1 11½   | 76,879 11 0½ |
| Cashiers at Chatham .....                                                                                | 53,995 10 4½  | 49,318 11 1½  | 37,212 15 3½  | 56,943 11 4½  | 59,532 8 6    | 60,167 9 4½    | 69,206 17 8½ |
| Cashiers at Sheerness .....                                                                              | —             | —             | —             | —             | —             | —              | —            |
| Cashier of Allotment .....                                                                               | —             | —             | —             | —             | —             | 2,249 12 9½    | 2,469 7 1½   |
| Exchequer Fees .....                                                                                     | 6,509 14 10   | 7,167 16 6    | 6,702 6 11    | 5,780 9 9     | 7,668 1 6     | 13,668 1 6     | 9,484 4 11   |
| Aggregate of Treasurer's Balances                                                                        | 385,863 12 1  | 376,246 15 0½ | 336,532 1 0½  | 519,273 10 7  | 700,833 5 2½  | 1,132,966 3 0½ | 638,978 8 6  |
| Balances of Account of the Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy at the Bank at the Periods above stated ..... | 102,897 16 1  | 73,454 17 6   | 61,742 1 9    | 120,986 11 3  | 161,360 17 8  | 525,438 8 1    | 179,848 6 9  |

(Continued from preceding page.)

| 31st December.                                                                                          | 1797.          | 1798.         | 1799.         | 1800.         | 1801.         | 1802.        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------|---------------|---------------|---------------|---------------|--------------|
|                                                                                                         | £. s. d.       | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.      | £. s. d.     |
| (1st Column repeated.)                                                                                  |                |               |               |               |               |              |
| The Treasurer of the Navy .....                                                                         | 160,453 8 4    | 196,301 10 6  | 353,051 4 0   | 386,422 9 6   | 429,663 0 0   | 127,000 0 0  |
| Cashier of the Navy .....                                                                               | 144,907 15 11½ | 109,724 6 0   | 93,746 2 1½   | 121,131 11 8½ | 1,606 11 1    | 6,098 8 1½   |
| Cashier of Victualling.....                                                                             | 39,074 8 8½    | 54,969 1 6½   | 50,356 11 7½  | 60,221 6 7½   | 75,440 12 11½ | 16,069 11 6½ |
| Deputy Paymaster .....                                                                                  | 33,246 0 6½    | 33,567 12 11½ | 33,995 17 8½  | 49,026 10 9½  | 59,430 17 3   | 7,686 8 2    |
| Cashiers at Portsmouth .....                                                                            | 30,344 4 0½    | 24,036 6 6½   | 26,935 16 3½  | 76,117 1 5½   | 124,410 14 1½ | 16,947 9 9½  |
| Cashiers at Plymouth .....                                                                              | 34,561 14 11   | 39,749 14 6   | 40,314 7 11½  | 101,817 14 6½ | 125,540 0 9   | 39,549 16 8½ |
| Cashiers at Chatham .....                                                                               | 23,154 13 1½   | 16,898 3 9    | 23,580 18 10½ | 42,664 14 7½  | 61,273 0 4½   | 29,430 14 8½ |
| Cashiers at Sheerness .....                                                                             | —              | —             | —             | 39,601 11 0½  | 54,391 17 6   | 475 8 6½     |
| Cashier of Allotment .....                                                                              | 2,682 17 9     | 17,260 15 5½  | 44,364 1 5½   | 4,919 11 5½   | 6,694 19 6    | 12,425 18 6½ |
| Exchequer Fees .....                                                                                    | 12,478 6 7     | 12,278 17 11  | 21,278 17 11  | 14,587 6 7    | 12,765 19 11  | 12,540 0 0   |
| Aggregate of Treasurer's Balances                                                                       | 480,903 9 11½  | 504,786 9 1½  | 687,623 18 0½ | 896,509 18 4½ | 951,217 13 5½ | 268,230 3 9½ |
| Balances of Account of the Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy at the Bank at the Periods above stated..... | 101,812 13 6   | 142,160 15 6  | 298,910 9 0   | 386,422 9 6   | 429,663 0 0   | 127,000 0 0  |

THOMAS WILSON.

Mr. Whitbread.—There was another paper of balances, the letter accompanying which was signed George Canning, Mr. Canning being then treasurer of the Navy: if the learned counsel will admit Mr. Canning's hand-writing it may save the time of the court.

Lord Chancellor.—The signature of Mr. Canning will not, any more than the signature of Mr. Bathurst, prove any thing, unless the figures are shown to be made by himself.

Then Mr. Thomas Wilson was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know the hand writing upon the paper now in your hand?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe it to be the hand writing of Mr. Gandy, belonging to the Navy-pay-office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are these returns of balances, to the commissioners of naval inquiry, the result of your own calculation?

Mr. Wilson.—I am not competent to answer that question.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. William Gandy was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a clerk in the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Gandy.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that paper in your hand of your hand writing?

Mr. Gandy.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that the return to the precept of the naval commissioners, requiring returns from the office, of the balances of the treasurer of the Navy?

Mr. Gandy.—I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is it?

Mr. Gandy.—It appears to be an account of balances of public money in the hands of the treasurer of the navy.

Mr. Whitbread.—By whom were you directed to make up that paper?

Mr. Gandy.—I rather suppose by Mr. Wilson, being a clerk under his branch; part of this writing is in Mr. Wilson's hand, and part in my own.

Lord Chancellor.—Is all of it in either your hand or that of Mr. Wilson?

Mr. Gandy.—The balances are in Mr. Wilson's hand-writing.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Mr. Thomas Wilson was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Speak to the part of this paper which is in your own hand writing?

Mr. Wilson.—Upon examination of the figures, I see they are of my writing; the title of the account, and the other parts are not.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are the figures of the calculation, which is the material part, of your hand-writing?

Mr. Wilson.—I believe so.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were these figures made by you in return to the precept by the commissioners of naval inquiry?

Mr. Wilson.—I do not recollect this particular account being made out, in consequence of the precept from the commissioners of naval inquiry, but I believe that it is a return to the requisitions of the commissioners of naval inquiry.

Lord Chancellor.—Did you make those figures as a public officer of the board?

Mr. Wilson.—I did.

Lord Chancellor.—From public documents in the office?

Mr. Wilson.—Certainly I did.

Then Mr. Thomas Wilson was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—From what materials in the office did you make that paper.

Mr. Wilson.—From books of balances, which were kept by the paymaster.

Mr. Plumer.—Did you make the examination yourself of those books, and make the entry in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Wilson.—Most unquestionably; I could do it from no other source.

The paper was delivered in, and is as follows:

“Navy-pay-office, 3d July, 1804.

“Gentlemen;

“In answer to your requisition of the 12th ultimo, I have the honour to inclose herewith an account of the balance of public money in the hands of the treasurer of the Navy, on the 31st of December in each year, from 1785, to 1789, inclusive, showing the sums in the hands of the different cashiers or sub-accountants, and the amount of the sums standing in the name of the treasurer at the Bank at those periods, according to the form in which the account was rendered on the second of February, 1803.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen,

Your most obedient humble servant,

GEORGE CANNING.

The Commissioners of Naval Enquiry.”

An ACCOUNT of the Balances of the Public Money in the Hands of the Treasurer of the Navy, his different Cashiers or Sub-accountants, made up to the 31st of December in the following Years, with the Amount of Sums standing in the Treasurer's Name in the Bank at such Periods.

| 31st Day of December.                                                                                   | 1784.   |       | 1785.   |       | 1786.   |       | 1787.   |       | 1788.   |       | 1789.   |        |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|-------|---------|-------|---------|-------|---------|-------|---------|-------|---------|--------|
|                                                                                                         | £.      | s. d. | £.      | s. d. | £.      | s. d. | £.      | s. d. | £.      | s. d. | £.      | s. d.  |
| The Treasurer of the Navy .....                                                                         | 70,831  | 13 7  | 113,651 | 16 7  | 81,942  | 0 1   | 459,369 | 11 8  | 57,779  | 8 11½ | 106,281 | 15 10½ |
| Cashier of the Navy .....                                                                               | 30,081  | 1 6½  | 48,007  | 6 9½  | 1,527   | 12 6½ | 5,026   | 16 4½ | 1,954   | 14 9  | 6,894   | 5 7½   |
| Cashier of the Victualling .....                                                                        | 10,662  | 9 11½ | 27,914  | 8 6½  | 6,331   | 10 2½ | 7,943   | 8 5½  | 3,980   | 8 7½  | 5,839   | 5 8½   |
| Deputy Paymaster.....                                                                                   | 13,943  | 4 5½  | 20,619  | 3 0   | 19,585  | 3 8½  | 52,140  | 6 9½  | 58,251  | 13 8  | 65,891  | 2 6½   |
| Cashiers at Portsmouth .....                                                                            | 3,952   | 16 9½ | 1,201   | 16 9½ | 6,840   | 1 3½  | 52,052  | 7 5½  | 43,963  | 9 9½  | 42,589  | 14 10  |
| Cashiers at Plymouth.....                                                                               | 15,232  | 15 2½ | 27,712  | 12 6½ | 30,151  | 5 11½ | 36,121  | 14 9  | 30,724  | 5 5½  | 41,480  | 6 4    |
| Cashiers at Chatham .....                                                                               | 32,988  | 8 4½  | 32,900  | 18 1½ | 33,562  | 4 9   | 39,914  | 17 5  | 37,663  | 4 4½  | 38,585  | 17 6   |
| Cashiers at Sheerness.....                                                                              | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —      |
| Cashier of Allotments.....                                                                              | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —     | —       | —      |
| Exchequer Fees .....                                                                                    | 3,000   | 0 0   | 3,812   | 13 6  | 6,000   | 0 0   | 6,000   | 0 0   | 4,503   | 8 9   | 7,503   | 8 9    |
|                                                                                                         | 180,692 | 9 11  | 275,820 | 15 11 | 185,939 | 18 7½ | 658,569 | 2 10½ | 238,820 | 14 4  | 315,065 | 17 1½  |
| Balances of Account of the Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy in the Bank at the Periods above stated..... | 64,331  | 13 7  | 9,026   | 10 8  | 25,942  | 0 1   | 406,269 | 11 8  | 9,179   | 8 11  | 52,481  | 15 10  |

Mr. Whitbread.—There is an error in this account, from leaving out one of the accounts of lord Melville at the Bank, in the year 1785, as was stated by the Commons the other day. The accountant who made out this paper, did not take into consideration all the accounts lord Melville had at the Bank at that time; one was left out, and therefore the balance of 9,026*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* ought to have been increased in favour of lord Melville to so much more as the account contained; that is to say, the account opened by Mr. Douglas immediately after the passing the act of parliament, from July 1785 to January 1786: whatever stood upon that account ought to be added to the balance at that time. Subject to that correction, the whole account is perfectly correct.

Lord Chancellor.—How do you establish that?

Mr. Whitbread.—By reference to the books of the Bank of England at that time.

Lord Chancellor.—Do you prove that?

Mr. Whitbread.—It is an admission in favour of lord Melville; but we can prove it, if your lordships please. We wish to have the whole of this paper printed.

Mr. Plumer.—Will the honourable manager state what is the sum which ought to be added to the account?

Mr. Whitbread.—I will give the learned counsel the sum by and by.

Then the right honourable George Tierney was called, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you, at any time, treasurer of the Navy?

Mr. Tierney.—My lords, before I answer that question, I presume I may be permitted to clear myself, from what may otherwise appear to be a want of respect to your lordships; there was nothing more remote from my intention than to show any thing other than the most complete deference to the order and proceeding of this Court, neither have I any personal motive for presuming to protest, as to the place in which I am examined. I felt that the courtesy of every court in the kingdom would have allowed me to be examined in any place in which I might be sitting, when called as a witness, and being in that place as one of the Commons, not an indifferent spectator, but here, in a committee of the whole house, to make good the charges against lord Melville, I did feel that I should be wanting in that respect which was due to them, did I not endeavour to maintain my right and privilege of being examined in my place, in which, as a member of the House of Commons, I attended.* Having protested against the place in which I now stand, I will proceed to answer the questions of the honourable manager.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you at any time treasurer of the Navy?

Mr. Tierney.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did you undertake that office?

Mr. Tierney.—Sometime towards the end of the month of May, 1803.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you execute the duties of that office personally?

Mr. Tierney.—I did, during the time I had the honour to hold that office, all that I conceived it incumbent upon me to do in the discharge of the duties of it; that is, I gave to the office my general and pretty constant superintendence.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you give a power of attorney to any person to execute the duties of the office as paymaster?

Mr. Tierney.—I did, in the first instance, to Mr. Alexander Trotter, whom I found in possession of that office, and who had held it for a number of years preceding the time of my appointment; and afterwards, at the distance of about a month or six weeks, I removed Mr. Trotter, for the purpose of appointing another gentleman, Mr. Latham.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did Mr. Latham execute the duties of the office of paymaster during the time you held the office.

Mr. Tierney.—He did, till I resigned the office in the month of May, 1804.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had he full authority to draw for all the public cash, as paymaster?

Mr. Tierney.—He acted under the same power which preceding paymasters had acted under; at least my direction was, that the power to him should be so drawn.

Mr. Whitbread.—In the absence of Mr. Latham, who would have been, according to the course of practice in the office, to execute his office?

Mr. Tierney.—It was one of the inconveniences which I found in the office, that if the paymaster were occasionally absent, there was no officer in that department who officially would have succeeded him; consequently, the burthen of the office would have fallen personally upon myself, as far as related to drawing upon the Bank of England.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had any other person authority from you to draw for public money, except Mr. Trotter in the first instance, and Mr. Latham, in the second?

Mr. Tierney.—No other person whatever.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was any alteration made during your treasurership, in the manner of conducting the business, with respect to drawing money from the Bank of England?

Mr. Tierney.—A very considerable alteration took place almost immediately upon the appointment of Mr. Latham, an alteration for which I was indebted to a suggestion of Mr. Trotter. Mr. Trotter stated to me that an inconvenience might arise, and even danger accrue, from the practice of sending messengers to the Bank of England to bring back money to the office.

* The privilege here asserted by Mr. Tierney appears to be consistent with the general parliamentary usage, although an instance to the contrary occurred on the trial of Warren Hastings. See Mr. Hatsell's note on this subject, 4 Precedents, 288, ed. of 1818.

Lord Chancellor.—What Mr. Trotter said is certainly no evidence whatever against lord Melville.

Mr. Whitbread.—The purpose for which the Commons wished to introduce it is this, because the word write-off, has been introduced in evidence, and we wish to explain that. Was any thing done, by way of communication from Mr. Trotter to you, as to altering the mode of placing money to the account of the sub-accountants, in the Bank of England?

Mr. Tierney.—The alteration which took place under my direction was this;—that heretofore it had been the custom for the sub-accountants to wait upon the paymaster in the morning, stating what sum they should probably want, in order to carry on the current transactions of the day; and upon this representation a draft was drawn upon the Bank, and messengers dispatched with it, who came back bringing home the money which was delivered to the sub-accountant. The alteration I made was this, that when a sub-accountant applied to the paymaster for a sum of money, no such proceeding took place as a draft being given by the paymaster upon the Bank of England; the mode to obviate that necessity, adopted by me, was this—that four different accounts were raised at the Bank, in the names of the four principal clerks who had the payment of the money; and these accounts being so raised in the Bank books, instead of their being put in cash by the paymaster's draft, the paymaster wrote to the Bank an order, stating—write off from my account to the account of the sub-accountant in question, the sum which he had stated to be necessary for carrying on the ordinary payments.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know whether in the course of the office, any payments are made by the treasurer or his paymaster?

Mr. Tierney.—Certainly not; there are some exceptions, but they are very rare.

Then the right honourable George Tierney, was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—I understand you to state that the alteration made, was a direction to write off a sum from one account to another account; is that the alteration?

Mr. Tierney.—Certainly.

Mr. Plumer.—You have stated the form of the order that was given upon that occasion; please to repeat what the form of the order was.

Mr. Tierney.—The form of the order to the Bank, to the best of my recollection, but I have not had possession of one of these drafts for two years, was, "Write off from my account to the account of Mr. Swaffield, Mr. Davis, Mr. Slade, or Mr. John Swaffield such a sum."—The Bank would then obey that instruction, and that sub-accountant would find himself possessed of a sum at the Bank, for which he might draw as should appear to him to be convenient.

Mr. Plumer.—I presume that was the whole form of the draft, as near as you can recollect, which was given upon that occasion?

Mr. Tierney.—My recollection does not furnish me with any other answer.

Mr. Plumer.—Whether the drafts went on to specify any head of service, or only in general terms, to have it written off from one account to another?

Mr. Tierney.—To the best of my recollection it would be unnecessary so to do, because the account was opened at the Bank in the name of the sub-accountant, stating for what particular branch; therefore the direction to write off, explained what the nature of the payment was to be.

Mr. Plumer.—Did the sub-accountants keep any official or private accounts at the Bank?

Mr. Tierney.—I know of no other accounts than the accounts to which I have alluded.

Mr. Plumer.—Prior to the order in question was it usual for the sub-accountants to keep an official account at the Bank, or such an account as they might keep any where else?

Mr. Tierney.—I apprehend that, officially, the sub-accountants kept no account at the Bank; what they might do for their individual convenience is that of which I can have no cognizance.

Mr. Plumer.—Individually they might keep an account at the Bank, but that was not an official account?

Mr. Tierney.—I understand it so.

Mr. Plumer.—After the alteration took place, did it still continue to be the usage of the office to make small payments in cash, at Somerset House?

Mr. Tierney.—I apprehend that new regulation, which I have endeavoured to describe, created no alteration whatever in the practice of the office, but only affected the mode of bringing money from the Bank to the office.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know that small payments to a considerable amount were made daily, at the office at Somerset House, in the proper departments?

Mr. Tierney.—I know it as well as I can know any thing which I did not actually see. I apprehend there is not the least doubt upon the subject, but not having seen the actual payments made I cannot undertake to swear to it.

Mr. Plumer.—I understood you to say, that you gave a power of attorney, first to Mr. Trotter and afterwards to Mr. Latham, to execute the duty of paymaster, and to act as your deputy?

Mr. Tierney.—I did.

Mr. Plumer.—After that, was the general detail of all receipts and payments left to that officer?

Mr. Tierney.—The general detail of receipts and payments was left to that officer. I frequently superintended the nature of the accounts. I had, from time to time, references made to me upon any difficulties that might occur; and I might state more than that; that I held it my duty, whether difficulties occurred or not, as much as possible, to superintend the general state of the cash at the office.

Mr. Plumer.—Was the detail of the business of receipts and payments of each day, gone through by the paymaster?

Mr. Tierney.—Certainly, unless any payment was claimed, about which there might be some doubt: all the ordinary payments were made in the way the learned counsel supposes.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—We next propose to call Mr. Latham, who was paymaster to Mr. Tierney.

Then William Ashby Latham, esquire, was called in, and, being sworn was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you paymaster to Mr. Tierney whilst he was treasurer of the navy?

Mr. Latham.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you act in all the official concerns of the treasurership of the navy, under a power of attorney, given you by Mr. Tierney?

Mr. Latham.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you make any payment yourself personally, as paymaster of the navy, or issue all the money to the sub-accountants for that purpose?

Mr. Latham.—I never made any personal payments, I always issued money for that purpose to the sub-accountants.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the cash balance, during your paymastership, in the Bank of England?

Mr. Latham.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you delegate the power given you by Mr. Tierney to any body else?

Mr. Latham.—Never.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you practise the mode of carrying money yourself to the sub-accountants by write-off?

Mr. Latham.—I did.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did these write-offs bear upon the face of them the different branches of navy, victualling, and pay.

Mr. Latham.—Not that I recollect. The name of each individual accountant was stated upon the write-off.

Then William Ashby Latham, esquire, was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—How long did you continue in the office of paymaster?

Mr. Latham.—Ten months.

Mr. Plumer.—Did it happen to you to be sick or absent during that time?

Mr. Latham.—To have been absent once, on account of sickness in my family, for about a week.

Mr. Plumer.—Who did the business for you during that week.

Mr. Latham.—What it was necessary to attend to, Mr. Tierney officiated for me in my absence—the drafts were sent to me at my house in Brook-street.

Mr. Plumer.—You had no other interruption from attending your duty, except that week's sickness?

Mr. Latham.—Never that I recollect.

Mr. Plumer.—After the sum was written off to the sub-accountant, had the sub-accountant the full control over all the money so written off at the Bank?

Mr. Latham.—He certainly had.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons wish to put a paper in evidence before your lordships, in confirmation of the evidence adduced yesterday, of a certain loan having been advanced by Mr. Sprot. Mr. Sprot stated that he made an advance of money to Mr. Trotter, upon the security of Mr. Robert Dundas, added to the security of certain portions of stock.

Mr. Plumer.—I admit the signature to this paper to be the hand-writing of lord Melville.

Then the said paper was read, and is as follows:

“London, 16th May, 1800.

Messrs. Thomas Coutts & Co.

There is now standing in my name at the Bank;

£.11,250 0 0 New Five per Cent Annuities.

8,433 14 11 Reduced Three per Cent Annuities.

3,566 5 1 Consolidated Three per Cent Annuities, and in my name in the books of the East-India Company, being part of a larger sum.

1,000 0 0 East-India Company's Stock.

“All of which Sums I hereby authorise and direct you to sell, or transfer, agreeably to any directions you may receive from Mark Sprot, esq. whose order for the transfer, or receipt for the produce, shall be to you a sufficient discharge.

“HENRY DUNDAS.”

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—By that paper it would appear that the loyalty and the reduced, were lord Melville's; and that orders were thereby given to Mr. Coutts to transfer or convey to Mr. Mark Sprot those sums. I wish now to call your lordships attention to the sum of 13,500*l.* East-India stock, to show that the assertion made by Mr. Trotter, that this stock was always kept under his own control is correct, by the evidence in Mr. Montague Lind's hand-writing, being a direction as to that stock.

Then Mr. Francis Lind was again called in, and -examined as follows :

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the name at the bottom of that paper your brother's hand-writing, Mr. Montague Lind's?

Mr. Lind.—It is, to the best of my belief.

Mr. Whitbread.—This is an original receipt and transfer from the East-India Company of 13,500*l.* of their principal stock. Is that also your brother Montague Lind's hand-writing?

Mr. Lind.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—And the direction to Coutts and company upon the back of that receipt, how to appropriate that stock?

Mr. Plumer.—This paper certainly cannot be any evidence if we object to it, unless it were brought home to the defendant; but I do not wish to object to it.

Lord Chancellor.—It is a declaration of Mr. Lind; but it is accompanied with the transactions to which it relates.

Mr. Plumer.—I do not object to it.

Then the paper was read, and is as follows :

“ East-India Stock, £.13,500.

“ London, the 1st Day of Dec. 1795.

“ Received of Thomas Coutts, Edmund Antrobus, and Coutts Trotter, esqrs. the sum of five shillings, being in full for thirteen thousand five hundred pounds in the principal stock, and proportionable part of the fund due to the United Company of Merchants of England, trading to the East Indies, this day transferred in the said Company's books unto the said Thomas Coutts, Edmund Antrobus, and Coutts Trotter, esqrs...... £ 0 5 0

“ MONTAGUE LIND.”

“ Witness, J. ROGERS.”

Mr. Plumer.—On the back of it there is a direction from Mr. Lind how that stock was to be disposed of.

Then the indorsement was read, and is as follows :

“ London, 1st Dec. 1795.

“ Messrs. Thomas Coutts and Co.

“ I have this day transferred into your names the sum of thirteen thousand five hundred pounds East India Stock, mentioned on the other side, and I desire you will hold the same, with all dividends to grow due thereon, at the disposal of Alexander Trotter, esq. of the Navy-pay-office, on whose account, and by whose desire it has hitherto stood in my name; I having myself no interest in the said stock.

“ MONTAGUE LIND, Examinant.”

Mr. Lind.—The upper part of this paper is not written by my brother; the signature only is his.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—This confirms Mr. Trotter's evidence as to the 13,500*l.* India stock being kept at his disposal in the name of Mr. Lind. I mean now to show that Mr. Sprot actually received the control over this stock, which was given him by lord Melville.

Then Mark Sprot, esquire, was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Whitbread.—You were asked yesterday to give the Court information as to the value of a draft which you received from Mr. Alexander Trotter, to the amount of 1,427*l.* You said, you had left your banking-book behind; now look at that book which is put into your hand: can you ascertain, from that book, that you received that sum?

Mr. Sprot.—Yes, 1,427*l.* and there were odd shillings and pence which I put in my pocket. I received it in Bank notes. I have been, since I was examined by the committee, to my bankers, and traced the notes; the bankers were so good as to look over the notes, and I found the Bank notes numbers, with which I furnished the committee; so that I received this money from Mr. Trotter, I presume, but I cannot say.

Mr. Whitbread.—Look at that paper. [Letter, dated 16th May, 1800, from lord Melville to Messieurs Coutts and Company.] Is the signature at the bottom of it your writing?

Mr. Sprot.—It is my hand-writing.

It was read, and is as follows :

“ London, 11th May, 1800.

“ Messieurs Thomas Coutts and Co. I write this to acknowledge your having transferred the sums of stocks mentioned on the other side, agreeably to directions given you by me, and I have received the produce of the sales, which I have paid into your hands, amounting to 20,452*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*”

Mr. Whitbread.—Now refer to the other side of that paper, and state whether the stock there mentioned, and directed to be transferred to you by lord Melville, constituted a part of the security, upon which you made the advance of 51,500*l.* to the joint security of Mr. Robert Dundas.

Mr. Sprot.—I presume that it was, but I have no recollection of it; I have no shadow of recollection of it. I have read this paper, and I declare that I have no more recollection of it than the child unborn.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that the stock for which you signed your name, as having received, and for which you paid the consideration of 20,000*l.* was the stock which formed part of the security, together with that of Mr. Robert Dundas, for the loan you advanced?

Mr. Sprot.—I see from this paper, that certainly this stock must have been sold by me, and consols bought, which with the 14,500*l.* India made the amount of the sum which I lent Mr. Robert Dundas, but I have no recollection of that paper at all.

Mr. Whitbread.—We beg that paper may be put in as evidence.

Then Mark Sprot, esquire, was cross-examined as follows :

Mr. Plumer.—If you now have any memory of the transaction, I would ask whether the stock was then sold out or not ?

Mr. Sprot.—Certainly the stock was sold out, and I presume by myself, for I remember perfectly well that I would not lend the honorable Robert Saunders Dundas upon loyalty, because it was a heavy stock, and that I would lend it upon consols, but not upon that.

A Lord.—Had you any interview with lord Melville in Scotland ?

Mr. Sprot.—Not a shadow ; I have not seen his lordship these four or five years till I saw him in this court ; not the least interview, nor with his son, the honourable Robert Saunders Dundas. I have neither seen the one nor the other, nor had any communion or communication, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, we wish now to put another paper in evidence, a letter written by lord Melville, also ; which is a direction to Mr. Coutts to pay the balance of his first treasurership, dated July, 1805. This comes in corroboration of the evidence we have formerly adduced, that that balance was paid in July, 1805.

Mr. Plumer.—I admit it to be lord Melville's signature.

The letter was read, and is as follows :

" Grosvenor-square, 27th July, 1805.

" Gentlemen ;

" I request that you will pay, on my account, into his majesty's exchequer, the sum of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.* being the balance due by me as treasurer of the navy, for my first treasurership, ending the 10th April, 1783.

" I am, gentlemen,

" Your most obedient and humble servant,

" MELVILLE.

" The right honourable lord viscount Melville, for his first treasurership of the navy, ending the 10th April, 1783.

" Imprest money. repaid, 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.*

" Paid into lord Camden's office, 27th July, 1805.

" Thomas Coutts, esq. and Co."

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, I understand that Mr. Bathurst, who has just been examined before your lordships, wishes he may be permitted to explain a part of his evidence.

The right honourable Charles Bragge Bathurst was again called in.

Mr. Bathurst.—Conceiving that my conduct has become, in some measure, a matter of your lordships' consideration ; I wish to take the liberty of rectifying what appears to me to be a mistake, with respect to the balance of the sub-accountants. I certainly understood, that upon the regulation which I directed, of removing the paymaster's balances, from the private bankers to the Bank of England, that the private balances likewise of the sub-accountants were to be removed at that time, and I am confident that accounts were raised at the Bank of England, in the names of the sub-accountants, at the same time that the alteration took place with respect to the paymaster's accounts.—Whether those accounts are to be considered as official or not, is not within my knowledge ; but it was a part of the arrangement, that the accounts of the sub-accountants, as well as of the paymaster, should be removed to the Bank of England, and it was so done.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Bernard Cobbe, esquire, was called in again, and examined as follows :

Mr. Whitbread.—Whether if lord Melville, had offered any payment on the account of his ex-treasurership balances—

Mr. Plumer.—Your lordships may remember that this subject has been inquired into, and I believe by this same witness.

Mr. Whitbread.—If it is proved in evidence already before your lordships, the Commons do not wish to trouble your lordships with it.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—My lords, the Commons wish to make a small and short addition to the evidence they gave your lordships, respecting the tenth charge.—Your lordships will recollect that a draft for 2,000*l.* was proved to be drawn by Mr. Douglas, on the 25th May, 1785, in favour of George Swaffield.

Mr. Swaffield was called to prove he had never received that draft, or the produce of it. It was also in evidence before your lordships, that on that very day, the 25th May, 1785, 2,000*l.* was paid into the account of lord Melville, at his bankers, Messieurs Drummonds ; what I now propose to offer is, as there was some doubt whether Mr. Swaffield had not filled up, or drawn himself drafts upon the Bank, in the time of Mr. Douglas ; I propose now to produce to your lordships a draft which was drawn on the 25th May, 1785, by Mr. Douglas, in favour of Mr. Swaffield ; I shall first call Mr. Swaffield, who will prove it is signed by Mr. Douglas, and filled up in the hand-writing of Mr. Douglas.

Then George Swaffield, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows :

Mr. Giles.—Is that draft in your hand, signed and filled up by Mr. Douglas, who was the paymaster to lord Melville?

Mr. Swaffield.—It is.

Mr. Giles.—Is it signed and filled up by him?

Mr. Swaffield.—The whole of it is in Mr. Douglas's own hand writing.

The same was read, and is as follows:

" 25th May, 1785.

" No. 6,021. I. New Account.

" Pay George Swaffield, esq. or bearer, two thousand pounds on account of the right honourable Henry Dundas.

ANDREW DOUGLAS."

£.2,000.

D. B.

" To the Cashiers of the Bank. A. S."

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—I will now call the Bank clerk, who will prove the payment of that draft.

Then Mr. Alexander Simpson was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Are you a clerk in the Bank, and were you so in the year 1785?

Mr. Simpson.—Yes.

Mr. Giles.—Did you pay that draft I now put into your hand?

Mr. Simpson.—I did.

Mr. Giles.—Can you state from any mark in your hand writing upon that draft, whether it was paid in Bank notes or not?

Mr. Simpson.—Yes, that it was paid in Bank notes.

Mr. Giles.—Can you state what notes they were, that constituted this payment?

Mr. Simpson.—I cannot.

Mr. Giles.—Have you any books, to which you could refer, in the Bank, to establish that fact?

Mr. Simpson.—I cannot say whether the books are destroyed or in being.

Mr. Giles.—What are the kind of books that would exhibit that?

Mr. Simpson.—There are, or were, books that could tell exactly the kind of notes they would be.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—I have shown that this draft was paid in Bank notes. I mean to show that the 2,000*l.* that was paid in on the same day to the account of lord Melville, at Messieurs Drummond's, was paid in two Bank notes of 1,000*l.* each—the reason why I cannot trace that these were the identical notes is, that the Bank book in which it would appear whether they were the original notes or not, is destroyed.

Then Mr. Thomas Rippon was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Are there any books in the Bank, or were there any, from whence it ought to appear in the regular course of business, what particular notes were paid for that draft?

Mr. Rippon.—There are no particular books at this time.

Mr. Giles.—Were there any books in 1785, which, according to the ordinary course of business, would show, by what notes, drafts, at that time carried into the Bank, were paid?

Mr. Rippon.—There were.

Mr. Giles.—Are those books now in existence?

Mr. Rippon.—No, they are not, they are destroyed.

Mr. Giles.—Do you know how those books came to be destroyed?

Mr. Rippon.—They were destroyed in consequence of want of room in the Bank library.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then Charles Drummond, esq., was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Giles.—Can you by reference to any book, in your own hand-writing, state in what the 2,000*l.* that was paid into the account of lord Melville, on the 25th of May, 1785, was paid?

Mr. Drummond.—To Andrew Douglas, esquire, two one thousand pound notes.

Lord Chancellor.—What book is that?

Mr. Drummond.—A waste-book in my own hand-writing.

[The witness reads.]

" Andrew Douglas, esquire, 1,000*l.* note, No. 350—£.1,000, No. £.2,000 Credit.

" Right honourable Henry Dundas."

Mr. Giles.—Does that import that the two one thousand pound notes were paid in by Andrew Douglas, to the credit of Mr. Henry Dundas?

Mr. Drummond.—It does.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Giles.—My lords, we have no other evidence upon this head.

Mr. Whitbread.—We wish to call one or two witnesses only upon the subject of the release that has been given in evidence.

Then Mr. James Gibson, was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a writer to the signet, in Scotland?

Mr. Gibson.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you transact business generally as a writer to the signet, in Scotland?

Mr. Gibson.—To a considerable extent.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you conversant in drawing releases between parties?

Mr. Gibson.—I have seen a great deal of that business.

Mr. Whitbread.—Read to yourself a clause in that release, which begins "and they have either mutually delivered up to each other."—Is that a usual and ordinary clause in releases?

Mr. Gibson.—I never saw any clause of the kind.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—There is a point which has come within this last half hour to the knowledge of the Commons, which they beg your lordships' permission to retire for a few minutes, to take into their consideration.

[The Managers retired, and after a few minutes, returned again into court.]

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, we now propose to put in an attested copy of the Commons' Journals.

Then Mr. Thomas Beverley Westwood was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Morris.—Have you examined the printed Journals of the House of Commons, which you hold in your hand, with the original Journals of that House?

Mr. Westwood.—I have.

Mr. Morris.—Have you also examined the entry of the presentation of the Eighth Report?

Mr. Westwood.—I have.

Mr. Morris.—And the entry of the order for bringing in the act of parliament?

Mr. Westwood.—I have.

Mr. Morris.—And the entry of the order for Mr. Dundas's carrying it up to the House of Lords.

Mr. Westwood.—I have.

Mr. Morris.—And the resolution of the House of Commons of the 19th of June, 1782?

Mr. Westwood.—Yes, I have.

Mr. Morris.—Are they true copies of the original Journals?

Mr. Westwood.—They are.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons here close their evidence upon the impeachment of lord viscount Melville; with a reservation that should any papers come into their hands, which may bring any new facts within their knowledge, between this and to-morrow morning, they may have the liberty to produce those facts and papers. Those papers which I just now mentioned to your lordships they have not yet had an opportunity of examining. Excepting upon these points, the Commons here close their evidence before your lordships, and it will take a very short time should they produce any farther evidence.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

TENTH DAY.

Saturday, May 10, 1806.

The lords and others came from the chamber of parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen managers for the Commons, you may now proceed with your evidence, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons are fully persuaded that your lordships will not think it extraordinary, that they do avail themselves of the claim they made yesterday, to produce some farther evidence before your lordships, which, however, I hope, will occupy but a short space of time; but it will be necessary, for the completion of their case, that they should call, in the first place, Mr. George Fennell, who has been before your lordships heretofore.

Then George Fennell, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Examine the books which have been before in evidence before their lordships, and state what was the treasurer's balance in the Navy branch, on the 30th of June, 1784.

Mr. Fennell.—1,201*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Refer to the Pay-branch for the same purpose.

Mr. Fennell.—1056*l.*

Mr. Whitbread.—The same question is asked you as to the Victualling-branch.

Mr. Fennell.—851*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Cast up those sums and see what the aggregate amount is.

Mr. Fennell.—They amount to 3,108*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish to put into the hands of the witness a paper, which is in his hand-writing, and which is a computation of balances similar to those that have been put in before. Is that paper in your own hand-writing?

Mr. Fennell.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—What does it import to be?

Mr. Fennell.—An account of the balances in the hands of the right honourable Henry Dundas, now lord viscount Melville, on account of his first treasurership of the navy, commencing the 19th of August, 1782, at the end of the months following, as far as they are stated or appear in a certificated book of the Navy-pay-office.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are the calculations made in that paper made by yourself?

Mr. Fennell.—They are not calculations, but merely additions of two branches together.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are they made by yourself?

Mr. Fennell.—They are; I made them from each book.

Lord Chancellor.—You will put upon your paper the particular places from which you made them.

Mr. Fennell.—There is each particular result.

Lord Chancellor.—Do those results agree?

Mr. Fennell.—They do.

Lord Chancellor.—It would be very convenient, if, in forming those results, a note were made by which the person making them could refer to the entry from which they are taken.

Mr. Whitbread.—The date ascertains the particular page in each book, from whence he has taken the extract. The result is of his own making, and the whole is in his own hand-writing; and the Commons mean to put that paper in as other similar papers have been put in, merely as the result of the computation of the witness.

Then George Fennell, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Does this computation of balances which commences in August, 1782, go on month by month, and to what time?

Mr. Fennell.—It proceeds month by month, until the expiration of the treasurership: then, being an ex-treasurership, it is made up quarterly at first, and afterwards only twice a year.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you mean down to the 10th of April, 1783?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Does it proceed only quarterly from that time?

Mr. Fennell.—The accounts proceed monthly to the end of the year 1783.

Mr. Plumer.—What period of the account is it, when it becomes quarterly only?

Mr. Fennell.—The next year, 1784.

Mr. Plumer.—Down to what time does it continue quarterly?

Mr. Fennell.—To the year 1791.

Mr. Plumer.—I wish it should be just understood, whether this is a balance entirely confined to an account which belongs to the ex-treasurership?

Mr. Fennell.—Entirely to the first treasurership old account.

Mr. Whitbread.—Your lordships will observe that this ceases to be a treasurership account on the 30th of April 1783, lord Melville having quitted the office of treasurer on the 10th of April. The accounts are made up in his name till the 30th of that month. From that time it becomes an ex-treasurership account, and that ex-treasurership account is made out to its conclusion, as stated by the witness. Is it not so?

Mr. Fennell.—Yes.

Lord Chancellor.—State the last date.

Mr. Fennell.—The last date is the 30th of September 1795. There was no alteration in the balances till 1800.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons offer this paper merely as the result of the calculation of the witness. State over again what was the aggregate balance you find from these three sums put together, on the 30th of June 1784.

Mr. Fennell.—It was 3,108*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—I wish your lordships' clerk should be directed to read the entry in this banking book, what the balance was in the Bank at that time.

Then the following entry in the banking book, before delivered in, containing the old account, was read.

“1804, 30th June, by balance to new account 8*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*”

Mr. Whitbread.—We have now shown your lordships that the charge upon the treasurer was 3,108*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* and that the actual sum in the Bank was 8*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* leaving a deficiency at that time of 3,100*l.*

Then the following entry was read from the banking book, before delivered in, containing the new account.

“1804, 30th June, to balance from old account, 8*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*”

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—We have now shown your lordships, that on the 30th of June 1784, there was a balance deficient of 3,100*l.* The Commons have shown your lordships, that lord Melville paid in the balance of his ex-treasurership account ending April 1783, in the month of July 1805, consisting of the sum of 5,111*l.* We have shown that by Mr. Coutts's book. We have shown the directions signed by lord Melville to Mr. Coutts to make that payment. The Commons now wish to show your lordships the circumstances under which the payment was made—they propose to show your lordships that when lord Melville's ex-treasurership account of the year 1783, came before the auditors of public accounts, there was a charge made, according to the power vested in them by the act, of 4,000*l.* and upwards for interest upon the sum due by lord Melville to the public; that notice was given to lord Melville of that charge, and of the intention of the auditors, unless the whole sum, making together upwards of 9,000*l.* principal and interest, were paid in within a certain period, to charge him from that period with the whole sum, and the interest of five per cent thereupon.

The Commons also intend to show your lordships that in consequence of this representation, lord Melville addressed a letter to the Treasury, dated 5th of July, 1805, stating the circumstances which induced him to apply for relief from that charge of interest.—The Commons intend to show your lordships also, that that relief was granted by direction of the board of Treasury; and they intend to show your lordships, that previous to the date of the letter of July, 1805, the vote of the House of Commons to impeach lord Melville, was upon your lordships' table. For the purpose of ascertaining these facts, we propose to call Mr. Bernard Cobbe, of the Auditor's office.

Mr. Plumer.—With great deference to your lordships, the matter now proposed to be gone into is perfectly foreign to the present charge; is perfectly new matter, which was never opened by the honourable manager, at the time he stated to your lordships what were the matters in charge; is not contained in the articles; and proceeds to subjects foreign to them; and if I understand it, it goes to call into question the propriety or impropriety of certain acts of the late board of Treasury; their conduct in 1805, relative to those accounts, whether they acted properly or improperly with respect to them, is (with deference to your lordships) not relevant to the present charge.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons contend that they have a right to produce the evidence they propose to your lordships. The Commons have charged, that lord Melville from the balance of the treasurership remaining in his hand, did derive profit and advantage. They have shown, as they contend, that he did derive such profit and advantage, and the circumstances having come to their knowledge they propose to show your lordships (without meaning to arraign at all the conduct of the board of Treasury upon the subject) what the circumstances were under which lord Melville paid in that balance, which they have already shown he did pay in, in the year 1805; and they conceive that they have a right to this evidence, as to every other article of evidence they have already produced before your lordships.

Mr. Plumer.—My lord, as far as the evidence tends to show any interest or advantage derived by the noble defendant, from balances in his hands, I did not object to it; I did not state that to be the matter of my objection. But the honorable manager stated a great deal more matter, which is not really comprehended under that head. Perhaps the more regular way will be for me to wait till questions are put which raise the objection; and then I shall, if it shall be material, with your lordships' permission, again address you upon the subject.

Mr. Whitbread.—The Commons mean, by this evidence, to show to your lordships, that lord Melville, in his application to be relieved from the charge made upon him by the auditors, stated that the whole of this sum, from the year 1783 up to the period of 1800, was either in the Bank or in the hand of his sub-accountants. The Commons have shown your lordships that a balance of 1,600*l.* was deficient in 1786, which, together with 9,000*l.* added to it from another balance, lord Melville has acknowledged he was accountable for: they have shown to-day there was a balance of 3,100*l.* on the 30th of June, in his hands; and if the calculations delivered in by the witness prove true, of which the Commons entertain no doubt, it will be shown that other large balances were due from lord Melville to the public, on that ex-treasurership account, which lord Melville asserts were in the hands of the Bank, or of the sub-accountants.

Then Bernard Cobbe, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that paper you have before you?

Mr. Cobbe.—A duplicate of the declared account of the right honourable Henry Dundas, now viscount Melville, treasurer of his majesty's Navy, from the first of January to the 10th of April, 1783.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is the charge made in that declared account on lord Melville, for the payment of which his discharge was to be granted?

Mr. Cobbe.—The debt upon the account, as delivered in, was 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.*

Mr. Whitbread.—Is that the whole charge made by the auditors upon lord Melville, upon that account?

Mr. Cobbe.—No.

Mr. Whitbread.—What was the additional charge?

Mr. Cobbe.—The additional charge was interest upon that. If your lordships give me leave, I will read the article—"For interest charged on this accountant."

Then an extract from the declaration of the final account of the right honourable Henry Dundas (now viscount Melville) treasurer of his majesty's Navy, from the 1st of January to the 10th of April 1783, was read, and is as follows:

"And so the said accountant £. s. d.
upon the end and determination of this his final account of his first treasurership as treasurer of his majesty's Navy and victualling thereof, from the 1st January 1783, to 10th April following, is indebted the sum of.... 5,111 2 9½

"To which is to be added,

"For interest charged on this accountant pursuant to an act of parliament passed anno 39th and 40th of his present majesty, intituled, 'An act for more effectually charging public ac-
'countants with the payment of 'interest, for allowing interest to 'them in certain cases, and for 'compelling the payment of ba-
'lances due from them.'

"On the sum of 5,111*l.* 2*s.*
9½*d.* being the accountant's balance on the audit of this account, computed from the first of May 1783, the time when his successor commenced his payments as treasurer of the Navy, to the day of the said audit;
namely, the 28th June, 1805, the said interest is computed on the foregoing sum, at the rate of 4*l.* per cent per annum; the same being deemed a reasonable rate for the period before mentioned, pursuant to the direction contained in the 4th section of the said act. The grounds on which the said interest is charged, are, that the said sum has been in the accountant's hands ever since he quitted the office of treasurer of the Navy, and a much larger sum during the greater part of the period between that time and the audit of the account: the said interest amounts to the sum of.... 4,530 5 5½

"Total balance including interest indebted..... 9,641 8 2½

"Examined,

"BERNARD COBBE, Inspector gen.

"Audited,

J. T. BATT.

JOHN MARTIN LEAKE.

C. W. ROUSE BOUGHTON.

"From which is to be deducted

"The above sum of 4,530*l.* 5*s.* 5½*d.* being the interest charged in pursuance of the act above recited, the lords commissioners of his majesty's Treasury having, by virtue of the power in them vested by the fourth section of the said act, signified to this board by letter from William Huskisson, esq. one of their lordships' joint secretaries, dated 20th August 1805, their opinion, that under all the circumstances of the case, the accountant ought not to be charged with interest on the balance in question..... 4,530 5 5½

"Balance indebted..... 5,111 2 9½

"Which said sum of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.* having been paid into the receipt of his majesty's Exchequer, as appears by a tally there levied, dated 27th Die Julij Anno Regni Regis Georgij Tertij 45°, and the deputy chamberlain's certificate of the joining thereof, the accountant is thereby even and quit.

Oct. 3 1805, the above mentioned tally amounting to five thousand, one hundred and eleven pounds, two shillings, and ninepence farthing, is received and joined.

R. LEETE,
Dep. Chamb.

"Examined,

"BERNARD COBBE.

JOHN MARTIN LEAKE.

C. W. ROUSE BOUGHTON.

B. BOUVERIE.

No. 7, declaratur 28°. Die Octobris 1805.

W. PITT.

FITZ HARRIS.

BLANDFORD.

AR. MACDONALD.

Mr. Plumer.—I must now submit to your lordships, whether that entry, the reading of which it was impossible for me to stop,—that long narrative out of this book, which has just been read,—whether it is consistent with fair proceeding that it ought to stand upon your lordships minutes. And, if it is not, I am quite certain that it will not be permitted to stand for the purpose of creating any prejudice, or drawing your lordships' attention to any matter that is not now properly before you. I understood the honourable manager to say, that he was only about to state in point of fact, what interest the noble defendant had made of this money. The entry that he has just read, contains a narrative of an attempt, an illegal attempt, on the part of that board, contrary to the act of parliament, to charge the defendant with interest. It was the subject of inquiry, whether they were proceeding consistently with that act, or under all the circumstances, in a way not warranted by it. Are we to go into that subject; are we to examine into all those circumstances, which it was competent and proper for the regular board to examine, in order to determine whether upon the whole case, it was proper that the defendant should be charged with interest or not?—Is that a subject now in charge?—Is the propriety of the conduct of the board of Treasury now before your lordships?—Yet, my lords, all this can be read for no other purpose than in part to draw this question before your lordships, which if it is proper to be gone into at all, must be thoroughly gone into; and all the merits of the case, the propriety of lord Melville's being subjected or not to the charge of interest, and what were the inducements and reasons which operated with that board, controlling and negating the act of the subordinate board, and under what circumstances it was finally led to the result that has been stated, must be brought in detail before the House. But I am persuaded your lordships will see, that this is leading us to an entirely new inquiry, which is now tacked on to the tail of all these proceedings, and of which, prior to the present moment, we have never had any intimation whatever.

Lord Chancellor.—It will relieve you from a great deal of difficulty if I say, once for all, that, in common sense, it can only prove this fact, viz. that there was a debt—a balance, of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.* against the noble defendant; that there was an additional charge made upon him of interest, making the total balance 9,641*l.* 8*s.* 2½*d.* and that the interest so charged was remitted, no matter whether right or wrong, involving no possible consideration before this House which can involve the lords of the Treasury, lord Melville, or any body else. It only proves, first, that in point of fact, that interest was remitted; and then another fact, viz. that the interest being remitted, lord Melville paid in the balance; and surely you can never dispute that it is evidence to that fact.

Mr. Plumer.—I am perfectly satisfied, if it is so understood.

Lord Chancellor.—It must be so understood by every man.

Mr. Whitbread.—The matter between the Commons and the noble defendant is, the Commons assert that he has made advantage of the public money; the act of parliament is not in question. I now put in a letter, in lord Melville's own hand-writing, stating the grounds upon which he applied for a discharge of this interest; and one word, as to what the learned counsel stated; these facts came to the knowledge of the managers only, while we were adducing our last evidence yesterday. Were not the Commons to proceed upon that evidence which was produced? and would not the Commons, if fresh evidence in support of their articles were to come into this box, at this moment, claim from your lordships a right to take that into consideration without consulting the learned counsel?

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I hope I am not calling in question the right of the honourable managers, to produce supplementary evidence prior to the close of their evidence, in support of those articles which they have exhibited. All I contend is, that we are not to be drawn into a matter of foreign inquiry that does not belong to the matters in charge. So long as it does belong to those matters, I make no objection to evidence, whenever it may come before they have closed their case.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, we are inquiring into the matter in issue between lord Melville and the Commons. I beg the clerk may be directed to read this letter of his lordship's to the lords commissioners of the Treasury, and the endorsements thereupon.

Lord Chancellor.—The endorsements can never be evidence.

Mr. Plumer.—I admit lord Melville's signature.

Then the letter was read, and is as follows:

“London, 15th July 1805.

“Sir;

“I have the honour to communicate to you, for the information of the lords commissioners of his majesty's Treasury, the inclosed copy of a letter which I have received from the secretary to the commissioners for auditing the public accounts; and I trust that their lordships will acquiesce in the propriety of my request, that they will exercise the power conferred on them by the act 39 and 40 Geo. 3, cap. 54. and declare, that on payment of the balance of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.* within any short period which their lordships may assign, I shall be freed from the charge of 4,530*l.* 5*s.* 5½*d.* for interest.

“The grounds on which I found my request are, that for seventeen years after the termination of the account in 1783, viz. till the close of my second treasurer-ship in 1800, the money was either in the Bank of England, or in the hands of my sub-accountants; and since that period has been in my own hands, liable at any hour to be claimed by the holders of assignments which had been or might be made upon me for payment by the different boards, to the full amount of the balance due by me.

“I have further to acquaint you, that I understand the delivery of the account to the auditors has been delayed till within these few months, only by the great pressure of business in the office of the treasurer of the Navy.

“I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,
MELVILLE.”

“W. Huskisson, esq. &c. &c. &c.”

Mr. Whitbread.—This is a copy of the letter sent to lord Melville by Mr. Cobbe, which the noble lord sent to the lords commissioners of the Treasury inclosed in his own letter, and which I request may be read.

Then the letter was read, and is as follows:

“Office for auditing the public accounts,
Somerset place, 3d July 1805.

“My lord;

“The commissioners for auditing the public accounts having, on the 28th ultimo, audited the final account of your first treasurer-ship, as treasurer of the Navy, from 1st January 1783 to 10th April following with a balance due from your lordship to the public of the sum of five thousand one hundred and eleven pounds two shillings and nine pence farthing:

“I am directed to inform your lordship of the same, and to acquaint you, that by virtue of, and in conformity to the directions contained in the 4th section of an act of parliament passed in the 39th and 40th of the reign of his present majesty, intituled, ‘An act for more effectually charging public accountants with the payment of interest; for allowing interest to them in certain cases; and for compelling the payment of balances due from them;’ the said commissioners have charged your lordship with interest, at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, on the sum of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.* being the amount of the said balance, the said interest being calculated from the 1st day of May 1783 (the time when your lordship's successor commenced his payments), to the day of the audit of this account. The said interest amounts to 4,540*l.* 5*s.* 5½*d.*; and, together with the before-mentioned balance of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.* will form a total balance of 9,641*l.* 8*s.* 2½*d.* payable by your lordship to the public. The grounds on which the commissioners have charged your lordship with interest on the above balance of 5,111*l.* 2*s.* 9½*d.* are, that the said sum has been in your hands ever since you quitted your office in 1783, and a much larger sum during the greater part of the period between that time and the audit of your account. It seems proper, also, to acquaint your lordship, that unless the whole sum of 9,641*l.* 8*s.* 2½*d.* be paid into the Exchequer previous to the declaration of your account, you will be chargeable with interest thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent, computed from the day on which your account was audited, until the same shall be paid.

"I have the honour to be, &c:

(Signed) BERNARD COBBE.

"Viscount Melville."

Then Bernard Cobbe, esq. was cross-examined as follows :

Mr. Plumer.—I observe, in the entry read by you from that book, a reference to an act of parliament; state the date of that act of parliament which is referred to.

Mr. Cobbe.—It was passed in the 39th and 40th year of his present majesty.

Mr. Plumer.—You stated a particular section in that act.

Mr. Cobbe.—The fourth section of that act.

Mr. Plumer.—Which had passed in the year 1799 and 1800; at what time was the attempt made by this board to charge lord Melville with interest?

Mr. Cobbe.—The board made the order for charging it on the 28th day of June, 1805.

Mr. Plumer.—That is a period of about five years after the act?

Mr. Cobbe.—Yes, it is so.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you recollect whether, prior to this, any instance had occurred of any person being charged or attempted to be charged with interest, under the fourth section of that act?

Mr. Cobbe.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Under the fourth section?

Mr. Cobbe.—I believe they had.

Mr. Plumer.—Do you know any instance, and if you do, state what the instance was, and when.

Mr. Cobbe.—I recollect one in the case of Mr. Mayor, comptroller of the Stationery office.

A Lord.—I submit to your lordships that what the commissioners have charged in other instances, cannot at all mix itself with this question.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I am certainly corrected; but I was drawn into it by the introduction of this subject, by the honourable managers leading us into this matter of a charge attempted to be made, and afterwards over-ruled by a superior board.

Mr. Whitbread.—We contend we have not travelled out of the charge; and if this was a time to make a charge upon the learned counsel, we should ask him whether he has not?

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Then William Huskisson, esq. was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows :

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you some time secretary to the Treasury?

Mr. Huskisson.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you so on the 20th of August, 1805?

Mr. Huskisson.—I was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is the signature, affixed to that letter, your hand-writing?

Mr. Huskisson.—It is.

Mr. Whitbread.—What is that letter?

Mr. Huskisson.—It is a letter to the Commissioners for auditing the public accounts, written by myself, by the directions of the lords of the Treasury.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, this is to show that the lords commissioners of the Treasury acted upon this representation of lord Melville.

Lord Chancellor.—You have proved this, that lord Melville applied to the lords of the Treasury to be relieved from the interest, and that is evidence; but what was done in consequence of that, or what they did beyond the mere fact of the lords of the Treasury granting it, is no evidence.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons mean to show that lord Melville obtained his request.

A Lord.—The Commons have shown that already, by the best evidence which can be produced, which is the declaration of the account.

Lord Chancellor.—I beg this matter may be distinctly understood. What has been admitted, was admitted upon this principle, which, subject to their lordships correction, I will take the liberty of stating. There appeared to be upon the face of the book, a charge of interest; but there was a letter written desiring to have a remission of that interest, and afterwards, upon the 5th of October, 1805, the final balance was paid in, without the interest. You cannot add at all to that fact by showing the ground on which that remission was allowed. What does it signify, whether it was upon lord Melville's representation, or any other representation? With that the lords have, I conceive, no concern.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons are perfectly satisfied.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I beg leave to observe (with your lordships' permission) that the result will be, that your lordships will have put upon your minutes, not only the fact of the board's having attempted to charge lord Melville with interest, but (as it is induced by the document tendered by the honourable managers) the grounds also upon which that charge was made. Now, my lords, what the honourable managers were attempting to go on with, were the grounds upon which another board were of a contrary opinion. Your lordships have most properly determined that you cannot receive and enter into those con-troverted grounds on one side or on the other. I am thoroughly persuaded that your lordships having been drawn in, to put upon your minutes the grounds upon which one board proceeded, and now properly excluding the grounds upon which a contrary opinion was entertained by another board, I am persuaded I need not say one word to your lordships to do away any effect from this circumstance. It must stand upon your minutes, but I am sure it will not have any improper effect.

Lord Chancellor.—Mr. Plumer, I will relieve you from all apprehension upon that head. The only ground upon which the other could be received as evidence was, that lord Melville admitted it in his letter, and it will no more signify than the colour of their clothes, upon what ground the lords of the Treasury did this act.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons have already declared themselves satisfied.—I now wish to read from your lordships' Journals, the date of the articles of impeachment being brought up to your lordships' house.

Then the following entry was read from the original Journal of the House of Lords.

Die Mercurij 26<sup>o</sup> Junij 1805.

"A message was brought from the House of Commons by Mr. Whitbread and others, as follows, viz.

"My lords;

"The Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in parliament assembled, have commanded me to impeach Henry lord viscount Melville of high crimes and misdemeanors, and I do here in their names, and in the names of all the Commons of the United Kingdom, impeach the said Henry lord viscount Melville of high crimes and misdemeanors; and I am further commanded by the House of Commons to acquaint your lordships that they will in due time exhibit particular articles against him, and make good the same."

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons are anxious, for the satisfaction of your lordships, that the banking-book balances, corresponding with the official balances, and the results drawn from those official balances, as given in evidence before your lordships, should also be put in; they are contained in the banking-books.

Mr. Plumer.—With respect to what was read last, I did not catch whether it was the presenting of the original articles, or of the original articles together with the supplemental article. I should be glad to have the date when the supplemental article was brought in.

Mr. Whitbread.—The last entry was neither of one article nor the other; it was only a communication of the vote of impeachment.

A Lord.—My lords, I submit all this interlocutory matter, between the honourable managers and the learned counsel for the defendant, is perfectly irrelevant; the date when the prosecution was commenced is proper evidence, and ought to excite no observation.

Then the following entries in the banking-books before delivered in were read:—

"Old account, 30th of September 1784, to balance from old account 1,508*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

The same book.—"31st of December 1784, to balance from old account 2,508*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

"The 31st of March 1785, to balance from old account 1,008*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

"The 30th June 1785, to balance from old account, 5,008*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

"The 30th of September 1785, to balance from old account 8*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.*"

"The 30th of November 1785, to balance from old account 2,508*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

There is no entry in December or January.

"The 4th of February 1786, to balance from old account 1,508*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*"

"The 30th June 1786, to balance from old account 8,307*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

"The 31st August 1786, to balance from old account 307*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

Then there is no entry till "the 27th February 1787, to balance from the old account 307*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

The next entry is "the 31st of October 1787, to balance from old account 907*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

There is no entry till "the 29th of March 1788, to balance from old account 407*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

There is no entry till "the 31st May 1788, to balance from old account 3,407*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

"The 27th September 1788, to balance from old account 407*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

"The 30th September 1789, to balance from old account 107*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

"The 31st December 1789, to balance from old account 207*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

There is no balance till "the 30th September 1790, to balance from old account 707*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

"The 30th of December 1790, to balance from old account 2,707*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*"

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I would submit, with great deference to the honourable managers, whether it would not save a great deal of time, if a list of those balances were given in by the honourable managers, and then one single question would apply to the whole.

Mr. Whitbread.—The managers would have been extremely glad if that intimation had been given by the learned counsel, at an earlier period; we had the list ready to put in, and would have done it earlier, if they had consented.

Then the paper proved by Mr. Fennell (page 1124) was delivered in and read, and is as follows:

A MONTHLY STATEMENT of the Balances in the First Treasurership Account of the Right Hon. HENRY DUNDAS, commencing 19th August 1782, to the Month of May 1800.

|                 | Treasurer's Balances. |    |    | Actual Balance at the Bank.                   |    |    | Difference.    |    |    |
|-----------------|-----------------------|----|----|-----------------------------------------------|----|----|----------------|----|----|
|                 | £.                    | s. | d. | £.                                            | s. | d. | £.             | s. | d. |
| 1782.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| September ..... | 167,287               | 13 | 0  | 172,287                                       | 13 | 0  | 5,000          | 0  | 0  |
|                 |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    | Surplus.       |    |    |
| October .....   | 148,621               | 6  | 1  | 138,621                                       | 6  | 1  | 10,000         | 0  | 0  |
| November .....  | 155,121               | 6  | 1  | 147,121                                       | 6  | 1  | 8,000          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 146,244               | 5  | 9  | 130,244                                       | 5  | 9  | 16,000         | 0  | 0  |
|                 |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    | Difference.    |    |    |
| 1783.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| January .....   | 317,666               | 4  | 11 | 304,666                                       | 4  | 11 | 13,000         | 0  | 0  |
| February .....  | 142,169               | 3  | 11 | 129,169                                       | 3  | 11 | 13,000         | 0  | 0  |
| March .....     | 138,408               | 12 | 3  | 125,408                                       | 12 | 3  | 13,000         | 0  | 0  |
| April .....     | 89,408                | 12 | 3  | 66,408                                        | 12 | 3  | 23,000         | 0  | 0  |
| May .....       | 52,408                | 12 | 3  | 29,408                                        | 12 | 3  | 23,000         | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 22,408                | 12 | 3  | 408                                           | 12 | 3  | 22,000         | 0  | 0  |
| July ... ..     | 9,608                 | 12 | 3  | 2,008                                         | 12 | 3  | 7,600          | 0  | 0  |
| August .....    | 20,608                | 12 | 3  | 13,008                                        | 12 | 3  | Do.            |    |    |
| September ..... | 29,608                | 12 | 3  | 22,008                                        | 12 | 3  | Do.            |    |    |
| October .....   | 18,108                | 12 | 3  | 10,508                                        | 12 | 3  | 7,600          | 0  | 0  |
| November .....  | 25,108                | 12 | 3  | 17,508                                        | 12 | 3  | 7,600          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 14,108                | 12 | 3  | 6,508                                         | 12 | 3  | Do.            |    |    |
| 1784.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 6,608                 | 12 | 3  | 1,008                                         | 12 | 3  | 5,600          | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 3,108                 | 12 | 3  | 8                                             | 12 | 3  | 3,100          | 0  | 0  |
| Septamber ..... | 4,608                 | 12 | 3  | 1,508                                         | 12 | 3  | 3,100          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 5,608                 | 12 | 3  | 2,508                                         | 12 | 3  | 3,100          | 0  | 0  |
| 1785.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 2,608                 | 12 | 3  | 1,008                                         | 12 | 3  | 1,600          | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 6,608                 | 12 | 3  | 5,008                                         | 12 | 3  | Do.            |    |    |
| September ..... | 6,108                 | 12 | 3  | 4,508                                         | 12 | 3  | 1,600          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 4,108                 | 12 | 3  | { No Balance at the }{ Bank this Month. } |    |    |                |    |    |
| 1786.           |                       |    |    | Balance in November.                          |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 3,108                 | 12 | 3  | 2,508                                         | 12 | 3  | 1,600          | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 9,907                 | 4  | 4  | 1,508                                         | 12 | 3  | Do.            |    |    |
| September ..... | 7,907                 | 4  | 4  | 8,307                                         | 4  | 4  | Do.            |    |    |
| December .....  | 7,907                 | 4  | 4  | 307                                           | 4  | 4  | 7,600          | 0  | 0  |
|                 |                       |    |    | 307                                           | 4  | 4  | Do.            |    |    |
| 1787.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 5,907                 | 4  | 4  | 307                                           | 4  | 4  | 5,600          | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 5,907                 | 4  | 4  | 307                                           | 4  | 4  | Do.            |    |    |
| September ..... | 5,907                 | 4  | 4  | 307                                           | 4  | 4  | Do.            |    |    |
| December .....  | 3,907                 | 4  | 4  | 907                                           | 4  | 4  | 3,000          | 0  | 0  |
| 1788.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 8,407                 | 4  | 4  | 407                                           | 4  | 4  | 8,000          | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 5,907                 | 4  | 4  | 1,407                                         | 4  | 4  | 4,500          | 0  | 0  |
| September ..... | 5,407                 | 4  | 4  | 407                                           | 4  | 4  | 5,000          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 5,407                 | 4  | 4  | 407                                           | 4  | 4  | 5,000          | 0  | 0  |
| 1789.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 5,407                 | 4  | 4  | 407                                           | 4  | 4  | Do.            |    |    |
| June .....      | 4,907                 | 4  | 4  | 307                                           | 4  | 4  | 4,600          | 0  | 0  |
| September ..... | 4,707                 | 4  | 4  | 107                                           | 4  | 4  | 4,600          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 3,207                 | 4  | 4  | 207                                           | 4  | 4  | 3,000          | 0  | 0  |
| 1790.           |                       |    |    |                                               |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 3,207                 | 4  | 4  | 207                                           | 4  | 4  | 3,000          | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 3,207                 | 4  | 4  | 207                                           | 4  | 4  | Do.            |    |    |
| September ..... | 2,707                 | 4  | 4  | 707                                           | 4  | 4  | 2,000          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 2,707                 | 4  | 4  | 2,707                                         | 4  | 4  | No difference. |    |    |

|                 | Treasurer's Balances. |    |    | Actual Balance at the Bank. |    |    | Difference.    |    |    |
|-----------------|-----------------------|----|----|-----------------------------|----|----|----------------|----|----|
|                 | £.                    | s. | d. | £.                          | s. | d. | £.             | s. | d. |
| 1791.           |                       |    |    |                             |    |    |                |    |    |
| March .....     | 2,707                 | 4  | 4  | 707                         | 4  | 4  | 2,000          | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 2,707                 | 4  | 4  | Do.                         |    |    | Do.            |    |    |
| September ..... | 2,707                 | 4  | 4  | Do.                         |    |    | Do.            |    |    |
| December .....  | 3,500                 | 0  | 0  | 3,500                       | 0  | 0  | No difference. |    |    |
| 1792.           |                       |    |    |                             |    |    |                |    |    |
| September ..... | 2,800                 | 0  | 0  | 800                         | 0  | 0  | 2,000          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 2,400                 | 0  | 0  | 400                         | 0  | 0  | Do.            |    |    |
| 1793.           |                       |    |    |                             |    |    |                |    |    |
| September ..... | 1,950                 | 0  | 0  | 200                         | 0  | 0  | 1,750          | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 1,950                 | 0  | 0  | 1,950                       | 0  | 0  | No difference. |    |    |
| 1794.           |                       |    |    |                             |    |    |                |    |    |
| September ..... | 1,850                 | 0  | 0  | 1,850                       | 0  | 0  | No difference. |    |    |
| December .....  | 1,850                 | 0  | 0  | Do.                         |    |    | Do.            |    |    |
| 1795.           |                       |    |    |                             |    |    |                |    |    |
| September ..... | 1,850                 | 0  | 0  | Do.                         |    |    | Do.            |    |    |
| 1800.           |                       |    |    |                             |    |    |                |    |    |
| May .....       | 5,359                 | 3  | 11 | Same.                       |    |    | Do.            |    |    |
| June .....      | Do.                   |    |    | 25                          | 15 | 7  | 5,333          | 8  | 4  |

Then George Fennell, esq., was again called in, and examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Have you examined and signed that account.

Mr. Fennell.—I have.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know that account to be an accurate result from the books of the Navy-pay-office? Have you examined it yourself?

Mr. Fennell.—I have, by the books kept by the paymaster.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has it been examined with your own books, as public accountant at the Navy-pay-office?

Mr. Fennell.—It has.

Mr. Whitbread.—Does it at all proceed from your own examination of the office books?

Mr. Fennell.—With the addition of the Bank books.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—The witness has stated this to be an account of the monthly deficiencies; I have no objection to it if the managers will change the word to differences.

Mr. Whitbread.—We have no objection to make that alteration in it.

The paper referred to by the witness was then delivered in, and is as follows:

A MONTHLY STATEMENT of the Differences between the Treasurer's Balances and the Balances in the Bank, upon the Account of the Right Honorable HENRY DUNDAS, as Treasurer of the Navy, commencing with the Month of January 1786, the Date of Mr. TROTTER's Appointment as Paymaster.

|                 | Cash Balance in the Hands of the Treasurer. |    |    | Actual Balance at the Bank.          |    |    | Difference. |    |    |
|-----------------|---------------------------------------------|----|----|--------------------------------------|----|----|-------------|----|----|
|                 | £.                                          | s. | d. | £.                                   | s. | d. | £.          | s. | d. |
| 1786.           |                                             |    |    |                                      |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 79,514                                      | 10 | 3  | Not Balanced at the Bank this Month. |    |    |             |    |    |
| February .....  | 43,014                                      | 10 | 3  | 33,014                               | 10 | 3  | 10,000      | 0  | 0  |
| March .....     | 34,077                                      | 10 | 3  | 24,077                               | 10 | 3  | 10,000      | 0  | 0  |
| April .....     | 49,202                                      | 10 | 3  | 39,202                               | 10 | 3  | 10,000      | 0  | 0  |
| May .....       | 54,769                                      | 11 | 7  | 34,769                               | 11 | 7  | 20,000      | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 42,559                                      | 11 | 7  | 22,559                               | 11 | 7  | 20,000      | 0  | 0  |
| July .....      | 83,202                                      | 9  | 2  | 63,202                               | 9  | 2  | 20,000      | 0  | 0  |
| August .....    | 371,835                                     | 17 | 11 | 315,835                              | 17 | 11 | 56,000      | 0  | 0  |
| September ..... | 72,739                                      | 12 | 11 | 16,739                               | 12 | 11 | 56,000      | 0  | 0  |
| October .....   | 51,239                                      | 12 | 11 | 5,239                                | 12 | 11 | 46,000      | 0  | 0  |
| November .....  | 59,870                                      | 0  | 1  | 10,870                               | 0  | 1  | 49,000      | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 81,942                                      | 0  | 1  | 25,942                               | 0  | 1  | 56,000      | 0  | 0  |

|                 | Cash Balance in the Hands ofthe Treasurer. |    |                                | Actual Balance at the Bank.          |    |    | Difference.    |    |                                |
|-----------------|------------------------------------------------|----|--------------------------------|--------------------------------------|----|----|----------------|----|--------------------------------|
|                 | £.                                             | s. | d.                             | £.                                   | s. | d. | £.             | s. | d.                             |
| 1787.           |                                                |    |                                |                                      |    |    |                |    |                                |
| January .....   | 67,128                                         | 5  | 1                              | 15,128                               | 5  | 1  | 52,000         | 0  | 0                              |
| February .....  | 66,728                                         | 9  | 10 <sup>3</sup> / <sub>4</sub> | 12,728                               | 9  | 11 | 53,999         | 19 | 11 <sup>3</sup> / <sub>4</sub> |
| March .....     | 179,028                                        | 4  | 3 <sup>3</sup> / <sub>4</sub>  | 132,028                              | 4  | 4  | 46,999         | 19 | 11 <sup>1</sup> / <sub>4</sub> |
| April .....     | 26,564                                         | 9  | 3 <sup>1</sup> / <sub>4</sub>  | 43,064                               | 9  | 4  | 53,499         | 19 | 11 <sup>3</sup> / <sub>4</sub> |
| May .....       | 55,492                                         | 6  | 8 <sup>1</sup> / <sub>4</sub>  | Not Balanced at the Bank this Month. |    |    |                |    |                                |
| June .....      | 52,899                                         | 16 | 1                              | 6,399                                | 16 | 1  | 46,500         | 0  | 0                              |
| July .....      | 71,070                                         | 6  | 9                              | 24,570                               | 6  | 9  | 46,500         | 0  | 0                              |
| August .....    | 67,600                                         | 6  | 9                              | 21,100                               | 6  | 9  | 46,500         | 0  | 0                              |
| September ..... | 83,427                                         | 6  | 2                              | 36,927                               | 6  | 2  | 46,500         | 0  | 0                              |
| October .....   | 92,153                                         | 7  | 6                              | 40,053                               | 7  | 6  | 52,100         | 0  | 0                              |
| November .....  | 63,665                                         | 16 | 0                              | 23,565                               | 16 | 0  | 40,100         | 0  | 0                              |
| December .....  | 459,369                                        | 11 | 8                              | 406,269                              | 11 | 8  | 53,100         | 0  | 0                              |
| 1788.           |                                                |    |                                |                                      |    |    |                |    |                                |
| January .....   | 104,669                                        | 11 | 8                              | 51,569                               | 11 | 8  | 53,100         | 0  | 0                              |
| February .....  | 83,669                                         | 11 | 8                              | 41,569                               | 11 | 8  | 42,100         | 0  | 0                              |
| March .....     | 119,848                                        | 16 | 6                              | 82,748                               | 16 | 6  | 37,100         | 0  | 0                              |
| April .....     | 98,894                                         | 11 | 6                              | 49,294                               | 11 | 6  | 49,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| May .....       | 91,394                                         | 11 | 6                              | 29,794                               | 11 | 6  | 61,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| June .....      | 73,253                                         | 16 | 6                              | 16,653                               | 16 | 6  | 56,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| July .....      | 64,938                                         | 7  | 3                              | 11,338                               | 7  | 3  | 53,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| August .....    | 60,040                                         | 15 | 11                             | 11,440                               | 15 | 11 | 48,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| September ..... | 83,442                                         | 0  | 1                              | 34,842                               | 0  | 1  | 48,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| October .....   | 280,293                                        | 14 | 10                             | 231,693                              | 14 | 10 | 48,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| November .....  | 59,417                                         | 8  | 11                             | 10,817                               | 8  | 11 | 48,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| December .....  | 57,779                                         | 8  | 11                             | 9,179                                | 8  | 11 | 48,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| 1789.           |                                                |    |                                |                                      |    |    |                |    |                                |
| January .....   | 52,491                                         | 8  | 11                             | 3,891                                | 8  | 11 | 48,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| February .....  | 46,061                                         | 8  | 11                             | 7,461                                | 8  | 11 | 38,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| March .....     | 187,721                                        | 13 | 2                              | 151,121                              | 13 | 2  | 36,600         | 0  | 0                              |
| April .....     | 87,131                                         | 15 | 2                              | 45,431                               | 15 | 2  | 41,700         | 0  | 0                              |
| May .....       | 60,730                                         | 9  | 9                              | 19,030                               | 9  | 9  | 41,700         | 0  | 0                              |
| June .....      | 83,705                                         | 14 | 9                              | 50,005                               | 14 | 9  | 33,700         | 0  | 0                              |
| July .....      | 88,744                                         | 16 | 2                              | 37,044                               | 16 | 2  | 51,700         | 0  | 0                              |
| August .....    | 80,791                                         | 16 | 2                              | 26,591                               | 16 | 2  | 54,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| September ..... | 84,879                                         | 16 | 2                              | 30,679                               | 16 | 2  | 54,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| October .....   | 482,193                                        | 0  | 5                              | 427,993                              | 0  | 5  | 54,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| November .....  | 93,123                                         | 0  | 5                              | 36,493                               | 0  | 5  | 56,700         | 0  | 0                              |
| December .....  | 108,281                                        | 15 | 10                             | 52,481                               | 15 | 10 | 55,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| 1790.           |                                                |    |                                |                                      |    |    |                |    |                                |
| January .....   | 104,886                                        | 15 | 10                             | 54,086                               | 15 | 10 | 50,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| February .....  | 86,017                                         | 3  | 4                              | 30,217                               | 3  | 4  | 55,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| March .....     | 127,362                                        | 19 | 5                              | 71,562                               | 19 | 5  | 55,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| April .....     | 141,262                                        | 19 | 5                              | 79,462                               | 19 | 5  | 61,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| May .....       | 86,642                                         | 19 | 9                              | 21,842                               | 19 | 9  | 64,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| June .....      | 85,942                                         | 19 | 9                              | 21,142                               | 19 | 9  | 64,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| July .....      | 129,480                                        | 12 | 4 <sup>3</sup> / <sub>4</sub>  | Not Balanced at the Bank this Month. |    |    |                |    |                                |
| August .....    | 111,480                                        | 12 | 4                              | 53,680                               | 12 | 4  | 57,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| September ..... | 104,460                                        | 12 | 4                              | 46,660                               | 12 | 4  | 57,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| October .....   | 115,040                                        | 6  | 2                              | 61,240                               | 6  | 2  | 53,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| November .....  | 83,350                                         | 6  | 2                              | 13,550                               | 6  | 2  | 69,800         | 0  | 0                              |
| December .....  | 102,897                                        | 16 | 1                              | 102,897                              | 16 | 1  | No Deficiency. |    |                                |
| 1791.           |                                                |    |                                |                                      |    |    |                |    |                                |
| January .....   | 145,958                                        | 8  | 3                              | 95,758                               | 8  | 3  | 50,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| February .....  | 106,958                                        | 8  | 3                              | 38,758                               | 8  | 3  | 68,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| March .....     | 107,245                                        | 9  | 9                              | 39,897                               | 17 | 3  | 67,347         | 12 | 6                              |
| April .....     | 167,693                                        | 12 | 11                             | 99,493                               | 12 | 11 | 68,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| May .....       | 84,693                                         | 12 | 11                             | 42,493                               | 12 | 11 | 42,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| June .....      | 62,828                                         | 12 | 11                             | 10,628                               | 12 | 11 | 52,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| July .....      | 97,802                                         | 10 | 0                              | 41,602                               | 10 | 0  | 56,200         | 0  | 0                              |
| August .....    | 124,528                                        | 8  | 7                              | 62,828                               | 8  | 7  | 61,700         | 0  | 0                              |
| September ..... | 75,776                                         | 19 | 8                              | 9,776                                | 19 | 8  | 66,000         | 0  | 0                              |
| October .....   | 255,450                                        | 3  | 6                              | 192,950                              | 3  | 6  | 62,500         | 0  | 0                              |
| November .....  | 95,950                                         | 3  | 6                              | 23,950                               | 3  | 6  | 72,000         | 0  | 0                              |

|                 | Cash Balance in the Hands ofthe Treasurer. |    |    | Actual Balance at the Bank.          |    |    | Difference. |    |    |
|-----------------|------------------------------------------------|----|----|--------------------------------------|----|----|-------------|----|----|
|                 | £.                                             | s. | d. | £.                                   | s. | d. | £.          | s. | d. |
| December .....  | 93,443                                         | 7  | 2  | 73,454                               | 17 | 6  | 19,988      | 9  | 8  |
| 1792.           |                                                |    |    |                                      |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 553,176                                        | 18 | 5  | 472,188                              | 8  | 9  | 80,988      | 9  | 8  |
| February .....  | 118,557                                        | 15 | 1  | 26,569                               | 5  | 5  | 91,988      | 9  | 8  |
| March .....     | 144,981                                        | 2  | 1  | 42,592                               | 12 | 5  | 102,388     | 9  | 8  |
| April .....     | 114,481                                        | 2  | 1  | 11,992                               | 12 | 5  | 102,488     | 9  | 8  |
| May .....       | 123,057                                        | 12 | 2  | 34,569                               | 2  | 6  | 88,488      | 9  | 8  |
| June .....      | 84,984                                         | 13 | 10 | 19,496                               | 4  | 2  | 65,488      | 9  | 8  |
| July .....      | 105,576                                        | 14 | 11 | 44,288                               | 5  | 3  | 61,288      | 9  | 8  |
| August .....    | 81,385                                         | 17 | 10 | 5,597                                | 8  | 2  | 75,788      | 9  | 8  |
| September ..... | 107,739                                        | 17 | 10 | 22,693                               | 18 | 2  | 85,045      | 19 | 8  |
| October .....   | 270,240                                        | 16 | 5  | 173,994                              | 16 | 9  | 96,245      | 19 | 8  |
| November .....  | 95,740                                         | 16 | 5  | 8,694                                | 16 | 9  | 87,045      | 19 | 8  |
| December .....  | 88,219                                         | 1  | 5  | 61,742                               | 1  | 9  | 26,476      | 19 | 8  |
| 1793.           |                                                |    |    |                                      |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 88,719                                         | 1  | 5  | 11,242                               | 1  | 9  | 77,476      | 19 | 8  |
| February .....  | 96,886                                         | 4  | 4  | 26,409                               | 4  | 8  | 70,476      | 19 | 8  |
| March .....     | 132,786                                        | 4  | 4  | 52,309                               | 4  | 8  | 80,476      | 19 | 8  |
| April .....     | 153,520                                        | 9  | 6  | 50,643                               | 9  | 10 | 102,876     | 19 | 8  |
| May .....       | 99,520                                         | 9  | 6  | 10,643                               | 9  | 10 | 88,876      | 19 | 8  |
| June .....      | 111,663                                        | 8  | 0  | 39,938                               | 8  | 4  | 71,724      | 19 | 8  |
| July .....      | 144,613                                        | 12 | 6  | 45,888                               | 12 | 10 | 98,724      | 19 | 8  |
| August .....    | 167,613                                        | 12 | 6  | 79,388                               | 12 | 10 | 88,224      | 19 | 8  |
| September ..... | 126,193                                        | 12 | 6  | 16,193                               | 12 | 6  | 110,000     | 0  | 0  |
| October .....   | 292,754                                        | 1  | 2  | 177,754                              | 1  | 2  | 115,000     | 0  | 0  |
| November .....  | 121,254                                        | 1  | 2  | 20,254                               | 1  | 2  | 101,000     | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 148,012                                        | 9  | 0  | 120,986                              | 11 | 3  | 27,025      | 17 | 9  |
| 1794.           |                                                |    |    |                                      |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 164,587                                        | 6  | 3  | 46,561                               | 8  | 6  | 118,025     | 17 | 9  |
| February .....  | 147,337                                        | 6  | 3  | 9,311                                | 8  | 6  | 138,025     | 17 | 9  |
| March .....     | 148,619                                        | 5  | 3  | 77,193                               | 7  | 6  | 71,425      | 17 | 9  |
| April .....     | 226,066                                        | 4  | 11 | 64,640                               | 7  | 2  | 161,425     | 17 | 9  |
| May .....       | 183,566                                        | 4  | 11 | 42,140                               | 7  | 2  | 141,425     | 17 | 9  |
| June .....      | 163,878                                        | 5  | 5  | 50,452                               | 7  | 8  | 113,425     | 17 | 9  |
| July .....      | 193,878                                        | 5  | 5  | 54,452                               | 7  | 8  | 139,425     | 17 | 9  |
| August .....    | 174,859                                        | 18 | 10 | 45,434                               | 1  | 1  | 129,425     | 17 | 9  |
| September ..... | 191,444                                        | 18 | 10 | 52,019                               | 1  | 1  | 139,425     | 17 | 9  |
| October .....   | 205,782                                        | 14 | 4  | Not balanced at the Bank this Month. |    |    |             |    |    |
| November .....  | 196,652                                        | 14 | 7  | 116,226                              | 16 | 10 | 80,425      | 17 | 9  |
| December .....  | 190,119                                        | 5  | 5  | 161,360                              | 17 | 8  | 128,758     | 7  | 9  |
| 1795.           |                                                |    |    |                                      |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 304,533                                        | 10 | 0  | 98,707                               | 12 | 3  | 205,825     | 17 | 9  |
| February .....  | 310,753                                        | 1  | 7  | 100,927                              | 3  | 10 | 209,825     | 17 | 9  |
| March .....     | 406,277                                        | 10 | 5  | 115,951                              | 12 | 8  | 290,325     | 17 | 9  |
| April .....     | 933,299                                        | 19 | 1  | 622,974                              | 1  | 4  | 310,325     | 17 | 9  |
| May .....       | 429,574                                        | 15 | 11 | 152,248                              | 18 | 2  | 277,325     | 17 | 9  |
| June .....      | 310,795                                        | 13 | 1  | 133,469                              | 15 | 4  | 177,325     | 17 | 9  |
| July .....      | 729,592                                        | 19 | 5  | 472,267                              | 1  | 8  | 257,325     | 17 | 9  |
| August .....    | 616,330                                        | 4  | 10 | 376,006                              | 7  | 1  | 240,325     | 17 | 9  |
| September ..... | 647,566                                        | 13 | 2  | 157,240                              | 15 | 5  | 490,325     | 17 | 9  |
| October .....   | 620,790                                        | 17 | 9  | 333,465                              | 0  | 0  | 287,325     | 17 | 9  |
| November .....  | 476,222                                        | 4  | 10 | 422,896                              | 7  | 1  | 53,325      | 17 | 9  |
| December .....  | 555,755                                        | 4  | 2  | 525,438                              | 8  | 1  | 30,316      | 16 | 1  |
| 1796.           |                                                |    |    |                                      |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 630,464                                        | 10 | 1  | 505,138                              | 12 | 4  | 125,325     | 17 | 9  |
| February .....  | 524,740                                        | 6  | 9  | 307,898                              | 12 | 7  | 216,841     | 14 | 2  |
| March .....     | 341,647                                        | 15 | 5  | 147,147                              | 15 | 5  | 194,500     | 0  | 0  |
| April .....     | 92,647                                         | 15 | 5  | 39,647                               | 15 | 5  | 53,000      | 0  | 0  |
| May .....       | 200,775                                        | 6  | 2  | 46,775                               | 6  | 2  | 154,000     | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 185,069                                        | 2  | 10 | 33,930                               | 2  | 10 | 151,139     | 0  | 0  |
| July .....      | 496,339                                        | 2  | 0  | 398,339                              | 2  | 0  | 98,000      | 0  | 0  |
| August .....    | 270,326                                        | 6  | 9  | 145,326                              | 6  | 9  | 125,000     | 0  | 0  |

|                 | Cash Balance in the Hands ofthe Treasurer. |    |    | Actual Balance at the Bank. |    |    | Difference. |    |    |
|-----------------|------------------------------------------------|----|----|-----------------------------|----|----|-------------|----|----|
|                 | £.                                             | s. | d. | £.                          | s. | d. | £.          | s. | d. |
| September ..... | 297,546                                        | 13 | 3  | 155,606                     | 13 | 4  | 141,939     | 19 | 11 |
| October .....   | 340,016                                        | 11 | 8  | 192,076                     | 11 | 7  | 147,940     | 0  | 1  |
| November ...    | 389,342                                        | 8  | 9  | 131,402                     | 8  | 9  | 257,940     | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 255,261                                        | 11 | 7  | 179,848                     | 6  | 9  | 75,413      | 4  | 10 |
| 1797.           |                                                |    |    |                             |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 240,415                                        | 4  | 2  | 98,415                      | 4  | 2  | 142,000     | 0  | 0  |
| February .....  | 103,415                                        | 4  | 2  | 22,415                      | 4  | 2  | 81,000      | 0  | 0  |
| March .....     | 255,421                                        | 11 | 11 | 197,421                     | 11 | 11 | 58,000      | 0  | 0  |
| April .....     | 282,317                                        | 8  | 2  | 86,817                      | 8  | 2  | 195,500     | 0  | 0  |
| May .....       | 680,019                                        | 19 | 8  | 484,519                     | 19 | 8  | 195,500     | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 705,055                                        | 10 | 3  | 423,296                     | 5  | 0  | 281,759     | 5  | 3  |
| July .....      | 214,298                                        | 8  | 10 | 69,190                      | 10 | 10 | 145,107     | 18 | 0  |
| August .....    | 410,150                                        | 16 | 7  | 193,150                     | 16 | 7  | 217,000     | 0  | 0  |
| September ..... | 197,166                                        | 4  | 6  | 17,381                      | 12 | 4  | 179,784     | 12 | 2  |
| October .....   | 286,110                                        | 10 | 5  | 93,317                      | 6  | 4  | 192,793     | 4  | 1  |
| November .....  | 142,180                                        | 4  | 9  | 47,395                      | 12 | 7  | 94,784      | 12 | 2  |
| December .....  | 160,453                                        | 8  | 4  | 101,812                     | 13 | 6  | 58,640      | 14 | 10 |
| 1798.           |                                                |    |    |                             |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 237,361                                        | 14 | 7  | 137,796                     | 1  | 3  | 99,565      | 13 | 4  |
| February .....  | 252,670                                        | 3  | 10 | 93,670                      | 3  | 10 | 159,000     | 0  | 0  |
| March .....     | 226,637                                        | 0  | 4  | 122,137                     | 0  | 4  | 104,500     | 0  | 0  |
| April .....     | 158,122                                        | 5  | 4  | 65,122                      | 5  | 4  | 93,000      | 0  | 0  |
| May .....       | 427,064                                        | 19 | 10 | 137,527                     | 14 | 10 | 289,537     | 5  | 0  |
| June .....      | 265,669                                        | 12 | 9  | 40,169                      | 12 | 9  | 225,500     | 0  | 0  |
| July .....      | 382,843                                        | 9  | 2  | 140,843                     | 9  | 2  | 242,000     | 0  | 0  |
| August .....    | 270,638                                        | 10 | 0  | 17,138                      | 10 | 0  | 253,500     | 0  | 0  |
| September ..... | 279,756                                        | 19 | 0  | 57,256                      | 19 | 0  | 222,500     | 0  | 0  |
| October .....   | 452,980                                        | 18 | 10 | 193,480                     | 18 | 10 | 259,500     | 0  | 0  |
| November .....  | 312,525                                        | 3  | 3  | 27,525                      | 3  | 3  | 285,000     | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 196,301                                        | 10 | 4  | 142,160                     | 15 | 6  | 54,140      | 14 | 10 |
| 1799.           |                                                |    |    |                             |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 284,225                                        | 15 | 9  | 62,225                      | 15 | 9  | 222,000     | 0  | 0  |
| February .....  | 324,390                                        | 18 | 3  | 119,533                     | 9  | 2  | 204,857     | 9  | 1  |
| March .....     | 376,936                                        | 10 | 1  | 158,936                     | 10 | 1  | 218,000     | 0  | 0  |
| April .....     | 227,012                                        | 12 | 1  | 80,171                      | 2  | 7  | 146,841     | 9  | 6  |
| May .....       | 232,529                                        | 17 | 4  | 74,529                      | 17 | 4  | 158,000     | 0  | 0  |
| June .....      | 209,029                                        | 17 | 4  | 46,029                      | 17 | 4  | 163,000     | 0  | 0  |
| July .....      | 290,786                                        | 6  | 0  | 23,786                      | 6  | 0  | 267,000     | 0  | 0  |
| August .....    | 250,583                                        | 9  | 1  | 23,583                      | 9  | 1  | 227,000     | 0  | 0  |
| September ..... | 236,583                                        | 9  | 1  | 117,583                     | 9  | 1  | 119,000     | 0  | 0  |
| October .....   | 294,710                                        | 9  | 0  | 101,710                     | 9  | 0  | 193,000     | 0  | 0  |
| November .....  | 261,710                                        | 9  | 0  | 38,710                      | 9  | 0  | 223,000     | 0  | 0  |
| December .....  | 353,051                                        | 3  | 10 | 298,910                     | 9  | 0  | 54,140      | 14 | 10 |
| 1800.           |                                                |    |    |                             |    |    |             |    |    |
| January .....   | 744,951                                        | 4  | 0  | 453,951                     | 4  | 0  | 291,000     | 0  | 0  |
| February .....  | 328,951                                        | 4  | 0  | 73,951                      | 4  | 0  | 255,000     | 0  | 0  |
| March .....     | 315,539                                        | 12 | 2  | 115,539                     | 12 | 2  | 200,000     | 0  | 0  |
| April .....     | 456,806                                        | 11 | 0  | 112,366                     | 11 | 0  | 344,500     | 0  | 0  |

Navy Pay Office, 26th April, 1806.

Examined,
GEO. FENNELL.

Then John Meheux, esq., was again called in.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you recollect at what period the commencement of payment of salaries to the officers of the board of control took place?

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I submit whether this is quite regular. The witness was here yesterday, at which time he was examined on the part of the honourable managers, and was cross-examined by us; and he was, I believe, either re-examined, or they might have re-examined him then. Now, I understood the honourable manager, in a prior stage of this business to negative any right on our part to cross-examine the honourable manager himself, unless we did it then. He laid in his claim to resist any examination on a posterior day. And will not this prolong the business infinitely, if a witness examined, cross-examined, and re-examined, is to be called up again?

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the examination would not have lasted half the length of the time taken up to resist it; but the Commons will put in the act of the 33rd of the present king, chapter 52, which appointed 5,000*l.* a year, at the discretion of his majesty, to be divided among the officers of that board. I wish to ask the witness if he does not know that lord Melville is now in the receipt of a pension from the India company?

Lord Chancellor.—Any question put to this witness (under the circumstances) must be a question put by leave of the Court.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, if the learned counsel object to this, I will waive it.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, it is only that the business may not be protracted for ever.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, as the learned counsel thought it right to endeavour to show upon their cross-examination, how lord Melville acted for the public; we were willing to show how lord Melville was paid by the public.

My lords, the Commons wish to call your lordships' attention to an attested entry in the Commons' Journal, where the act of the 33rd of the king, cap. 52, was delivered in to show that Mr. Secretary Dundas was one of the persons ordered to bring in that bill.

Lord Chancellor.—Has that been examined?

Mr. Whitbread.—I understand it has not; but the Commons will put in an attested copy from the Parliament-office.

Then an entry in the Journals of the Commons was read as follows:

“Mercurij, 8<sup>o</sup> Die Maij, Anno 33<sup>o</sup>
Georgij III. Regis, 1793.

“Ordered, that a bill or bills be brought in upon the said resolutions, and that Mr. Secretary Dundas, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Attorney General, and Mr. Solicitor General, do prepare and bring in the same.”

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons now propose to call before your lordships, one or two witnesses on single points, which are necessary for the conclusion of their case.

Then John Spottiswoode, esq., was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you a solicitor, now acting in London?

Mr. Spottiswoode.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you in partnership with your late father, in the same profession?

Mr. Spottiswoode.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know whether your late father acted as lord Melville's solicitor?

Mr. Spottiswoode.—If the question means to ask generally, I say no—if to ask as to his acting occasionally, in various detached business, I answer yes.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, the Commons now propose to call Mr. Hugh Warrender.

Then Hugh Warrender, esq., was called in, and, being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you deputy keeper of the signet?

Mr. Warrender.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was lord Melville at any time keeper of the signet of Scotland?

Mr. Warrender.—He was.

Mr. Whitbread.—Is he so now?

Mr. Warrender.—He is not.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long has his lordship ceased to be keeper of the signet?

Mr. Warrender.—About six years.

Mr. Whitbread.—Who is the present keeper of the signet?

Mr. Warrender.—The honourable Robert Dundas.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was the reversion of keeper of the signet granted to the honourable Robert Dundas, previous to lord Melville's resignation?

Lord Chancellor.—That must appear from the appointment.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know the actual average income of the keeper of the signet?

Mr. Warrender.—It is very various—I suppose taking the whole together, upon the average, it is from 1,800*l.* to 2,000*l.* a year.

Mr. Whitbread.—When you speak of contingencies, do you mean that there are a number of valuable offices which are at the disposal of that office, which produce, in some years, a considerable amount?

Mr. Warrender.—I take all into consideration.

Mr. Whitbread.—But do they not arise in that mode, by the sale of valuable offices belonging to it?

Mr. Warrender.—They do.

Mr. Whitbread.—So as to produce in one or two years many thousands, and at other periods nothing at all.

Mr. Warrender.—They do.

A Lord.—You have stated, that upon the average, the produce of this office is from 1,800*l.* to 2,000*l.* a year—how many years back do you take that average upon?

Mr. Warrender.—I was only told since I came into this room this morning, that I should be asked that question; I have had no time to consider it maturely, it was just what occurred to my mind upon the present moment.

A Lord.—Did this occur to your mind as the average of five years, or the average of twenty?

Mr. Warrender.—I think it occurred upon the general average, taking all years into consideration, but it is very loose, it is upon the moment.

A Lord.—Down to what period did lord Melville continue to be lord advocate of Scotland?

Mr. Warrender.—I do not at present recollect—it must have been between 1780 and 1790, I think.

A Lord.—I believe it was to 1784. The salary and emoluments attending upon that office, I scarcely need ask you, were very considerable?

Mr. Warrender.—They are certainly understood to be so.

A Lord.—You did not mention when lord Melville became keeper of the signet, do you recollect that?

Mr. Warrender.—I believe he became joint keeper of the signet along with the late Mr. Andrew Stewart, about the year 1778.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, we wish now to call Mr. Robert Dundas, writer to the signet, in Scotland.

Then Robert Dundas, esq., was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you in the receipt of lord Melville's salary, on his account, as keeper of the privy seal in Scotland?

Mr. Dundas.—I am.

Mr. Whitbread.—How long has lord Melville held that office?

Mr. Dundas.—Since June 1800.

Mr. Whitbread.—Has any addition been made to the salary of that office, or any contingent addition, since 1800?

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I do not see how that is material; but, if it is, it must appear by written documents.

Mr. Whitbread.—Are you in the receipt of lord Melville's income in Scotland generally?

Mr. Dundas.—I am.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Whitbread.—The very last thing to which I wish to call your lordships' attention is, that having shown that a certain release was executed by lord Melville, in Scotland, on the 18th February, 1803; I wish to show your lordships, that lord Melville was actually in London, on the 20th of April, in the same year, and for that purpose, I refer to your lordships' Journals upon the subject; wherein it is stated, that on the 20th of April 1803, lord Melville took his seat in the house of peers.

Mr. Plumer.—If any thing turns upon the precise day, I have no objection to the fact being so stated.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, with that the Commons close their evidence.

[Note.—As it is fit that the forms of the House of Lords, upon trials before them, should be known and correctly recorded, we think it right to observe, that all questions, whether from the managers or from the counsel of viscount Melville, were addressed by the one and the other to the House, and put to the witnesses by the lord chancellor, although we have not put the questions, as so put by the lord chancellor, except in those instances where the question proceeded from himself.]

Mr. Solicitor General (sir Samuel Romilly).—My lords, the Commons having concluded the evidence which they had to offer to your lordships; it is now become my duty to sum up and to observe upon that evidence. And, my lords, in the discharge of that duty, I shall be careful in every observation which I make to your lordships, to bear in mind,—and if I could think it necessary, I would entreat your lordships to bear in mind—that the evidence upon which I am to observe is the evidence only of the accusers: that the most important part of this, as of every criminal proceeding, yet remains: that till the defendant has been heard, till his witnesses have been examined, although the case may appear to be proved, it is impossible to say that any fact has been established. The witnesses of the defendant may contradict that which your lordships have heard sworn, they may explain that which appears to be doubtful, they may clear up that which is suspicious.

Great injustice, undoubtedly, would be done to any accused party, if you were to take the facts which he has not yet had an opportunity of disproving as being finally established; or, if you were even to consider all the force and extent of them, without recollecting that the answer to them is yet to come. No man can have been much accustomed to judicial investigations, without having often, in his own experience, found a case proved in a manner which appeared to him to be unanswerable, and which has yet afterwards received a full and satisfactory answer.

At the same time, my lords, it will be my duty on behalf of the Commons, to represent to your lordships, the full force and effect of that evidence which has been produced; to state what, if the case should not be answered, are the crimes which will be established against the noble lord; and what the aggravations with which those crimes are accompanied.

It is my duty, in the present stage of the cause, to state this, not only in justice to those whose commands I have received, but also in justice to the noble lord himself. It is fit, my lords, that the full force and extent of the prosecutor's case should be stated now, while the defendant and his counsel have yet time to answer it; and the great use of a proceeding, such as that in which I am now engaged, is, that the Court may be fully aware of all the evidence which they are to expect the defendant to answer; and that the defendant likewise may be fully apprised what it is that he is required to answer.

My lords, in the discharge of the duty which has been imposed upon me, it will be necessary for me to state many things, which it must be extremely painful to the noble lord, and to those who are most nearly connected with him, to hear. For myself, I can only say, that it is with no feeling of satisfaction that I shall discharge that duty. The Commons, my lords, are engaged in no personal contest; they entertain no private animosity: and when they recollect the power which the noble lord has enjoyed; the splendor in which he has lived; the envied height to which the favour of his sovereign had raised him; and contrast that with his present situation, called upon to answer to his country for offences which deeply involve his character and his reputation: I say when they reflect upon this, it is with no feelings of satisfaction, much less of exultation and of triumph. But, my lords, they are bound not to show favour to the noble lord; they cannot favour him without betraying their constituents; indulgence to him would be treachery to their country.

My lords, we stand in a situation of great responsibility; we are sensible that the managers for the House of Commons; the witnesses who have been examined; nay, every person upon whom it depends, that this trial shall be brought to its just issue; stand at this moment with the eyes of their country fixed upon them, and that we all of us may be said to be in some degree, as well as the noble lord, upon our trial before our country. My lords, we are, as well as your lordships, the ministers of justice. We have a great public duty imposed upon us; a duty second in importance to none but that most solemn and most sacred duty which will devolve upon your lordships, when, the evidence on both sides being closed, you will individually, upon your honour, have to declare whether the defendant is innocent or guilty.

Having stated to your lordships what I conceive to be the nature of the task which has been imposed upon me, I will now proceed to state to your lordships what it is that I propose to do. I shall endeavour, my lords, to explain to your lordships, what are the crimes with which the noble lord stands charged; what the facts by which the Commons conceive that they shall establish those crimes; and what the evidence by which they imagine those facts are proved.

My lords, the crimes imputed by this impeachment to the noble lord, are of two kinds; they are offences against the common law, and a direct breach of a positive act of parliament. The first and the tenth articles of impeachment relate only to offences at the common law: all the other articles comprise in them offences at the common law, and likewise violations of the act of parliament.

My lords, I shall proceed in the order in which the managers have proceeded with their evidence before your lordships; and I shall take the first and the tenth articles together; and an observation which has very recently fallen from one of the learned counsel for the defendant, makes it necessary for me to observe to your lordships, that the first and the tenth articles are in substance the same, except that the first article charges the noble lord with having declared in the House of Commons, that he would not reveal the application of a large sum of public money in his hands; and that the tenth article does not contain any such charge: in all other respects, the first and the tenth articles are the same. All the evidence which applies to one of them, applies to the other; and, my lords, the sending up to the House of Lords the supplementary article of impeachment,—though I have heard it represented, and from the observation of the learned counsel to-day, I should imagine that he meant to suggest, that it was attended with some circumstance of hardship,—was in fact a proceeding purely of fairness and indulgence to the noble lord.

The first article had charged, that during the treasurership of the defendant, before the act of parliament had passed, he had applied to his own emolument large sums of public money which had come to his hands; and a particular sum of 10,000*l.* was mentioned in that article.

The Commons were in possession of evidence to prove that the noble lord had possessed himself of much larger sums than that sum of 10,000*l.*, and they might unquestionably under the first article have given evidence of all the sums of which they have produced evidence before your lordships; but as they conceived that it was possible that the noble lord and those with whom he advised might have their attention directed, to only one specific sum of 10,000*l.*, and that therefore he might not be so well prepared to defend himself with respect to the other sums, which they meant to charge him with having applied to his own use, they thought it a proceeding only of fairness and of candour to the noble lord, to carry up another article of impeachment, which would particularly draw his attention to all the other sums which they conceived they should be able to prove, that the noble lord had possessed himself of, amounting altogether to the sum of 27,000*l.*

My lords, the offence charged in the first or tenth article then is this: it is that the noble lord, filling a high and public office, and having received an augmentation of his salary upon the express condition that he should not derive any emolument whatever from the public money in his hands, did notwithstanding apply the public money to his own use, and make profit of it.

That is the simple charge contained in the first article. And then the Commons charge, as I have before stated, the noble lord's refusal to answer as to the application which he had made of the public money. My lords, I apprehend that it hardly can be necessary for me to state to your lordships, that the fact so charged is an offence at the common law, provided it be made out in evidence.

That an officer receiving a salary upon the express condition, that he will not do a certain act, and afterwards doing that act, is guilty of a breach of his duty, as a public officer; and that as such, he is indictable, is a proposition upon which I apprehend that no doubt will be raised in your lordships' minds.

My lords, I shall now proceed to state the facts, and to observe upon the evidence which has been adduced in support of them; but before I do it, perhaps it may be right to observe, that though I am afraid I shall be under the necessity of trespassing for some considerable length upon your lordships' patience, yet it certainly is not my intention to comment upon, or even to state to your lordships, all, or even any great part of the evidence which you have already been now above eight days in receiving. It appears to me, that this cause may be rested upon a very few facts, which lie in a narrow compass; and it will not be necessary for your lordships to follow us in all the calculations that we have made, to trace all the different sums in the manner that they have been traced by witnesses before your lordships; it will by no means be necessary for your lordships to do all this, in order to satisfy your minds that the noble lord is guilty of the offences with which he is charged.

However, my lords, though it was not strictly necessary to produce all the evidence that we have gone into, still that evidence is not, as we conceive, immaterial: we thought it our duty, especially in a case where the party accused has withheld all the information that he was in possession of; where he, a public accountant, has taken care that by himself there should not be produced any evidence whatever, any scrap of paper which could at all tend to elucidate or to explain that respecting which your lordships are to inquire, and upon which you are to decide; I say, that being aware of this, we have thought it our duty to lay before your lordships all the materials that we could upon the subject; to produce all the accounts, all the vouchers and papers that we could obtain, and to supply, to the utmost of our power, that which the defendant has endeavoured entirely to suppress. It is, my lords, however, upon a few facts that I shall, in what I have to address to your lordships, rest the case of the prosecutors.

Notwithstanding so much of your lordships' time has been already occupied, in the narrative which was given to your lordships, it will be necessary for me again, in some degree, to go over the same ground, and to state the facts once more in a connected narrative, so as to make intelligible the observations which I have to offer to your lordships.

VOL. XXIX.

Your lordships recollect, that his majesty was pleased to appoint commissioners to inquire into the public accounts of this kingdom; that these commissioners made certain reports, which were laid before the House of Commons, and upon which the House of Commons came to certain resolutions.

The third report of the commissioners has been read in evidence; and your lordships will find that the commissioners, in inquiring into the conduct of the office of treasurer of the navy, found it a matter of great public inconvenience, that large sums of money were suffered to remain in the hands of that public officer; they represented that, in their report, as being a matter which called for the interposition of the legislature, and they observe, "that where public money is appointed for a service, or a purpose, to arrive at a future time, we are of opinion, the public alone ought to have the custody and use of that money in the mean time, and until the service or purpose calls for its application." I do not trouble your lordships with more of the report; but your lordships see that the commissioners were extremely struck with the inconvenience which either did, or which might, result to the public from the large sums of money, which the treasurers of the navy had in their possession, being applied by them to the purposes of private advantage.

The House of Commons, after this report was laid before them, on the 19th of June, 1782, came to certain resolutions; and your lordships will find that one of the resolutions of that House of Commons, of which the noble defendant was at that time a member, is in these words: "That it is the opinion of the committee (being a committee of the whole House), that from henceforward the paymaster general of his majesty's land forces, and the treasurer of the navy for the time being, shall not apply any sum or sums of money, imprested to them, or either of them, for any purpose of advantage or interest to themselves, either directly or indirectly." His majesty was graciously pleased to act upon this resolution. It was thought advisable by his majesty's ministers, and his majesty was pleased to listen to that advice, to give an augmentation of salary to the treasurer of the Navy, so large as to more than double the salary which he before received, upon an express condition and for the sole purpose, that he should not make any use whatever of the public money: that he should not derive from it any advantage or any emolument whatever.

The treasurer of the Navy at this time was Mr. Barré; and the augmentation of his salary was of the sum of 2,150*l.* a year, making upon the whole a clear salary, as it was then imagined, of 4,000*l.* a year (which your lordships will find not very accurately imagined), in full satisfaction of all wages, fees and other perquisites and emoluments theretofore enjoyed by the treasurer of the Navy: These were the words contained in the warrant under his majesty's sign manual, by which he gave that augmentation of salary to Mr. Barré.

My lords, the country having purchased, at so large a price, from the person who was to execute this important office, that he would not make any advantage whatever of the public money, but keep it entirely reserved for the public and for public services, it might well be expected that the person receiving this consideration would have performed his part of that contract.

My lords, your lordships find that Mr. Barré did faithfully perform it: Mr. Barré made no advantage whatever of the public money in his hands; he continued, however, but for a short time to be the treasurer of the Navy; and in the month of August, in the same year, on the 19th of that month, the noble defendant, then Mr. Dundas, the lord advocate of Scotland, was appointed to that office.

My lords, he was appointed to it exactly in the same manner, and under the same terms, as Mr. Barré had been appointed to it; with the exception, however, that your lordships will find there was a greater increase of salary given to lord Melville, than had been given to Mr. Barré, in order to secure, what it seems had not been perfectly secured before, a clear and complete salary of 4,000*l.* a year, for the execution of the office.

My lords, the warrant under his majesty's sign manual, granting this increase of salary, which does not bear date till the 23rd of October, two months after the noble lord's appointment, gives to him an additional allowance of 2,324*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* in order to make, together, with the acknowledged salary which he had before, being 1,850*l.*, an income to amount in future to the sum of 4,000*l.*; and "that," his majesty is pleased to say, "We are graciously pleased to grant him, clear of all deductions, in full satisfaction of all wages, and fees, and other profits and emoluments, heretofore enjoyed by former treasurers of our Navy; the same to commence and be computed from the day of the date of our letters patent." And then, that he might be perfectly secure in the enjoyment of this full salary of 4,000*l.* a year, "We do further direct, authorize, and empower him, in case the said additional allowance of 2,323*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* together with the said several allowances before stated, shall not produce in each year the nett sum of 4,000*l.*; to charge the deficiency, if there be any, in the annual amount of monies disbursed by him for fees of divers natures."

The noble lord was in possession of this salary of 4,000*l.* a year, under this warrant, during the whole time that he filled the office of treasurer of the Navy; and the only question before your lordships is, Whether, having received this upon the express condition which I have stated, he has or has not complied with that condition? I am sure your lordships must see, from this state of the question, that if as one may conjecture may be the case, from some questions that have been put to some of the witnesses who have been examined before your lordships, if any attempt should be made to draw your lordships into a consideration whether or not the public have sustained any loss, whether any actual disadvantage or inconvenience has been incurred by the use that has been made of the public money; an attempt will be made to divert your attention from that which you are called upon to decide, to something which is wholly indifferent to it.

My lords, it was not a matter that remained for the person who received so very large an increase of salary upon the express terms of not deriving emolument from the public money, to inquire whether the public would sustain any loss or not by it. The inconvenience to the public arising from such a practice, the probable, or the mere possible, consequences only of a treasurer of the Navy being permitted to make use of the public money, were seen to be such, that it was thought, on the part of the public, that a cheap purchase, a most advantageous bargain, would be made by giving so large a portion of the public revenue, as above 2,000*l.* a year, for no consideration whatever, but merely to ensure that the treasurer of the Navy would be careful to abstain from the use of the public money. No additional duty was imposed upon him when his salary was thus more than doubled; he was not called upon to give greater attendance, he was not exposed to a greater degree of responsibility, nothing was added to the duties of his office; all that was required from him was, to abstain from using in any way, the public money that should pass through his hands; and for that alone the public was made to give to him so large a sum, much more than double his former salary.

My lords, it will now be my duty to show your lordships, that notwithstanding the noble lord received this compensation, he wholly forgot the condition that was annexed to it; that receiving this large increase of salary, he yet, as his predecessors who received the lesser salary seem to have done, applied the public money to his own use. My lords, the way in which that charge is proved, has been detailed to your lordships at very considerable length, and I shall content myself with merely stating the facts, and pointing out to your lordships' attention the medium of proof by which they are established. When I use the word established, your lordships will always understand me to be using it because the language does not afford me another word more properly to express what I mean; that it is established, if I may so say, de bene esse, till the noble lord shall have entered upon his defence, and have proved his case before your lordships.

The noble lord having been appointed, on the 19th of August, to this office, your lordships find that, on the 6th of November, in the same year, a sum of 45,000*l.* was issued to him at the Exchequer, for the service of the Navy; that on the 22nd of the same month, a further sum of 50,000*l.* was issued to him for the same service; and a further sum, on the 19th of December, in the same year, of 93,830*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*: Of these three sums, amounting together to 188,830*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, your lordships find that no less than 11,000*l.* was intercepted, between the issue from the Exchequer and the vesting the money in the Bank; that of the 45,000*l.* issued on the 6th of November from the Exchequer, only 40,000*l.* was carried to the account of the treasurer of the Navy at the Bank, and that the remaining 5,000*l.* was received, and was diverted to some private purposes. I do not state to your lordships that there is immediate evidence of the whole of that 5,000*l.* being applied to the use of the noble lord, but that it was diverted to some other purpose than those for which the money had been issued at the Exchequer; that of the 50,000*l.* issued on the 22nd of November, only 47,000*l.* was carried to the account of the treasurer of the Navy at the Bank, and 3,000*l.* was paid in the Bank-notes to the person, whoever it was, to whom that money was issued: so, of the 93,000*l.* only 90,000*l.* was carried to the public account, and that 3,000*l.* of it was diverted from the use of the public.

Your lordships have it in proof, that the 5,000*l.* part of the 45,000*l.*, which ought to have been carried immediately to the account of the treasurer of the Navy at the Bank, was paid at the Exchequer, in five Bank-notes, of 1,000*l.* each; that the 3,000*l.* part of the 50,000*l.*, which was not carried to the public account, was paid in three Bank-notes, of 1000*l.* each. We have not been able, my lords to trace the application that has been made of all these notes, or the hands through which they all have passed; but we have proof as to one of the notes, which made up the 5,000*l.*, and as to one of the notes which made up the 3,000*l.* that those identical notes were applied to the immediate use of the noble lord. We have shown, that one of the three notes, of 1,000*l.* each, part of the 50,000*l.*, was, within a few days after it had been issued at the Exchequer, namely, on the 24th of November, 1782, paid into Mr. Drummond's hands, to the use of the noble lord: that 600*l.* part of it, was immediately carried to the credit of his private account with Mr. Drummond, and that the remaining 400*l.* was paid either to him, or to some person immediately sent by him to Mr. Drummond, in small notes amounting together to 380*l.* and 20*l.* in cash.

My lords, I take the liberty of saying, that we have proved that this four hundred pounds was paid immediately to the noble lord, or to some person who was sent by him to the house of Mr. Drummond; because, although the learned counsel did seem, by their questions, to affect to throw some doubt upon that fact yet, with great submission to your lordships, the fact was proved in a manner that does not admit of the least rational doubt. It was proved by the clerk who received the 1,000*l.* note, and who carried the 600*l.* to the account of Mr. Dundas, and who had paid the four hundred: It was proved by him, that this was not paid in by any person on the account of the noble lord; that there was no memorandum made, as is usual where persons pay money in to the account of another person who keeps cash with his banker; that there was no receipt given, and no memorandum made, but that the entry was made exactly in the same way as it would have been, if the noble lord had himself gone to the shop of Mr. Drummond, and had there, with his own hand, paid in the 1,000*l.* note, and had had 600*l.* carried to the credit of his account, and received the rest in the way I have stated. It is not possible to suggest any mode in which this could have been paid in by any other person, unless your lordships will imagine a case, of which it is not sufficiently strong to say, that it is extremely improbable; one really must say, that, in the common occurrences of mankind, it was impossible. Unless this money was immediately paid by Mr. Dundas himself, or by some person who acted merely as a messenger in carrying the note to the house of Mr. Drummond, and receiving the change of it, after having had part carried to the account of Mr. Dundas; unless your lordships believe this, you must imagine that some man carried money to Mr. Drummond's to be paid in to the account of Mr. Dundas, and was not only desirous never to have any credit for it himself, but was studious to have entirely obliterated all traces of his ever having made such a payment. I say, that of such a case it is not sufficient to state that it is most improbable, it is one that never can have happened.

My lords, I do not trouble your lordships with pointing out in detail the manner in which we have identified that very note; we have done it by entries in different books. In the first place, an entry made by the clerk at the Bank, who issued it at the Exchequer; then the entry made by a clerk of Messrs. Drummond; then by the production of the note itself; and the examination of the witness from the Bank, who proved that there are never issued by the Bank two notes for the same sum, having the same number and the same letter. I do not trouble your lordships to go through the whole of that detail, to which your lordships gave so patient an attention that I am sure it must be in your recollection.

My lords, we then prove, that one of the notes in which part of the 45,000*l.* was paid, on the 6th of November, one of those identical notes was paid into the house of Moffatt, Kensington, and company, bankers in the city of London, in discharge of a bill of exchange, drawn upon lord Melville by a person of the name of Newbigging: We have therefore shown distinctly, that these two sums of 1,000*l.* each, part of the public money imprested to the treasurer of the Navy for public purposes, were diverted by him to his own immediate use, and that he made profit and emolument of them. One was applied to the discharge of a negotiable security, carrying interest; and the other was applied to increase the noble lord's balance at the house of Drummonds, who, it is proved, charged their customers with interest upon sums in which they had overdrawn their account.

My lords, I ought perhaps, at this moment, however, to make some observations upon the nature of the evidence by which these facts have been proved. With respect to the sums issued from the Exchequer, and the sums paid into the account of the treasurer of the navy at the Bank, there was great objection made on the part of the defendant. His counsel were pleased to object to receiving those public books in evidence before your lordships. My lords, there could not, I apprehend, be much doubt entertained, at any time, of those books being evidence; that they were evidence against every body, but particularly that they must be evidence against the noble lord himself: they are his own public books, the books from which his own accounts, those accounts which have been settled by him, were made up: and yet even that evidence,---so strong a desire has there been manifested on the part of the defendant, in every stage of this proceeding, to exclude all information from your lordships, and from the public,---even that evidence was objected to on the part of the defendant. My lords, I am aware that we shall, perhaps, be told hereafter, as your lordships have already once been told, that this was the objection, not of the noble lord himself, but of his counsel, and an objection made contrary to his most earnest intreaties;---one of those objections, of which we are to understand, it seems, that the noble lord is a most impatient and reluctant, though he is at the same time a silent and an acquiescing auditor. My lords, that is indeed a most convenient species of defence, which in the present cause is, for the first time, to be set up,---that the parts of the defence are to be cast, as it were, between the noble defendant himself and his counsel: a most convenient one indeed it would be, if it could possibly meet with success, that the noble lord should claim the splendid advantage of seeming to court inquiry, and of being desirous to have his conduct most fully scrutinised into, and should at the same time secure to himself the solid benefit of every little formal objection, which the ingenuity of his counsel can suggest.

My lords, another head of evidence to which objections have been made (not indeed to its competency, but to the credit which it deserves, and upon which the facts which I have stated to your lordships altogether depend), requires also some observation. The learned counsel have contented themselves, in the cross-examination of witnesses who were produced to speak of transactions of which they had made memorandums at the time in the books which were produced before your lordships, with asking them if they had any recollection whatever of the transaction, but from the entries which they had made; and upon receiving an answer, as they generally did, and as they necessarily must do, that the witness had no other recollection of it, the learned counsel seemed to be extremely well satisfied. Now, if we are to understand by this, that it is the intention of the counsel for the defendant to state to your lordships, that the evidence so given is not full, complete evidence to establish the facts which we have proved, I will venture to say, that one of the most dangerous attempts that ever was made in any court of justice, will be made before your lordships upon the occasion of this trial. My lords, how is it possible that the clerks in a banking house, or in any public office, who make perhaps, four or five hundred payments in a day, can have any recollection of a payment, but from the entries which they have made? My lords, the rules of law and the rules of common sense are not so much at variance, as the learned counsel must persuade your lordships they are, if they can successfully take from the effect of this evidence. I will venture to say, that the evidence would have been much less deserving of credit if the witnesses had affected to recollect transactions which passed so many years ago, and which are involved in the multiplicity of business in which they are engaged. There is not a case occurs, either a civil or a criminal case, in which it is necessary to trace payments through bankers, to follow drafts, to pursue securities, which have been forged, and trace them back to the original contriver of the fraud, or the original author of the forgery, in which it would be possible to convict in a criminal case, or to do justice between the parties in a civil case, if such a doctrine, as the counsel have more than hinted to us that they will endeavour to establish, were to receive the least countenance from your lordships. My lords, consider to what extent this must go: if your lordships are to give countenance to this objection, it will be hardly possible ever to prove any deed which has been executed; because the persons attesting deeds, the clerks of attorneys, or other persons whose professions call them to attest deeds, usually attest such a number that they cannot recollect the execution of any one particular deed, except by seeing the attestation which they have signed. But it is so well established that this is legal and sufficient evidence, that there has been a case decided in which it has been stated in what way that species of evidence is to be given: I allude to a case to be found in the third volume of those reports which commonly go by the name of the Term Reports, the case of Doe v. Perkins;* in which, after great consideration, it was decided, not that a witness may speak from an entry which he made at the time, having no other recollection of the transaction, because that was a matter which admitted not of the least doubt; but in which it was decided, that in such a case where the person has no recollection of a transaction but from an entry he has made in a book, the original book, containing that entry, must be produced: whereas, if he had any recollection of the transaction independent of that entry, the original need not be produced. It would be wasting your lordships' time to take up any more of it in observing upon that part of the evidence.

* 3 T. R. 749.

My lords, we have proved to your lordships these two sums, amounting together to 2,000*l.* of the public money, appropriated by the noble lord to his own use, within a few months after he had been appointed to the office. Your lordships will recollect, it was impossible that those sums could have been received for the salary of the noble lord. In the first place, his salary would not have amounted to near so much within the period of time within which this happened. In the next place, from the noble lord's accounts at Messieurs Drummonds, which have been produced, your lordships find that Mr. Douglas had made other payments to the noble lord on account of his salary before this transaction took place; it is impossible, therefore, in that way to account for it.

Now, my lords, it is certainly not in the power of the Commons to show your lordships, in the same direct, and, using the expression with the reserve which I have before stated to your lordships, in the same unanswerable way that the remainder of the 27,000*l.* of public money, which is stated in the tenth article, was applied to the use of the noble lord.—And your lordships will not understand me to be speaking of 27,000*l.* as being taken at any one time; for there never was 27,000*l.*, or more than 23,000*l.* of the public money at any one time, during the first treasurership applied to private purposes.—It will not, I say, be in our power to prove, as directly and as distinctly as we have done with respect to the two sums of 1,000*l.* each, the employment of the rest of the money for the use of the noble lord; but we shall show your lordships that the other sums of which we have given evidence, instead of being where they ought to have been, in the Bank, were, by the permission, and by the means of the noble lord, in private hands.

My lords, we have shown your lordships, that on the 30th of April, in the year 1783;—April, 1783, being the month in which the noble lord quitted his first treasurership;—we have shown by proving what were the treasurer of the navy's official balances on that day, and by showing what the balance in the Bank was on that day: that 23,000*l.* of the money which had been issued by the Exchequer for naval service, was not in the Bank, applicable to any naval services. The official balances on that day were 89,408*l.* 12*s.*

3*d.*—The Bank balances from the treasurer of the navy's banking-book were 66,408*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* leaving a deficiency of 23,000*l.*; or if it be more grateful to the ears of the learned counsel for the defendant, a difference of 23,000*l.* My lords, that 23,000*l.* was reduced by payments, which were made in the months of June and July,—payments made into the Bank on account of the treasurer of the navy, to the sum of 7,600*l.* On the 24th of June, a sum of a thousand pounds was paid by some private individual into the Bank, to the account of the treasurer of the navy.—In the month of July, two sums, one of 5,000*l.* and another of 6,000*l.* were paid into the Bank to the account of the treasurer of the navy; and we have proved that they were paid by Messieurs Mure and Atkinson, by drafts upon Smith, Payne and Smith; and that those drafts were paid by Bank-notes, which Bank-notes were carried into the Bank to the account of the treasurer of the navy.

My lords, we have proved the same thing with respect to a sum of 2,000*l.* paid on the 31st of July also, by Mure and Atkinson, to the account of the treasurer of the navy. We have therefore shown, that 13,000*l.* was, in the month of July only, paid by Messrs. Mure and Atkinson, to the account of the treasurer of the navy at the Bank.—These sums, together with the sum of 1,400*l.* amount to 15,400*l.*; that 15,400*l.* being deducted from the 23,000*l.* the deficiency in the month of April, 1783, leaves a balance of 7,600*l.* due from the treasurer of the navy;—a deficiency, or a difference, of 7,600*l.* between his official balance, that is, the balance which he ought to have had, considering what sums had been issued to him for the public service, and the Bank balance, that is, the sum which he actually had at the Bank, applicable to such a service.

My lords, it can hardly be necessary to observe to your lordships, that all these sums having been paid to the account of the treasurer of the navy, by the hands of private individuals, coming from the houses of private individuals, must have been diverted from public purposes to those of private individuals; certainly it is not in our power (and your lordships unquestionably will not require us), to prove the actual advantage, the exact amount of the interest, or the profit which was made by the noble lord from all those large sums which were so placed in the hands of private individuals; it is sufficient that we have shown distinctly as to part of the public money, that the noble lord immediately received the advantage which was derived from it; and it is for him to show that those sums, so in the hands of private individuals, were there without his deriving any benefit or emolument from them. The burthen unquestionably lies upon him, when we have shown that this money, which ought to have come to the treasurer of the navy only for public services, came from those private individuals:

it is for him to show that he made no advantage of it. However, it is not necessary even that your lordships should presume he had made a private advantage of it; because the extent to which this has been done, to what degree the noble lord has been criminal, may be a matter indeed, which may at some future time enter into your lordships' consideration; but the only question now is, whether the noble lord is, or is not, guilty of a breach of duty; and if we have proved it to the extent of 2,000*l.* we have proved all that is necessary; if we have proved that he made one shilling advantage of public money, after he had received the additional 2,000*l.* a year, upon express condition that he would not make an advantage of it; if we have done that, we have established the charge we prefer against the noble lord.

My lords, I will now proceed to state to your lordships the manner in which the 7,600*l.*—the balance remaining due after those large sums had been paid in by the house of Mure and Atkinson, and the other private houses which had paid it into the account of the treasurer of the navy,—was reduced to the sum of 1,600*l.* The noble lord was re-appointed to the office of treasurer of the navy on the 2nd of January, 1784. The balance remained against him of 7,600*l.* from the month of July 1783, till the month of January, 1784, when he was re-appointed. The re-appointment of the noble lord to that office enabled him, with the public money, to discharge the balance which was then remaining against him; and your lordships will find that what was done within two months after he was appointed, namely, in the month of March 1784, was to pay indeed a part of the balance remaining due from him upon his ex-treasurership account, but to pay it with the public money imprested to him upon his new treasurership account; it was done by a transfer of the sum of 2,000*l.* from the new account to the old account; upon the 24th of April, by a farther transfer of 1,000*l.* from the new account to the old account; on the 30th of April, a farther transfer of 1,000*l.*; on the 17th of June, a farther transfer of 1,500*l.*; and on the 30th of June, another transfer of 1,500*l.*; making altogether 7,000*l.\ transferred by the noble lord from his new treasurership account to liquidate, in part, the balance due from him on his old account:—A transfer of the public money imprested to him for the services of the navy only, to the discharge of a debt due from himself upon his former account to the public. My lords, it is in proof before your lordships, that such a transfer from the new treasurership account to the old one, cannot properly be made but upon an application to the navy board, and an order made by them for the purpose. Your lordships find that in no one of the instances which I have mentioned, was there any such application made, or any such order obtained.

* This account of the transfers is wholly incorrect, and indeed is not consistent with the subsequent statement of the learned manager that they amounted only to 6,000*l.* whereby the balance on the old account was reduced from 7,600*l.* to 1,600*l.* The errors will be immediately detected by a reference to the entries in the treasurer's Bank books as given in evidence, p. 873.

By these means, the balance of the noble lord was reduced from 7,600*l.* to 1,600*l.* and accordingly your lordships will find, that by the balances which have been stated on the 31st of March, 1785, the official balance was 2,608*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* the Bank balance 1,008*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* leaving exactly the difference of 1,600*l.* And it may be proper here to observe to your lordships, that the balance of 7,600*l.* which was remaining due upon the ex-treasurership account, and which was liquidated only in the manner I have stated, must be considered as in fact remaining in the hands of the noble lord, from the time when his ex-treasurership expired, to the moment when he quitted his new treasurership, in the month of May, 1800; because your lordships will find that there never was a period of time between his entering into his office in January, 1784, to the time of his quitting it, when the difference between his official balance and Bank balance upon his public account, the Chest account, of which your lordships have heard so much, and upon which I shall have occasion to observe when we come to the other charges, your lordships will find that at no one time was the balance so little as 7,600*l.*: the noble lord therefore had, during the whole of the time, the eighteen years that he filled the office, this sum of 7,600*l.* of the public money in his hands.

My lords, it is now necessary to bring back to your lordships' recollection, the evidence which was given by Mr. Swaffield with respect to two sums; and I should state to your lordships, that of the 7,600*l.* there being 1,600*l.* appearing by the difference in the balances,—the official balance and the Bank balance of the old account remaining due from lord Melville, the difference upon the new account was exactly 6,000*l.*; so that it was in fact merely a transfer of part of the debt from the new account to the old account.

Soon after these transfers were made, the last being in June, 1784; in the month of August, in the same year, your lordships find a draft drawn by the paymaster;—for the treasurer of the navy drew no drafts, but drawn, in the same way as all public drafts were drawn, by the paymaster;—your lordships find a draft for 2,000*l.* upon the Bank, payable to Mr. Swaffield, but that money was never received by Mr. Swaffield, and never applied to any public purposes whatever. There was afterwards, in the month of May, 1785, another sum of 2,000*l.* paid by a draft drawn to Mr. Swaffield exactly under the same circumstances. These two sums being added to the 6,000*l.* deficiency upon the new treasurership account, make 10,000*l.* deficiency upon that account; and your lordships will find 1,000*l.* paid into the Bank on account of the treasurer of the navy on his new account, by a gentleman of the name of Davis, a clerk in the office, who had received that sum of 1,000*l.* on account of lord Melville's salary. That sum so paid, was consequently received from a private source: you find by that means, the balance upon the new account was reduced to 9,000*l.* and accordingly comparing the official balance with the Bank balances, upon the 31st of October, 1785, we find the deficiency was 9,000*l.*;—146,059*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.* being, according to the books, the official balance, and 137,059*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.* being the Bank balance, leaving a deficiency of exactly 9,000*l.* On the 30th of November, the following month, although each balance had varied in its amount (the official and Bank balances), yet the result was exactly the same; there was still remaining a deficiency of 9,000*l.* and this was the state of the accounts at the time of the death of Mr. Douglas, the first paymaster of lord Melville.—Mr. Douglas died, your lordships recollect, in December, 1785, and Mr. Trotter was appointed in January, 1786.

My lords, upon Mr. Trotter's appointment he had transferred to him the balance remaining in the paymaster, Mr. Douglas's hand, the small balance which arose from the exchequer fees; for your lordships recollect, that all the money which passes through the hands of the paymaster, is appropriated to particular services, and is paid over by the paymaster to the different sub-accountants, the cashiers of the different boards, except the small sum, comparatively small, which is appropriated to the payment of the exchequer fees, and that alone remained in the hands of the paymaster. The balance that was remaining on account of exchequer fees, was, upon the death of Mr. Douglas, transferred by his executor to Mr. Trotter, the new paymaster.

But at this time there never was a balance of any kind in the hands of the paymaster himself; every thing remained at the Bank, except the sums of money which lord Melville had himself withdrawn, amounting to 1,600*l.* upon the old account, and to 9,000*l.* upon the new account.

My lords, Mr. Trotter has told your lordships, that, upon entering into his office, he examined the public books, and that he saw those two balances remaining. He has likewise told your lordships, that lord Melville himself informed him, that, besides the balances in the Bank, and in the hands of the sub-accountants, there was a sum of 10,600*l.* of the public money which he, lord Melville, was to account for; a sum of money acknowledged by lord Melville at that time to be in his hands, or to be in the hands of persons for whom he was to account.

My lords, there might perhaps seem to be something wanting in our evidence, if we had not gone on to show, as we have done, that by these deficiencies Mr. Douglas could not be at all affected. Mr. Douglas's accounts were passed. You have it in evidence, that no demand was ever made upon his executor for any sum, except this small balance remaining of exchequer fees; and his executor has told your lordships, that though Mr. Douglas has been dead twenty years, no demand has been made upon him; and therefore none of those deficiencies could be accounted for, on the supposition that Mr. Douglas had thought fit to apply to his own use any part of the public money.

My lords, it could hardly be necessary, after what I have stated, to trouble you with any thing more upon this part of the case. The acknowledgement made by lord Melville, that he had so large a sum as 10,600*l.* of public money in his hand, coupled with the circumstances which I have already stated, are decisive evidence upon this part of the case; decisive evidence that the noble lord had applied to his own private use, that public money which he had expressly stipulated not so to use, and which he was largely paid for not so using. However, my lords, there is some other evidence which it is necessary that I should state to your lordships, and on which I must observe, that though it is evidence upon this part of the case, it is charged by the Commons as being of itself a crime in the noble lord. I mean, my lords, the admission made by the noble lord, in the House of Commons, that he had of public money 10,000*l.* in his hands; and that he never would, for the reasons which have been stated to your lordships by the honourable manager who gave evidence of that part of the noble lord's speech, reveal them, that he never would reveal them, for reasons of public duty, private honour, and personal convenience. My lords, what the sum of 10,000*l.*, to which the noble lord alluded in that declaration, was, we are totally at a loss to guess. In the sums which I have stated to your lordships, in the deductions which I have made of the various balances which were from time to time in the noble lord's hands, we do not find any specific sum of 10,000*l.* to which we can apply his observations. We find, indeed, at the end, that upon the balance of the two accounts there was the sum of 10,600*l.* due; but as to any one specific sum of 10,000*l.* so applied, we are at a loss to guess to what it is the noble lord alluded. We are however at least to understand, that there was only a sum of 10,000*l.* which had been applied by him to some public purpose, which he would not divulge.

My lords, the commons conceive, that the declaration by a public officer, a public accountant, intrusted with public money for certain specific purposes, that he has used that money for other purposes than those to which they were appropriated by the public, and that he will not disclose what those purposes are; we conceive that such a declaration, on his part, is of itself a flagrant violation of the law and the constitution of the country. My lords, is a public accountant to say to the public, that he has used their money indeed, and that he has used it for some purpose or other in which they are deeply interested, but what the application of it was he will not tell them? Was he authorized by the public, whose servant he was, to make such an application of their money? Was he authorized by his majesty to make it? Was he authorized by any usage that could be found in his office? Had it been customary for the treasurers of the navy, in times past, to apply the money which was appropriated for certain specific purposes, which was imprested to them expressly for navy services? was it the habit of office? had there been any thing like a usage prevailing before his time, under which he could justify such an application of public money? My lords, nothing of that kind appears before your lordships, but the noble lord satisfies himself with boldly saying, that he has diverted this money to other purposes. What those purposes are he never will reveal; and this in a country in which it has been always thought, that one of the most important safe-guards of our liberties is, that no public money should be in the hands of any public minister, but for known and ascertained purposes; in which it has always been imagined that the preservation of our liberties depended upon the government not having the disposal of the public money for any other purposes than those for which it was voted.

It is true that under certain circumstances, the constitution has entrusted the ministers with the use of public money, without their rendering any account of the application which has been made of it: but your lordships will recollect, under what guards it is that the ministry are entrusted with the secret service money; it is that they shall state under the sacred obligation of an oath, that it has been applied for such purposes as it was destined for, when placed in their hands. And will your lordships endure that all these precautions shall be put an end to at once, by a public minister, of his own authority, acting under no such sanction? and that it shall merely rest afterwards upon his assertion that he has used the money for public purposes?

Will your lordships allow him to have the control and disposal of the enormous sums that may be passing through his hands? and your lordships will recollect to what an extent this must go. His counsel have thought it expedient to state, that while in this situation, no less a sum than one hundred and forty millions of public money passed through the defendant's hands. What, is such an engine to be placed in the hands of any minister? Is he to have the disposal of money to so enormous an amount, and shall it be sufficient afterwards, when he is called to an account, for him to state, that he has used it for public purposes; but that he, setting up his own conscience and his own reason as arbiter and judge for himself, will never say to what purpose it was applied?

He has not gone even so far as to allege that it was beneficially applied, but merely that it has been applied to public purposes. I do not say whether the noble lord's character may not set him above such an imputation; but it might be applied for purposes, public indeed, but most pernicious. It might be applied for the subversion of the liberties of the people. The noble lord does not condescend to tell us that he has applied this to purposes from which the public have derived the smallest benefit. I have, says he, applied it for public purposes; what those purposes are I will not disclose. I will not disclose it to you, my country, who call upon me to say what the use of that money was. I will not disclose it now,—I never will disclose it.—And where is it that the noble lord thinks it proper to offer this bold defiance to the law and constitution of his country? It is in the midst of the representatives of the people. It is in the very sanctuary of liberty that the noble lord ventures to maintain a proposition, so bold and so daring as this. At least, one should imagine, before such a proposition was hazarded, that the noble lord was prepared to show, that he never had derived any benefit himself from the money; that he was prepared to show, from his own private papers, from the documents which you would suppose a person, who puts himself in such a perilous situation, would be at all times ready to produce, that this money was never applied to any private purposes of his own. No, before he makes this declaration in the House of Commons, he takes care to destroy every vestige of evidence relating to it: he takes care that there should be no power of tracing, whether any part of the money had been applied to his own private use; whether that assertion of his could in any part be contradicted; and, to add to all this, the noble lord, when called upon before the commissioners of public accounts, to state in what manner this had been applied, chooses to couple this species of magnanimous defence, this assertion respecting his public duty, with a declaration, that he will not, because he may criminate himself, give any answer to the charge: He chooses, resplendent with the glory of this defence, to crouch and shelter himself under the clause of an act of parliament, which enables persons, if they think it advisable so to do, to withhold information of great importance to the public, because it may possibly bring them to answer at the bar of some court of justice for their crimes.

And, my lords, at the very time when he does this, he is himself a public minister, holding a high office under his majesty. I think, at the time when this examination took place, the noble lord was first lord of the admiralty. My lords, the Commons submit to your lordships, that if your lordships can give the least sanction to a conduct so outrageous, so in defiance of all laws, and so repugnant to the spirit and the principles of our constitution as this is, there is an end, at once, to all the security which we, and which our ancestors, have hitherto thought we had for the liberties we enjoy.

My lords, I shall not occupy any more of your lordships' time upon this first charge, by which I mean that comprised in the first and tenth articles. I shall now proceed to the other charges, which the Commons have brought against the noble lord. And, my lords, all the charges comprised in the remaining articles, relate to the facts which took place subsequent to passing the act of 1786. And I shall not take up your lordships' time with stating, minutely, all the several articles; but shall content myself with merely apprising your lordships, what are the different species of crimes with which we charge the noble lord. We accuse him of having, in violation of the act of parliament (which act I shall have occasion to state presently), suffered money to be drawn out of the Bank, not for public services, but for the private emolument of his paymaster, Mr. Trotter. We then charge the noble lord with having himself participated, or rather derived emolument, from the money so transferred from the Bank into the hands of private bankers.

The first of these offences is merely an offence under the act of parliament; the second, that of the noble lord having himself derived profit from the money which was so transferred to his account at a private banker's, is, as we conceive, both a violation of the act, and an offence at common law; because the noble lord, subsequent to the act as well as before, received the same salary of 4,000*l.* a year, and received it upon the same conditions, and for the same purposes.

We then accuse the noble lord of having derived emolument, from the permission which he gave to his paymaster to transfer the money to a private banker's, and to make advantage of it. We charge him with having derived emolument from it, by receiving the services of Mr. Trotter as his agent, during the time he so acted, gratuitously and without paying him any consideration for them. And we charge, as an aggravation of the other crimes, and as a crime in itself, that the noble lord destroyed all the papers and evidence upon the subject which were in his possession.

My lords, I have stated to your lordships, that, in the month of January, 1786, Mr. Trotter was appointed the paymaster of lord Melville. Whether it was from the suggestions of Mr. Trotter, or not, is of very little importance, but lord Melville took the lead in the act which was passed for regulating the office of treasurer of the navy, and it certainly had the appearance of being something extremely advantageous and auspicious for the public, that the person who at that time filled the office, took the lead, and was most active and most instrumental in passing a law for the reform and regulation of his own office.

Your lordships find, by an entry which has been read from the Journals, that a report was made by the commissioners, which is called the Eighth Report, which drew again the attention of the legislature to the office of treasurer of the navy, and to the regulations which it might be proper to make in it. In a passage in that Report, which was presented to the House of Commons on the 23rd of January, 1785, the commissioners of public accounts say, "The examination which has taken place, has enabled us to form an opinion upon another point of importance to the public. The legislature have, in the last session of parliament, introduced into the office of paymaster of the forces, a regulation, which, as it seems to us, may be applied as beneficially to the office of the treasurer of the navy. The custody of the cash applicable to the navy services, may be transferred from the treasurer to the Bank of England, and the account only of the receipts and payments to be kept in his office: all the sums now received by him, may be received by the Bank: sums from the Exchequer may be imprested into the Bank; all bills assigned upon him for payment, may be paid, and all extra payments may be made by his drafts upon the Bank. The payment of the seamen, the artificers, and labourers in the yards, and the persons in the hospital ships on the half-pay, must be carried on in the same manner it is now; these men cannot be paid by drafts, they must have cash, and with that cash the pay clerks must be intrusted as they are at present, and the treasurer must continue to be responsible for them, as for officers of his appointment, and under his control; but this will be no obstruction to the regulation, the money may be all issued to the pay clerks, by the drafts of the treasurer upon the Bank, according to the requisitions of the navy board, in like manner as many of the sums are issued at this day. Upon the death or resignation of a treasurer, the balances of his cash in the Bank, and in the hands of his pay clerks, must be struck immediately, and carried over to the account of his successor. In this situation, the treasurer neither receiving nor paying public money, can be neither debtor to, nor creditor of, the public, except as far as he may be responsible for his clerks."*

This recommendation of the commissioners of public accounts, was taken into the serious consideration of the House of Commons; and your lordships observe, that the whole object of it was—and it may be extremely material, * Eighth Report of Commissioners for examining, taking, and stating the public accounts. 4to edit. vol. ii. p. 3.

when we consider the construction which will be attempted to be put upon the act that afterwards passed, to remember the terms of this Report, which was the foundation upon which the legislature proceeded in its subsequent provisions—the whole object of the commissioners of accounts was, to leave nothing under the power of private individuals; to have the whole of the money vested in the Bank, in the name of the paymaster and in the names of the sub-accountants, and to be there till the moment it was paid out to the public creditors, in discharge of demands upon the treasurer. This it is which the public had purchased before, by the large salary I mentioned to your lordships; and they thought that what they had endeavoured to prevent, by that large salary, would be rendered impossible, if proper provisions were made by parliament.

On taking this into consideration, leave was given to bring in a bill for regulating the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy; and among the persons directed to bring in the bill, is Mr. Dundas, then treasurer of the navy. Accordingly Mr. Dundas presents that bill to the House, and the bill having passed the House of Commons, he is directed by the Commons to carry it to the House of Lords; it is carried there, receives the assent of the Lords, and afterwards the assent of his Majesty; and it will be necessary for me to state to your lordships what the provisions of that act of parliament are. The act begins by reciting, that it appears by those reports of the commissioners, that regulations were necessary for better conducting the business in the department of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, and therefore it is enacted, "That from and after the 1st of July, 1785, the treasurer of the navy for the time being, in all memorials to be by him presented to the Treasury for money for navy services, shall pray that such sum as he requires may be issued to the governor and company of the Bank of England on his account, and shall transmit with each memorial a copy of the letter, or letters, from the commissioners of the Navy, Victualling, and Sick and Hurt boards, directing him to apply for such sum or sums; in which letter or letters the said commissioners shall, and they are hereby required and directed to, specify for what particular service or services the said money is wanted; and shall also state the balances then in the hands of the treasurer of the navy, under each head of service respectively. And the commissioners of his majesty's Treasury, for the time being, by their letter, from time to time, shall direct the auditor of the Exchequer to issue to the governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, naming such treasurer, for the time being, the sum for which such letter shall be drawn upon the unsatisfied order at the Exchequer, in favour of the said treasurer; for which the receipt of the cashier or cashiers of the said governor and company shall be a sufficient discharge: and all sums for which letters of the commissioners of his majesty's Treasury shall be drawn, shall be issued to the governor and company of the Bank of England in like manner as they have been heretofore issued to the treasurer of his majesty's navy; and all such monies to be issued to the governor and company of the Bank of England, shall be placed on an account or accounts to be raised in the books of the governor and company of the Bank of England, and to be entitled, The account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, inserting the name of such treasurer for the time being, for the Pay branch, Cashiers' branch, and the Victualling branch."

Your lordships observe, that the act directs, "That an account shall be opened in the Bank, in which there shall be specified all those various branches, and that the sums which are appropriated to the particular uses shall be carried to those separate accounts; and on receipt of all such monies at the Exchequer, the treasurer of the navy shall immediately certify to the commissioners of the navy, an account of the whole receipt, under the respective heads of service; and shall also certify to the commissioners of the Victualling and Sick and Hurt boards, the particular sums received, and applicable to those services respectively."

The third section enacts—"That no money, for the service of the navy, shall be issued from his majesty's Exchequer to the treasurer of the navy, or shall be placed, or directed to be placed, in his hands or possession, but the same shall be issued and directed to be paid to the governor and company of the Bank of England."

And your lordships will find, in the 11th section of the act—so anxious was the legislature to take care that no money should on any account go out of the Bank that had been imprested to the treasurer of the navy for public services—that it was thought necessary to specify, that the treasurer of the navy might, notwithstanding the former provisions of the act, issue money to the several pay clerks at the out ports, that money, which it was known by the constitution of the office was absolutely and essentially necessary to be in the hands of the different clerks at the out ports, where seamen's wages were to be paid. So effectually had the act secured that no money should go out of the Bank into private hands, that it was thought necessary expressly to state, that the treasurer of the navy might issue pay money to the several clerks of the out ports.

My lords, this statute having passed; this statute which was to make so important an alteration in the regulations of this office; which was to give the public such security for the application of public money; to provide against that from which so much danger was apprehended, and so much risk it was known might be incurred: the object was thought, by the public, to be most effectually secured. They thought themselves secure not only because the provisions of the statute had been so carefully framed, but because they knew that the author and framer of the statute himself filled the office, which was to be regulated and reformed. They saw, with satisfaction, that the reformer was governing and directing his own reform; that they had to trust, not to the dead letter of a statute, which might be forgotten in the book in which it was inclosed, but to the living spirit of the law, in the legislator, who was himself giving direction and effect to his own provisions. But, my lords, how wretchedly have the expectations which the public conceived of him been disappointed! A few months only had passed, after the act had received the royal assent, when a proposition was made to him on the part of the paymaster, to transfer, to any extent that he should think proper, the money which was invested in the Bank, to answer public services, into the hand of some private banker, where he might immediately draw it out for any purposes that he should think proper; and that proposal receives the immediate assent of the author of this law, he who had provided all these regulations.

My lords, this is immediately acted upon; and your lordships find the balances, which had been remaining at the Bank to that time, are immediately transferred to Mr. Coutts: in Mr. Coutts's hands, they remain but a very short time indeed; it is only a vehicle for transferring them into the private hands in which the paymaster thinks proper to vest them, for the private emolument which he is to make of them.

Your lordships will recollect the evidence which has been given upon this subject: that, after these sums had been so withdrawn from the Bank, the money in Mr. Trotter's hands, the differences or the deficiencies between the official balance and the Bank balance, amounted, at first (when this gentleman did not seem to venture to carry to its whole extent the project he had formed), to only about fifty or sixty thousand pounds; that it so continued for some years: but becoming bolder and more adventurous, your lordships find the balance rising to the sum of 100,000*l.*—200,000*l.*, to 300,000*l.*, to 350,000*l.*; and, in the last year in which Mr. Trotter was the paymaster of lord Melville, at the time when lord Melville quitted his office, and when it was necessary to make up the public accounts, Mr. Trotter, the paymaster, had in his hands, of public money, little less than half a million, above 450,000*l.* At the same time, your lordships will recollect what are proved to have been the balances remaining in Mr. Coutts's hands, upon Mr. Trotter's account, during all this time: this money was transferred to that place, it seems, in order that it might more readily answer the public demands; and yet your lordships find, that at the time when Mr.

Trotter has 209,000*l.* of public money transferred by him to Mr. Coutts's, he has left in Mr. Coutts's hands only 47,000*l.* That, at another time, in February, 1796, after he had transferred 216,000*l.* of the public money to Mr. Coutts's, he had not one shilling of public money in Mr. Coutts's hands; nay, he had overdrawn his account, and he was debtor to Mr. Coutts in the sum of 330*l.* I will not fatigue your lordships with going through all these balances, which have been stated to your lordships; but you find, in successive years, in which these enormous sums have been drawn out of the Bank, for the purpose of being more readily applied to the public creditors, that not one shilling of them remained in the place in which they had been deposited under this specious pretext; but that the whole had been applied to private purposes, lent on private securities to individuals, or upon government paper, or embarked in the funds:—that the whole had been drawn out, and nothing left at Mr. Coutts's to answer the public demands.

My lords, if we are to conjecture from some of the questions put by the learned gentlemen, upon their cross-examination of Mr. Trotter, the defence to be set up with respect to this is, that the noble lord had no knowledge whatever of any of these transactions; that he was a total stranger to them; that he had entrusted every thing to Mr. Trotter, his paymaster; that Mr. Trotter was unfaithful in the discharge of his duty: but that for his default lord Melville ought not to answer, because he was a total stranger to it.

My lords, can this defence agree with another part of the defence, which the learned gentlemen have to set up, the extreme attention and care of lord Melville to all the concerns of the public? How these two defences are to be made consistent, I shall leave to the learned counsel to reconcile when they have to address your lordships. But before they enter upon the task of reconciling them, I would ask your lordships whether it is to be endured, that a public accountant, a public trustee, receiving a salary to a very great amount for no duty whatever that he is to discharge, but the superintendence of the officer under him:—for it is proved that the treasurer of the navy had no duties himself to discharge; he had nothing to receive; he had nothing to pay; he could incur no responsibility whatever; he was only called upon to see that the law was executed by those who were under him; he had no duty whatever but to superintend the conduct of his paymaster; it was for that alone that he received his salary from the public;—and yet the defence which is to be set up upon this occasion it seems is, that he had totally neglected that which was his only duty, that having nothing to do but to superintend the paymaster, he left the paymaster entirely to superintend himself, and to conduct the public affairs just as he might think proper.

However, my lords, it may be proper to make another observation upon this species of defence which your lordships have heard, respecting the vigilance and attention of lord Melville to the affairs of the public. I shall have presently to point out to your lordships the advantages which resulted from them; you have them in your recollection, and I may indeed as well observe upon them now. Your lordships have in your recollection the large sums of public money,—whether with the knowledge of the noble lord or not is a matter of subsequent consideration;—but the large sums of public money, which were actually applied for the benefit of the noble lord by Mr. Trotter, applied under this negligence, this inattention, of the noble lord to the duties of the office; the India stock actually purchased with the public money; the loyalty loan paid for with the public money, and transferred to the public account; the debt to Forbes and Co.; the debt to Mansfield and Co.; the 7,000*l.* reduced annuities, and other sums your lordships have heard of; all paid with the public money.

Your lordships have been told, that the noble lord was quite indifferent with respect to his own affairs; that he was wholly negligent and careless about them; with respect to those of the public, however, he was, as Mr. Trotter was induced to say, from the form in which the question was put to him, quite the reverse; there he was all vigilance and all attention. My lords, it is singular to observe, what was the effect of this different line of conduct in the noble lord; where he was careless or wholly indifferent every thing was prosperous. What greater prosperity could have attended a man the most careful of his own affairs? His debts bearing interest to a great amount are paid without any interference on his part; large sums are advanced him without interest and without solicitation; India stock, loyalty loan, and bank annuities, all as it were spontaneously place themselves to the credit of his account, and swell his profits: all this happens from the noble lord's negligence and inattention; what a recommendation of negligence and inattention, that they are attended with such prosperity! But with respect to the affairs of the public, about which the noble lord was always careful, and always attentive, see what is the consequence of his attention and his care. Sums to the amount of half a million of public money, are all risked upon the credit and left to the prudence of one private individual. If Mr. Trotter, instead of placing this money upon good securities, with the assistance of his wary friend Mr. Mark Sprot, had been a man more adventurous, and had employed it in more hazardous speculations, what risk must the public not have run, and what loss might they not have sustained, and all this where the noble lord was most vigilant and active? Good God! do the counsel really desire your lordships to receive this character of a nobleman who has been so long in his majesty's councils, whom we have so long seen a minister of this country, that where he is careless and inattentive, and pays no regard to what is doing, every thing prospers; but the moment he gives a fixed attention to any subject, every thing is thrown into disorder, and the utmost confusion prevails? I have no doubt, the gentlemen thought they had produced some considerable effect, from the emphatic manner in which these questions were put to Mr. Trotter, upon his cross-examination; but I think the learned counsel, if they mean really to have the benefit of that evidence, will find themselves involved in serious difficulties, when they come to make use of those defences, to which they have so evidently alluded upon their cross-examination.

My lords, in what I have already addressed to your lordships, I have supposed that it might be a matter of question before your lordships, whether my lord Melville really knew that Mr. Trotter was deriving any advantage from this use of the public money, by so transferring it to Mr. Coutts; I have proceeded, and the examinations of the learned gentlemen who are of counsel for the defendant have likewise proceeded, upon that supposition, and I think, unless I mis-recollect the evidence which was given, that Mr. Trotter was induced to say, that lord Melville never knew that he (Mr. Trotter) had derived any advantage at all from the public money. My lords, a better witness upon that subject than Mr. Trotter is lord Melville himself, and I will state to your lordships, what his lordship has been pleased to say upon that subject; and your lordships would be surprised to hear, if you had not already had the evidence read to you, that lord Melville has expressly admitted, that he knew Mr. Trotter drew this money from the Bank, for the purposes of private emolument—that he knew that Mr. Trotter made private emolument of the money he had so drawn. I allude to what was stated by the noble lord in his examination before the commissioners of naval inquiry. Before however I make use of that evidence, it may be right for me to make some observations on it to your lordships. We proved the examination by one of the commissioners; and a great many questions were put to him, upon cross-examination, the tendency of which, if I understood them, was to show, that the noble lord had been taken very much by surprise; that he had not been previously apprised either of the particular questions that were to be put to him, or of the drift or object of the examination which was to take place. One would imagine, from seeing that the examination is to be met by suggestions of this kind, that it bore upon the face of it some evidence of its being the declaration of a person whose artless simplicity had been taken advantage of; some one wholly inexperienced in the ways of men, who had been induced by questions being put to him on the sudden, to give answers which he would be extremely glad at some subsequent time to retract, and which, if he had an opportunity of fully considering, he never would have given; but instead of this, one sees the most extreme caution in every answer; one finds a refusal to answer; a protection claimed under the letter of the law; a desire to be understood with certain qualifications and reserves; from the beginning of the examination to the end of it, one sees the plainest marks of the person under examination being most completely upon his guard, and having had every opportunity possible to prepare himself.

That the noble lord had not a copy of the questions delivered to him, and time given to him after he had the questions to prepare himself to answer them, is certainly true; and I am sure your lordships will think that the reason given by the commissioner, who has been examined upon the subject, was most satisfactory. The public undoubtedly, are under the greatest obligations to that gentleman, and to the other honourable men who made these reports, for having honourably, impartially, and stedfastly, discharged a great public duty which was imposed upon them.

My lords, if they had taken the course, which it seems to have been suggested would have been the proper course for them to take, and had given written questions to the persons whom they called before them, that they might go home and consult their friends, as to what answers they should give; if they had done that, your lordships may be very sure that no good effect would ever have been produced by any inquiry they could make. And if any persons were desirous to have commissioners to inquire into the state of any public department, who should have a specious appearance of rendering service to the public, but who should really never render them any beneficial service whatever, they would have only just to take the course now suggested, to give written questions to the persons they intend to call, and allow them time to go home and consult in what way they should answer; that is, how they could best elude the inquiries that were made.—But is there the least pretence for saying that there was any surprise upon the noble lord in any of the answers which he gave? The very first answer which the noble lord gives upon that examination,—which your lordships observe took place on the 5th of November, 1804; the letter to him having been written on the 26th of June in the same year, so that the noble lord had had four months to consider the subject upon which he was to be examined;—the very first answer which he gives, refers to the examination which had taken place of Mr. Trotter. His first answer is, having those deficiencies in his account stated, and being asked to what cause they are to be attributed,—“Although I take for granted, the sums are stated by the commissioners accurately, I could not, from memory, state that they are so. I desired Mr. Trotter, so far as I am concerned, to give you every information that he could, and it was only in consequence of a conversation with him, immediately after the receipt of your letter to me, on the 26th of June, that I learned, from the manner in which he kept his private accounts, that it was impossible for him to give me the accurate information I required.” So your lordships see, that the noble lord had been consulting with Mr. Trotter, who had many months before been examined by those commissioners, upon the subjects upon which he was to be examined; and the subject had been dwelling upon his lordship’s mind long before he was called upon to be examined. The precept for the examination of Mr. Trotter had been made above a twelvemonth before, on the 23rd of January, 1803; that was the first precept for the balance of the Navy-pay-office; the return to it was made upon the 2nd of February, 1803,—a date your lordships will find extremely memorable with a view to another transaction in this cause; I mean the release which was executed, and the agreement for the destruction of the vouchers which is recited in that release;—a return to that precept was made on the 2nd of February, 1803; the subjects were deeply fixed on the mind of Mr. Trotter, above a year and a half before. It was with a view to this, as he expressly stated, that he had this release executed; there had been conversations between the noble lord and him upon this subject before, and then after mature consideration, for above a year and a half the noble lord is called upon to answer to those questions; and your lordships are to be persuaded, that it was by some kind of surprise, that the noble lord was induced to give the answers which he gave.—It was asked by one of the learned counsel, whether the noble lord was allowed to correct those answers: your lordships were told that he was; but do your lordships recollect, that at a considerable distance of time, on the 28th of March, 1805, after this report had been published, after the examination of lord Melville was before the public, and had been coolly and deliberately considered by himself, that he then wrote a letter to correct what inaccuracies there might have been in his former examination? a letter which the Commons thought it right, in justice to the noble lord, to lay before your lordships, though it furnishes, undoubtedly, evidence rather in his favour, than any evidence they can rely upon: your lordships find therefore, that he not only had an opportunity of correcting it, but that he did maturely consider and correct it, and that after so long a period of time had elapsed; so that it is impossible to say that the noble lord is not to be bound by every word in that examination, where it is not so corrected.

Then, my lords, in that examination, what does the noble lord state respecting Mr. Trotter's making advantage of the public money?—he says, that he knew it; that he allowed it; that he thought it a perquisite the paymaster ought to receive. The way in which he answers it is this: He is asked whether he gave permission to draw money from the Bank and lodge it in the hands of a private Banker, with a view to his, the (paymaster's) deriving any advantage or emolument therefrom? to which he answers "If it is meant to ask me, whether I gave any direct authority to the paymaster, to use the money in the manner above mentioned, I should certainly answer, No. But I have no hesitation in saying that I believed and understood he did, and never prohibited him from doing so; and I believe it was so understood by others at different times, when the establishment of the Navy-pay-office was under consideration, when certainly no competent provision was made for the person exercising that trust of great extent and responsibility."

Now, my lords, when I have read this answer to your lordships, given by the noble lord to the commissioners of Naval inquiry,—an answer, which, upon mature consideration, he thinks proper to abide by, for he does not desire to correct it at the time when he writes that letter, correcting other parts of his examination:—I say, when I have done that, what is there that remains for the Commons to do to satisfy your lordships, that the noble lord is guilty of the crime imputed to him?

The crime imputed to the noble lord is merely this:—that he, after the act had passed, by which it was declared that the public money should remain at the Bank, to be never drawn from thence, but for the purpose of being applied to the public service, permitted his paymaster to draw it from the Bank, not for the purpose of public service, but for the purpose of making an advantage of it to himself, the noble lord believing and understanding at the time, that the paymaster was to use the money for his own advantage and emolument. My lords, what is there that remains? There is nothing in dispute between us: we have the defendant admitting that with which he is charged, for that alone constitutes the legal offence; and I hope your lordships will allow me to impress this strongly upon your minds, that, although we have thought it right to go into all these accounts, and trace the particular sums in the manner we have done, yet for the purpose of conviction, it is unnecessary; for we have, upon the examination of the noble lord alone, that which is sufficient to entitle us to his conviction.

My lords, I cannot persuade myself that it will be seriously contended before your lordships, that because the paymaster, in these drafts, upon the Bank, chose to insert some particular head of service; that because there was something stated in words, which was known to be an untruth at the time it was stated, but which, if it had been true, would not have been in obedience to the act of parliament; that therefore the act was obeyed: it cannot be seriously contended; the learned counsel have too much respect for your lordships, to contend this before you. What! because those words, to the pay and to the victualling-banch, were inserted in those drafts, which were really drawn to place the money at Messrs. Coutts's, for the purpose of Mr. Trotter making advantage of it, had there therefore been an obedience to the act of parliament? The act requires that those sums shall be drawn for, only to be applied to the public service; to these public services they were already appropriated; and it could answer no purpose to state in these drafts, for what purpose it was drawn, because no money could be drawn from the Exchequer without stating for what purpose it was drawn; and these words were inserted merely that there might be something in them, which would have the semblance of compliance with the terms of the act, when it was in truth intended, that the act should be grossly violated.

My lords, what are the reasons given by the noble lord for consenting to this money being so withdrawn? Your lordships are told it was represented to him, that it was proper it should be so withdrawn, because it would be attended with some official convenience. Now, my lords, in any case where the criminal intention of a party comes in question, it has always been considered as an indisputable rule of evidence, that where an account is given by him of his conduct, which does not consist with truth, that that account so given, does of itself afford the strongest presumption of guilt; and I beg your lordships would bear this rule in your minds, when I come to state the reason which is assigned for this consent, given by the noble lord to Mr. Trotter's removing the money from the Bank into the hands of Messrs. Coutts and company. The noble lord is pleased to say, in his examination, to the commissioners of Naval inquiry, and he seems to intend to say,—unless there shall be upon this subject, as upon some others, that variance of opinion which we have already seen between the defendant and his counsel,—he means to state to your lordships, that his reason for permitting this to be withdrawn from the Bank to Messieurs Coutts's was, in the words of his examination before the Naval commissicners; "An opinion in which I still adhere, that if the whole monies, necessarily drawn from the Bank, in pursuance of orders from the competent boards, were lodged in the hands of a respectable banker, under the control of the paymaster of the Navy, that it would add more facility to the conduct of the business of the office, in the multitude of small payments to be made, than if the money were deposited according to the constitution of the office, in an Iron chest. I likewise had it in contemplation, that, in the receipts of these various small payments, made to such a variety of persons, they would be less liable to be imposed upon by that mode of transacting the business, than if they were each to receive drafts for such small sums upon the Bank, at such a distance from the office after its removal to Somerset place. It would add more facility to the conduct of the business of the office in the multitude of small payments to be made."

Now, it is in evidence before your lordships, and it is a fact upon which it is quite impossible that any evidence can be brought on the other side, that there is no small payment whatever made by the paymaster; that he never, in the exercise of his office, had any small payment to make, except in the Exchequer fees, which is a matter of quite a different consideration and is not what is at all alluded to in this answer.

Your lordships will recollect what has been stated with respect to the constitution of the office: that the paymaster is in fact the treasurer; that all the paymaster has to do is to receive money from the Treasury, and afterwards to pay over, to the various sub-accountants, the money which is to remain in their hands, to answer the demands of the public creditors, by the bills assigned upon the different boards; that the payments made by the paymaster are always in very large sums; that in the whole of Mr. Trotter's account with Mr. Coutts, which is in evidence before your lordships, there are not more than three payments, during so great a length of time, of sums so small as a thousand pounds each; that it is never the duty of a paymaster to pay any small sums whatever; that it is only in one branch that small sums are ever paid;—the Navy branch is to pay the bills for the fitting out of the Navy; the victualling for victualling the Navy; which are comparatively in large sums;—but the only branch that does make small payments is the Pay branch. All this is proved; it was impossible that the paymaster could ever have any of these small payments to make; and Mr. Trotter has admitted, and his accounts prove, that after the money had been transferred to Mr. Coutts's upon the pretence that there were these small payments to be made (and which it seems is still insisted upon) there never was any small sum whatever paid, but the money was transferred to the various sub-accountants, all of whom were under the necessity of transferring their accounts also to Mr. Coutts's from the Bank: I say, all the payments so made were made in these large sums, and that there is not the least pretence for what is stated to have been the ground upon which this removal of the money from the Bank was made. But will your lordships be told that the noble lord did not know the nature of his own office? that he was so ignorant of the duties which were to be performed by himself, in the person of his paymaster, that he did not know that there were not small payments to be made? that he was in total ignorance as to the truth of the representation made to him by Mr. Trotter? But, in point of law, can a public officer be permitted to say, that he is totally a stranger to the duties of his office; those duties so few too as they were in this case, and the emoluments so large? But if such a defence can be permitted to any man; have not your lordships the strongest evidence, proceeding from the noble lord himself, that it is not applicable to this case, that he was in truth perfectly acquainted with the most minute details of his office; that he knew the duties of the office, that he knew the duties of the persons employed in the most subordinate situations in it?

Do your lordships recollect, that, in 1786, the noble lord proposed to his majesty a new regulation of every office in the whole of his department? Do your lordships recollect the order of council, the memorial that was made by lord Melville, and the order of council proceeding upon it? in which is ascertained the exact amount to which the salary of every one of the officers is to be raised; beginning with the deputy paymaster, going through the chief clerks of the several branches, Pay-branch, Navy-branch, Victualling-branch, the Inspector's-branch, and going down so low as to the house and door-keeper, and messengers; that the noble lord had taken a full and extensive view, and entered into the most minute detail as to every department of the office, and upon that review he proposed to his majesty an augmentation of the salaries of those different officers, which raised the expense of the establishment from 1,700*l.* a year, at which it was fixed before, to the sum of 9,128*l.*; an augmentation stated, and I believe very truly stated, to be proceeding upon principles of true œconomy; because ascertained and fixed salaries were substituted, in the place of all the fees and uncertain emoluments of the different officers. This the noble lord proposed; he had all the credit of it: he had the credit of being a most active and vigilant servant of the public, who had instituted enquiries neglected by former treasurers of the navy; who had entered into the most painful, and perhaps disgusting, detail as to every profit which every officer, in every situation under him, had: he has the merit of all this, and then, when he is called upon to answer for the misconduct which he has permitted in persons who are employed under him, your lordships are to be told, that he was wholly indifferent to these things; that he knew nothing at all of the duties he had undertaken to discharge; that he left everything to his paymaster, and that he himself was wholly ignorant upon the subject.

My lords, another reason has been given for removing this money to a private banker from the Bank; it has been said, that it was done because there was greater security. The witness who has been called upon to explain that to your lordships, has found himself under great difficulty, to tell you what it was he meant by that greater security. At last he explained, that, by that greater security, he meant that persons might be exposed to be robbed; might meet with accidents; or might embezzle the public money, in carrying the drafts from Somerset-house, where the office is established, to the Bank, and, after your lordships have been gravely told this, it turns out, upon the further examination of that gentleman, that upon one occasion, no less a sum than a million of money was brought by a messenger in Bank-notes, carried in the pocket of the messenger from the Bank, past the office in Somerset-house, to be lodged in the shop of Mr. Coutts. With what consistency are your lordships told, that there were any apprehensions of danger, to be incurred by sending drafts from one place to another, when you see what the risks were that were run by this removal from the Bank to this private banker's, and which, but for this, never could have existed?

Your lordships have been told something about the public convenience, and yet your lordships have had it in evidence, that the public convenience was so little consulted, by the transfer of the money to the office at Somerset-house, that the payments at Somerset-house always ceased at two o'clock; whereas at the Bank, they were continued three hours later. Your lordships would require some more strong and decisive evidence of the public convenience being consulted, if you could enter into this consideration at all; but the noble lord was precluded by the act, from entertaining any considerations of the kind. Your lordships find, too, that the defendant when he was examined before the commissioners, was called upon to give an account of this transaction: if he had acted without a criminal intention, he had but to state what the fact really was; instead of that, you find him endeavouring to shelter himself under a pretence which it seems impossible, upon the evidence as it now stands, should be consistent with truth.

And upon this topic of public convenience, your lordships will undoubtedly recollect the evidence given by Mr. Swaffield; from which it appears, upon the cross-examination by one of the learned counsel, that the only error that there ever had been in his accounts, during sixty years that he has been employed in his office, arose from the circumstance of this transfer being made from the Bank to a private banker's.

My lords, I now proceed to that which, in some points of view, is by far the most important and serious part of this case; as far as it affects the honour and the character of the noble defendant, certainly the most important: I mean the advantage which lord Melville himself derived, from the public money being so transferred and used by Mr. Trotter.

It is not my intention to waste your lordships' time by going over minutely, or dwelling upon all the instances of advantage which the noble lord derived from the public money; there are some few upon which I shall principally insist. The one which I shall take first, is the transaction respecting India stock.

My lords, in the year 1789 (lord Melville being at that time treasurer of the navy and president of the board of control) a conversation takes place between him and Mr. Trotter, no matter how introduced, upon the subject of East India stock; in which the noble lord states to Mr. Trotter his opinion, that India stock would probably (as Mr. Trotter said he understood, at some distant period) become extremely valuable property; and he at the same time, expressed to Mr. Trotter his wish to be a possessor of East India stock. It was a very natural observation to make upon it, that his lordship had better then purchase some stock; and Mr. Trotter accordingly immediately made that observation to the noble lord. The noble lord told him he had no money to command; and Mr. Trotter then proposed to him (he, Trotter, being at the time lord Melville's paymaster), to apply part of the public money, part of those balances which he said he had at all times remaining in his hands, to the purchase of India stock, for the benefit of him (lord Melville), the then treasurer of the navy, and president of the board of control. The answer, Mr. Trotter says, that was given to him by lord Melville was, that he positively refused it, and in such terms that he conceived he had incurred his lordship's displeasure; the whole of which has been compendiously reduced in the question put by the noble lord's counsel, and since adopted by the witness, into these two words, that he indignantly rejected it. My lords, in the course of the same conversation, in which the noble lord had indignantly rejected a proposal, which his very indignation shows that he felt to be a reproach to him,—and he must indeed have felt the greatest indignation, to think that a servant of his should dare to propose to him, to apply part of the public money in his hands, not only to his own private advantage, but to his private advantage in speculating in that public fund in which, by his majesty's confidence which he possessed, and by the confidence which was reposed in him by the East India Company, he could not have been a fair speculator:—I say, that, in the course of the same conversation, Mr. Trotter, it seems, proposed to his lordship to get some person to lend him money to purchase the stock which he wanted, and to lend it him upon no other security than the stock itself.

My lords, to whom was this proposal made? Was it to a person unaccustomed to public business, not knowing what the transactions of mankind upon such subjects are? No: it was made to a man of great talents, having a great insight into the human character, of deep observation, having been in the highest public situations, having lived in public all his life, having held a high legal office under his majesty during the best part of his life; to him it is proposed, that some person should be found who would lend money to another to speculate in the funds, having no security whatever for the repayment of it but the very stock in which he is to speculate. Why, if this was to be proposed by some of those persons who advertise in the public newspapers, that they possess the means to enable persons to make large fortunes, would it not be supposed they were insulting the credulity of mankind by the proposal? Is it to be imagined, that a person not having a shilling to advance, can speculate in the public funds to the amount of 23,000*l.*, by giving, as a security to the person who is to lend him the money, nothing but the stock which he is to purchase, and upon which he is to speculate? Was not the impossibility, upon the face of it, evident? How was it possible that any man could shut his eyes to this? What, a man lend money upon the public stocks, where, if there be any gain, it must be the gain of the borrower, and if any loss, it must be the loss of the lender; since he has nothing but the stock for his security? Could any person, however ignorant of the affairs of mankind, not a man who had a legal education, not a man who had been in all the variety of business in which the noble lord had been engaged, but could any man possibly conceive that, by such a proposal any thing more was intended by the person who made it, than to do, under the false colour so held out, that which had been first proposed, and which was rejected when stated in all its natural deformity? What would you say, if a suitor in a court of justice were to make an application to a judge, and offer him at once a bribe to decide the cause depending before him in his favour, and upon the judge indignantly rejecting it, the suitor should say, I will annex no condition to the favour I ask, but you will accept this present?

Is it possible that your lordships can consider, that upon this conversation as Mr. Trotter states it, the loan of public money to lord Melville was not the transaction understood between them, no matter what was expressed? But after this the transaction is supposed to take place, by some person having advanced the money: no security; no memorandum even of the transaction takes place; the noble lord does not even secure to himself any benefit which is to result from it, by any memorandum of an agreement; there is no security to the lender; there is no security to the borrower; all remains upon the honour of the persons who have made this proposal to each other; and your lordships are told, that no inquiry was ever made by the noble lord of his paymaster, not even after this transaction, whether he had employed any public money for his own private advantage?

If the noble lord was ignorant of it before, was it possible he could entertain any doubt after this, when his paymaster tells him, here, I will lend you; you, the man above all others from whom it ought to be concealed that I am making any advantage of this public money; I tell you openly, that I will let you yourself make this advantage of it? Could it be conceived, that a person who could make this proposal, would abstain himself from making advantage of it? That he would have no friend to whom he would be desirous to afford the same advantage? No matter how the noble lord had before shut his eyes to all these concerns, is there a possibility that, from this moment, he should not have understood that Trotter was making a profit, not from any advantage Mr. Coutts might give him, for having so large a sum placed in his hands, but that he was making a fortune by speculating with the public money in the funds, or upon other securities? Your lordships will find, that, before this conversation had taken place, 61,000*l.* was the utmost of the public balance that Mr. Trotter had had in his hands; but after this conversation, after this indignant rejection, your lordships find Mr. Trotter, as well he might, thought he had complete licence to do what he pleased with the public money. Your lordships find 200,000*l.*, 300,000*l.*, and 350,000*l.* transferred from the Bank to his private account, and speculated with in the public funds, in the same manner as the small sums had before been speculated with. Is it possible that such a degree of negligence, taking it most liberally for the noble lord, and believing that he only shut his eyes to it; is it possible that such negligence could take place? that he could see the paymaster making such a proposal to him, having acquired such confidence and boldness in violating the trust reposed in him, as to venture such a proposal, and yet that the defendant should make no inquiry at all? unless your lordships are disposed, which I am sure you are not, to shut your eyes against the strongest conviction, it is surely impossible for you to say, either that the noble lord did not know of the enormous advantage Mr. Trotter was making of those sums in his hands, or that he was not himself deriving immediate private advantage from the public money.

VOL. XXIX.

Your lordships will recollect, that this stock was transferred from one person to another, till at last, when it became necessary for lord Melville to pay in a large balance at his going out of office, to the amount of 71,000*l.* Mr. Trotter's balance being at that time 220,000*l.*, when it became necessary to make up these enormous sums, the whole of this India stock was sold,—not immediately sold, but transferred to Mr. Mark Sprot, for the then value: it remaining Mark Sprot's from that time till it was afterwards sold, and the money paid into Sprot's pocket.

My lords, I have dwelt merely upon the general nature of the transaction: I have not thought it necessary to go into the minute circumstances which attend it. If your lordships recollect those circumstances, it is quite impossible you should not be satisfied that the noble lord could not be ignorant of the stock being purchased with public money. When you recollect that 1,000*l.* (part of the stock) was transferred immediately into his own own name; that he himself paid 3,000*l.*, part of the 23,000*l.*, to Mr. Trotter; that in all the accounts with Mr. Trotter, he was charged with the interest, and was credited with the dividends; not as money paid to Mr. Lind for the interest, and received from the stock for dividends, but the whole credit and the whole debt, between Mr. Trotter and the noble lord; you must be satisfied of this.

My lords, I now proceed to the next transaction; which appears to me to make the consequence quite inevitable, that the noble lord himself must have derived benefit from this use of the public money: I mean, the transaction of the loyalty loan. Your lordships will recollect, that, in the year 1797, lord Melville subscribed to that loan, which acquired the name of Loyalty, a sum of 10,000*l.*; that the whole of that 10,000*l.* was paid for him by Messieurs Coutts, and was repaid to Messieurs Coutts by Mr. Trotter. It was paid by ten several instalments, all of which are paid originally by Messieurs Coutts, and all afterwards repaid to Messieurs Coutts by Mr. Trotter, and repaid out of the public money in Mr. Trotter's hands. If the transaction had rested only here, one might imagine that lord Melville conceived that these sums of money, which had been so applied for his benefit by Mr. Trotter, were sums that were proceeding entirely from the private property of Mr. Trotter. Your lordships recollecting, however, that Mr. Trotter, who was making these large advances for lord Melville, and who charged no interest upon these advances; for you will remember that it is in evidence, not only that the 4,000*l.* advanced to him soon after he was appointed to be paymaster, and for which a bond was given, was lent without any interest reserved upon the security, or any interest ever paid; but that all the great advances which were afterwards from time to time made by Mr. Trotter to lord Melville, were also without interest; that the whole 10,000*l.*, for the loyalty loan was likewise advanced by Mr. Trotter without any interest being charged to lord Melville in his account; and your lordships will also recollect, that these great advances which lord Melville condescends so to accept, from his deputy, from his servant, were made by a man who, the noble lord knew, at the time he appointed him his paymaster, was living upon a salary of 100*l.* a year, to which he had recently been advanced, his salary being, at the time the connexion was first formed between them, only 50*l.* a year. From a person with such means only, but entrusted with the use of sums to such large magnitude—from this person—the noble lord consents to receive the loan of these large sums of money, without any interest paid for them. If no interest was paid, was not some compensation to be made to him? And what could that compensation be, but the illegal profit which was to be derived to him from the connivance, the negligence, and the consent of the noble lord? This 10,000*l.* for the loyalty loan was carried to the account current which existed between the noble lord and Mr. Trotter, his paymaster; it continued so for a considerable length of time; but at last the whole of this advance was transferred from the account current to the chest account, that is, to the public account of lord Melville, as treasurer of the navy. And, my lords, here it will be right for me to call your lordships' attention to the nature of these two accounts, which were kept by Mr. Trotter; which were shown from time to time to lord Melville; and which were signed from time to time by his lordship. The one, the account current, was purely a private account; the first item of which was the sum of 4,000*l.* advanced by Mr. Trotter to lord Melville, soon after he came into his office; advanced as a loan without interest.

The first item in the other account, the Chest account, was the 10,600*l.* public money, which lord Melville stated to Mr. Trotter, upon his entering into the office of paymaster, he had in his hands, and was to account for. As the accounts set out, so they proceeded. In the account current were entered all the private advances made by Mr. Trotter to lord Melville: In the Chest account were entered all the public advances, the advances avowedly of public money made for the benefit of lord Melville. According to the mode in which sums were required to be advanced, they were entered in one or other of the accounts: when lord Melville condescended to state the particular occasion he had for money, and to make a request that Mr. Trotter would accommodate him, Mr. Trotter understood that that was to be considered as a private advance, and it was accordingly carried to the account current; but when lord Melville, without explanation, required a sum to be advanced to him, it was understood that it was public money, and it was carried to the Chest account. After some time, Mr. Trotter not choosing any longer to run the risk of lord Melville's responsibility, as to the 10,000*l.* which he was indebted to him for the advance of the loyalty loan, thought it better to expose the public to the risk; and, therefore, as he himself says, for that very reason it was that he transferred this from the account current to the Chest account. That Chest account to which the 10,000*l.* advanced for the loyalty loan was so charged, was shown to lord Melville; it was signed by lord Melville; it was, I wish I could say it is, in lord Melville's possession; it ought to be in his possession; it is the public account of a public servant, and nothing can justify the destruction of it. If it is in his possession perhaps your lordships will see it. If it is not in his possession, but really has been destroyed, your lordships will judge what are the inferences to be drawn from that fact. But as the matter now stands, this is clear; that lord Melville, at that moment, must have known that Mr. Trotter had advanced, of the public money, for his private advantage, so large a sum as 10,000*l*. Lord Melville makes no remonstrance against it; there was no such indignant rejection as we have heard of; that indignation which had blazed forth in 1789, when the proposal was first made, was now all stifled; the noble lord submits to have his share of this loyalty loan paid for with the public money; he submits to accept all the benefit and advantage derived from it at the expense of the public; I say, at the expense of the public, because your lordships are not to be told, as matter of excuse, that even if this money had not been so used by him, the public would not have used it; you are not to be told that the public would not have had this advantage which was gained upon the loyalty loan, after the act had expressly declared, that this money should not be used for private purposes; after an increase of salary had been given for not so using it. I am sure your lordships will not listen to an argument of that sort; and therefore I say, it is to the loss of the public that he consents to receive the whole of the benefit arising from this sum of money.

Your lordships have had a calculation of profit arising to the noble lord from all this, and from what I ought indeed before to have stated, namely, that the sums paid to sir William Forbes and Company, and Mansfield and Company, were advanced by Mr. Trotter, without interest, to discharge debts carrying interest. My lords, you have had a calculation of the interest and profits that were derived to the defendant from the use of all these sums. My lords, when the witness was examined to that calculation, the learned counsel thought it right to ask him, or perhaps it was some other of the witnesses, whether the loyalty loan was not at a discount, after it had been subscribed for by the noble lord. I take for granted that it was, but that only proves that the calculation is made erroneously to the advantage of the noble lord. We ought to charge him with having made a greater profit upon it. If the stock had fallen the noble lord would have had to bear the loss, and he must have borne it, if the public money had not been supplied to enable him to keep the stock; he has therefore made a gain from the public, by being enabled to save himself from the loss upon the loan, as well as by the advantage, which he afterwards obtained by the rise of the stock before it was sold out; and by the addition of the dividend paid upon it: it is clear, therefore, that we have stated this most disadvantageously to ourselves, and most advantageously to the noble lord.

My lords, I am afraid I have already taken up too much of your lordships' time; I feel that it is of very great importance, that your lordships' attention should be particularly directed to some of the strongest facts of this case, because it is upon a few strong facts that this case may be decided, and therefore I have dwelt much upon them, and have passed over a great number of transactions, upon which evidence has been adduced.

My lords, I have little to add, but upon the destruction of the vouchers. The Commons have charged that as a substantive offence in the noble lord. My lords, it is to be considered in two points of view; as being in itself an offence, and as affording a strong presumption (if such a presumption were wanting) of the guilt of the noble lord, in the transactions which have been already under your lordships' consideration. My lords, I will take the liberty of considering it first in the latter point of view, as it is to be considered as a presumption of his guilt; but before I do that, it is necessary to state the fact distinctly to your lordships. Your lordships find that a release was executed on the 18th of February, by the noble lord, in Scotland, and by Mr. Trotter, I think, on the 23rd of the same month, in London; and, my lords, I am not quite sure whether the effect of that release has been very well understood by the Court.

It is a release of all demands between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, except a certain sum which is stated to be the balance of accounts between them. And in that release is contained a recital, that the parties had mutually delivered up, or had agreed to deliver up, and destroy, all the vouchers which were in each other's possession. The deed does not itself make any provision whatever for the destruction of the vouchers; there is no obligation imposed by the instrument upon either party, to destroy vouchers; and I should have thought that it hardly could have been a question, whether this were a known form in any legal precedent for such an instrument in Scotland. If there ever was a known form of release which contained a clause for the destruction of vouchers, it would have provided something respecting their destruction; but your lordships see that the instrument here does nothing but merely preserve the memory and record of the transaction; it merely recites that the parties had destroyed all their vouchers, or that they had delivered up, or would destroy them. It has been said that there have not been any vouchers destroyed by the noble lord, in consequence of the instrument, or since it was executed. I think that has been said. I do not mean that it is in evidence before your lordships; it certainly is not;—but it may be said by the counsel, and I have a right to anticipate the defence that probably will be made.

Now, I would give the learned counsel their choice upon that subject; either the vouchers were destroyed in consequence of that instrument being executed; and then your lordships will see how material the particular moment at which that instrument was executed is; or, they had all been previously destroyed. If they had been previously destroyed, they had been destroyed before the accounts were settled, and before the parties had released each other. If it be true, as it has been stated, that no vouchers were destroyed in consequence of this, or subsequently to this, then they had all been destroyed while the account was yet an unsettled and depending account; when it was the interest of each party to preserve those vouchers; when it must have been peculiarly the interest of the noble lord to preserve them, because they were the transactions of his agent. The noble lord's vouchers in possession of Mr. Trotter were comparatively of no importance; but the vouchers in the hand of lord Melville were of the utmost importance: they were the vouchers by which he could alone check the account of his agent. If these were destroyed before the accounts were settled, and the mutual demands released, for what purpose could they be destroyed, but for the purpose of destroying that evidence, which it was known could never come to light without bringing destruction and ruin on the heads of the parties concerned in them? That the vouchers have been destroyed by the noble lord, we have his own evidence. It is declared in the letter written to the commissioners of naval inquiry, and which is upon your lordships' minutes, that it was before this examination by the commissioners, that they were destroyed. In his letter of the 30th of June, 1804, he says, "It is more than four years since I left the office of treasurer of the Navy; and at the period of my so doing, having accounted for every sum imprested into my hands, I transferred the whole existing balance to my successor: from that time, I never considered any one paper or voucher that remained in my hands, of the smallest use to myself or any other person." Your lordships will recollect, that the chest accounts, delivered periodically to the noble lord, and signed by him, were among those papers. "And, consequently, being often in the practice since I retired to Scotland, of employing occasionally some time in assorting my papers, and destroying those that were useless, I am satisfied there does not exist any one material by which I could make up such an account as you specify."

Now, your lordships will observe, that this letter shows, not only that the vouchers were destroyed, but that they were not carelessly destroyed; that they were destroyed with selection, upon mature consideration; upon a judgment, as it were, passed by the noble lord upon every voucher; it was done occasionally, from time to time, when he had leisure to attend to those concerns; when his mind was disengaged from other business; when he could look at every paper; see what the bearing of it was; what its importance; what conviction it might bring against himself if ever produced; which paper it was useful to preserve, and which it was useful to destroy: it was upon this mature consideration, that all these vouchers were destroyed by the noble lord; and this is the evidence he has himself produced.

Now, my lords, consider at what time it was this release was executed. It was executed not upon the settlement of accounts; there is no account settled at the moment the release is executed. The noble lord and Mr. Trotter had both been in Scotland, shortly before the release was executed; they were both in London shortly after the release was executed and yet it was thought so important to have that release executed, at one particular moment, that the release is prepared while Mr. Trotter was in London, is sent away as speedily as it can to be executed by lord Melville in Scotland, and then returned to be executed as speedily as possible in London. And this is done after the precept had been received from the commissioners of Naval Inquiry, for an account of these transactions. The instructions were given for it upon the very day on which the return was made to that precept. The witness tells your lordships, that it was in consequence of this precept that he had this release prepared; and will your lordships, after all this, give credit to what is said by the witness, that he was not aware at all that this declaration, respecting the destruction of vouchers, was in it? What was the purpose of inserting that clause for the destruction of vouchers? Manifestly it was this: the vouchers were already destroyed, and when the parties should be called upon to produce these vouchers, the answer, that they had destroyed them, would require some explanation; for it would naturally be asked, how happened you to destroy all these vouchers, which are so important? For the purpose then of affording an answer to that question, and for that purpose alone, was this recital inserted in the release. This evidence was fabricated for no other purpose; it was, that they might say, the reason we do not produce the vouchers is, that we had agreed with each other to destroy them, and therefore we were bound to do it. The obligation to do the thing was evidently brought into existence after the thing had been done. The vouchers having been destroyed, the deed was executed merely for the purpose of affording an excuse for it. Of what avail then is it, that in this instrument there is to be found a clause of registration? It might never be necessary to use it; and it has never yet been registered, because the intended use of it it has never been found convenient to make; they felt that they could not succeed in their design, and their project has been abandoned.

In some defences I have seen for the noble defendant, it is said, would any man who intended to do such an act have made a public declaration of it in a deed, and have taken care that that deed should be registered in a place where all persons may have resort to it? When the friends of the noble lord used such an argument as this, one would think they supposed that it was immoral to relate a crime which a man had committed, and not immoral to commit the crime itself. It is the destruction of the vouchers which is the material thing, and not the declaration respecting it. It is said, the noble lord is negligent of his affairs; that he executed this deed because it was sent him; that he, a nobleman who had long practised himself in the highest situation at the bar, executed this deed without ever having looked at it; and therefore no prejudice ought to arise in his disfavour in consequence of the recital contained in the deed. All that would be very well, if the vouchers existed; but they have been all destroyed. What signifies whether he states in the deed that he would destroy them or not, if he has actually destroyed them? The crime is, that he has destroyed the evidence, and has endeavoured to suppress all the means of conviction; and not that he had stated in a deed that he had done so.

If your lordships could entertain any doubt upon the state of the facts as they exist before you;—and your lordships will always understand me to be supposing that the evidence which will be produced on the part of the defendant will not vary the state of the case which I reason upon, because if they do vary it, then every thing I have said is to have no weight with your lordships, as far as the case is varied;—but upon the supposition that no variation is made in the facts, as I now state them, I ask your lordships, whether, if any doubt upon the prosecutors evidence remains upon your minds, it is possible that your lordships should not, from the destruction of these vouchers, presume the defendant guilty of every thing that we impute to him?

I should think it could hardly be necessary to your lordships collectively, I am sure it cannot to many of you individually, to state what inferences courts of justice always draw from the destruction of evidence. Most of the cases that have occurred of that kind, at least of those that I have known, are civil cases; but I know of no distinction in this respect between civil and criminal cases. The presumption in the one case is, as I conceive—and I shall presently state why I conceive it is—as strong as in the other.

My lords, in civil cases, a party who destroys evidence of a transaction is always charged to the full extent that it was possible that that transaction could have gone. I will state to your lordships a very few cases, which have occurred upon questions of this kind. There is in Sir John Strange's Reports, a case which was decided at nisi prius, but which has been always recognized and acted upon as law: Edwards v. Delamare. In that case a boy in one of the most wretched conditions of life, happened to find in the street, a ring; he carried it to the shop of some jeweller in the neighbourhood, and desired to know what the value of it was; the tradesman artfully took out the stone in it, told the boy it was of the value of a few half-pence, which he tendered to him, and refused to give him any further account; the boy rejected the offer, and insisted upon having the gem restored to him. That was refused; an action was brought by some friend who stood forward in behalf of the boy against the man who had so defrauded him, and the directions which were given by the judge to the jury, were, to give the boy in damages the amount of the most valuable gem that could possibly have been placed in the setting, from which it had been removed.

Another case of presumption, is to be found in Peere Williams' Reports, Dalton v. Coltsworth. It was a bill filed against a man who had destroyed a deed under which the plaintiff claimed. The plaintiff claimed, under certain limitations, a real estate. The case was decided, I think, by sir Joseph Jekyll, then master of the rolls. The defendant had destroyed the deed, and evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff, of the limitations in the deed; but the evidence, as the witness had given it, was of limitations which could not by law take effect; they were the limitations of a term of years after an indefinite failure of issue: and the Court in that case said, that as against the man who had destroyed the instrument which would have shown what the rights of the plaintiff were, they would presume even what the plaintiff had not proved, and they would presume that the limitation was to take place after the failure of issue in the life of a person then in being. They did so presume, and the Court decreed the conveyance of the estate accordingly; presuming every thing against the party who had in his power the means of showing what the case was, and who had suppressed it.

There was a very recent case—I am still speaking of civil cases only—which came before lord Eldon when he was chancellor; it was a suit instituted between the executors of the late duke of Newcastle, and the executors of Mr. Jackson, who was the duke of Newcastle's steward. It was the duty of Jackson as the steward, and employed in various situations of trust for the duke, to have kept accounts in which it would clearly have appeared what his demands were against the duke, and the duke's against him. He had acted for him as law agent in a great variety of transactions. It so happened that Jackson had kept no account: he thought it a more advantageous thing to set up some great and general demand, without having his accounts to produce. When the case came before the lord chancellor, he was of opinion that the Court ought to presume, without any evidence whatever, from the mere non-existence of the accounts—which the steward ought to have kept, and to have produced,—all the demands which the steward had upon his grace had been satisfied, though there was not the least evidence of it.

The case happens to be reported in the eighth volume of Vesey's Reports p. 363; and your lordships will find the terms of the lord chancellor's decree in these words: "The order as drawn up by the lord chancellor himself, declared that under the circumstances of this case, it ought either to be presumed that the bills for business done by Jackson were paid, or, if not, that it is contrary to equity that any demand should be permitted to be made upon such bills against the estate of the late duke of Newcastle; it having been the duty of Jackson, as the agent, steward, and solicitor of the duke, to have kept for the benefit of the duke, such regular accounts of his receipts and payments, and dealings and transactions, as such agent, steward and solicitor, as would have enabled the representatives of the duke to know the true state and result of all such accounts between Jackson and the duke; and therefore, without prejudice to the effect of any bill that the representatives of Jackson may be advised to file, it was directed that the exceptions by the executors of Jackson should be overruled, and that they should stand as creditors upon the estate of the duke for the balance, in respect of sums received and paid by Jackson since the death of the duke, and by them since Jackson's death."

I have, however, hitherto only stated to your lordships civil cases; but, my lords, I am sure that no case occurs of any person convicted of an offence upon circumstantial evidence, in which the court does not act upon presumptions exactly of the same kind. I will put a case to your lordships; I do not know exactly when it has occurred, but it may have occurred; and that the decision would be such as that I am about to state to your lordships, I think there can be no doubt. I would suppose, that a man were indicted for the murder of another, and that there were no evidence against him but that which is called circumstantial evidence; that is, evidence of conduct or of circumstances, which cannot be accounted for upon any hypothesis but that of the party being guilty; I will suppose a case of that kind, and then I would ask your lordships, if evidence were to be produced, that the prisoner had destroyed the clothes which he wore upon the day upon which the man was murdered, whether a jury would not be directed to presume, or whether a jury would not presume that the clothes so destroyed had been stained with the blood of the man that was murdered, and that they had been destroyed only for the purpose of suppressing that evidence? If a jury would not be expressly directed to presume guilt from this, I would ask, whether the party's having destroyed the clothes he wore upon the day on which the man was murdered, would not be considered as most material evidence in such a case? And whether it could be evidence, in any way but that in which I have stated, that it must be presumed that no innocent man would have destroyed that evidence, which would have contributed to his acquittal if innocent, and could contribute to his conviction only if he were guilty? I do not say, that from that circumstance alone you would infer that a man was guilty of a murder; neither do I desire your lordships, from the single circumstance of all the vouchers being destroyed, to say that the noble lord was guilty of this criminal connivance in the conduct of Mr. Trotter, or that he was applying all these sums of public money for his own benefit: not from that circumstance alone, but from that circumstance coupled with all the other facts.

But it is not merely upon that presumption, that your lordships should act. I submit, that a man standing in the situation in which lord Melville stands, a public accountant, a trustee for the public, a man who had used part of the public money as he himself states, not for the purposes for which it had been placed, in his hands, but for some other purposes; I say it was peculiarly his duty to preserve his accounts; and that the destruction of his accounts and vouchers is of itself a crime which would alone be a just subject of impeachment.

My lords, these are all the observations with which I have to trouble your lordships. I have already trespassed a great deal too much upon your lordships' patience; I am extremely sorry for it, and if I had known how to have compressed what I had to say into a smaller compass, I would have done it.

Lord Chancellor.—In point of form I ought to ask (though I anticipate the answer) whether any other of the managers for the Commons, desire to observe further upon the evidence, before the noble viscount proceeds upon his defence? I rather collected, from the honourable manager, that the Commons had closed their case.

Mr. Whitbread.—Your lordship has most completely understood the intention of the Commons.

Adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

ELEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, May 13, 1806.

The lords, and others, came from the chamber of parliament, into Westminster Hall, in the same order as on the first day of the Trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen who are of counsel for lord Melville, you may now proceed upon the defence, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Plumer.—It is now my duty, my lords, as counsel for my lord Melville, to open his defence. In proceeding to the exercise of which duty I am sure it will readily be believed that I must bring all those sentiments and feelings which such a situation cannot fail to produce.

My lords, whatever encouragement I may hope to derive from the great indulgence I have been accustomed most undeservedly to experience from your lordships; whatever confidence I cannot but persuade myself, I ought to derive from the strength of the cause which is intrusted to me; whatever reliance I may most assuredly place in the wisdom, justice, and impartiality of your lordships, of which every day's proceeding has exhibited so dignified and striking an example; still, my lords, it is impossible that I should not feel all the anxiety and responsibility which belong to a situation I am utterly unable to sustain.

My lords, it is impossible for me not to recollect for whom I have the honour to appear; what have been the stations, the great stations which that noble person lately filled; what is his present situation; and what must be the feelings and anxiety of himself, and all to whom he is dear at the present moment, looking to the final issue of this cause, which is to determine what is to be the close of a life devoted to the public service;—and what is infinitely more valuable to him than life itself—which is to vindicate the honour and character of the noble defendant, from the foul reproach under which he has so long, and I hope your lordships will believe, so undeservedly laboured.

My lords, the defendant has to encounter difficulties of no common magnitude; the charges against him have long lain upon the public mind, and they have been with cruel industry circulated and enforced. I hope, my lords, I shall not be understood in the least to allude to any thing that has been done by his honourable accusers.

He is called upon to answer, not for any malversation in those great departments of the state, to which all the energies of his mind, in times of the greatest peril, from foreign and domestic enemies were applied; but for all the minute details of an office, which, by the ancient usage and course of it, have been always committed to a subordinate, and upon subjects to which neither his natural habits, nor his other occupations could permit him to attend; and this, my lords, after the lapse of a long period of time, after the death of one of those subordinates; and when the other, in whom he had placed entire confidence, is brought forward by his accusers as a witness against him.

My lords, before the noble defendant had ever been heard in his defence he was condemned, and subjected to the most severe and afflicting punishment which an honourable mind could sustain. He has now the misfortune to have for his accusers, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, in the name of themselves, and of all the Commons of the United Kingdom,—a great and mighty assembly, and to whom every possible respect and veneration is due, armed with all the extensive powers and privileges justly belonging to that great assembly, ably upheld and enforced, as they could not fail to be in the hands of the representatives to whom this great trust was committed.

My lords, against those representatives,—with all that professional and parliamentary knowledge and experience, all that the most splendid talents and eloquence, united with the most indefatigable industry and zeal, and a long acquaintance with the subject could produce; assisted too with every possible auxiliary aid, upon a subject of this nature,—he has to contend.

The accusatory matter is of great extent and variety, it is spread over several articles; the evidence, written and parol, has occupied your lordships for many days, and the matter of accusation has been pressed against him, not only in the able and eloquent speeches which opened and closed the evidence, but likewise in all the interlocutory observations which, according to the privilege allowed in a proceeding of this nature, have never failed to accompany every stage of the proceeding.

My lords, to all this it is utterly impossible, within any limits I could hope to have allowed me, to attempt to offer any defence or answer; added to which I have been alarmed with a declaration which preceded the eloquent address which your lordships heard when last assembled, and which I am persuaded was not meant to convey all that it might possibly by a misinterpretation of it, be supposed to import;—I mean, my lords, the declaration that the honourable managers, and, speaking of them, I presume, in their representative characters, that the Commons of the United Kingdom were now upon their trial.

My lords, I feel particularly anxious, that in the outset, this subject should be well understood. I am sure it was not the intent of the honourable manager, by that expression, in the least to trench upon your lordships' free and unfettered right of judgment upon the charge, without any reference to the quarter from whence the accusation comes. I am sure, my lords, it could not be understood to mean that the honour and character of the House of Commons, is in any respect implicated in the result.

My lords, I beg distinctly to obviate any misunderstanding upon this subject. It never was the idea of the noble defendant, it is not, nor ever was, of any one of his friends, that under the circumstances in which the transactions, now the subject of inquiry, stood when originally presented to the public, when it was clear that abuses to a considerable extent had been committed by somebody; and when all remained unexplained from the unfortunate circumstances which at that time prevented full knowledge and inquiry into the subject; before it had been ascertained to whom those abuses were properly to be attributed, whether or not, they were the authorized acts of the noble defendant, whether they had been done with his privity and knowledge, and for his use, benefit, and profit:—while matters stood in that situation, my lords, undoubtedly it did become the Commons of the United Kingdom, the great representatives of the country, holding the public purse, and bound to superintend and guard against every abuse that related to the public revenue,—undoubtedly it did, if I may presume to say so, become the representatives of the people to put the whole into a train of inquiry; nor was that inquiry ever objected to: on the contrary, it has throughout every stage of the business, been courted and sought for. It was fit that the public, whose mind had begun to be irritated in a high degree upon this subject, should have the satisfaction of having the matter thoroughly and completely investigated, in order that it might be fully known whether the acts complained of, were attributable in any way to the defendant, or were without any privity, knowledge, or profit, on his part, the unauthorized acts of a subordinate, to whom the business of the office was intrusted.

My lords, I hope I may likewise say, without offence, that had the present course of inquiry originally occurred to that honourable assembly, I am quite sure that what did take place, would not have been allowed; I am quite sure that in a country like this, the proud and distinguishing feature of whose character and constitution, is the pure and impartial administration of justice, it never could have happened, that that great assembly collectively, or any one individual in it, should have conceived a wish, pending the inquiry, to violate the first principles of natural justice, which forbid the accused to be condemned or punished, until fully heard, and fairly convicted. Unfortunately, my lords, a different course of proceeding having been originally proposed, induced those steps to be taken in the first commencement, by which criminatory resolutions against the noble defendant were passed and carried up to the foot of the throne, productive of the most afflictive consequences to his fortune, character, and honour; by which he was precipitated from one of the highest offices of the state, and separated from his majesty's councils for ever; by which, though held to be only liable to a civil prosecution, he was yet, in the interim, subjected to all the consequences of the heaviest condemnation. Your lordships all know that a criminal proceeding was afterwards substituted in the place of a civil one. And, my lords, in the state in which that criminal proceeding is now placed, if it were orderly and proper, I am sure I might appeal to all the accusers, with a full assurance of their united sentiments, that if in the result that shall appear which neither did, nor could appear in any prior stage of the business—if it should ultimately appear after due inquiry, after every possible opportunity given to sift this matter to the bottom, after every obstacle has been removed,—particularly that which prevented the principal witness being brought forward, to be publicly examined, after months and months have been allowed to ransack all the written documents that exist, by every possible means, to purge and to sift into the truth, to examine, and re-examine from week to week, from day to day, that witness over and over, and over again; after acts of parliament have been made to render him competent, and to open his mouth, and cause him to be fully and audibly heard in the face of the public;—if ultimately it shall appear to the full conviction and satisfaction of every body, that the case is directly the reverse of what it was once believed to be: I am persuaded it cannot be the wish of any individual, that the noble defendant should not have the fair and full benefit of this disclosure. And that if in the result it tends to show that the impeachment in its main character and feature, in the principal ground and foundation upon which it stood, in the main point of all, has been cut down and negated by the clearest testimony adduced even by the prosecutor himself; I am persuaded the Commons of Great Britain, will not find that they are in any respect implicated, or their honour or character in the smallest degree affected; if ultimately after such an investigation, a result favourable to the defendant should take place.

My lords, I am persuaded, that if no impressions of the kind alluded to, are to be apprehended from this topic, much less have I any thing to apprehend from (what I ought perhaps to apologize to your lordships for in the least adverting to) that most extraordinary course of unauthorized proceedings out of parliament, that most alarming outrage against every feeling of humanity and justice, which pending a criminal inquiry was allowed to take place, not in anonymous libels (which, however, swarmed in every daily paper) not in private, not in direct terms, weighing down the character of the noble defendant; but, my lords, in unheard-of proceedings, in assemblies convoked by the written requisitions of persons of high rank and station, couched by some singular accident, in exactly similar language, and addressed in every part of the kingdom, to call forth associated libellers, under the constituted authorities in each county; to utter against a defendant about to be brought upon his trial the most false, scandalous, and malicious libels, in popular meetings, where it was impossible he, or any one on his behalf, could be heard; and not only uttered, repeated, published, but, my lords, to the shame of all decency, carried up to the foot of the throne, and registered among the public records of his accusers.

My lords, I am persuaded, the impression which these proceedings will produce upon honourable minds, such as I have now the honour to address, will be a greater degree of caution in watching the accusation, in comparing it with the proof, and in obliterating every trace of prejudice, which may imperceptibly have been impressed upon the purest mind, in order that it may be as far as is possible brought free and unbiassed to the consideration of this great subject.

I will now state to your lordships the course of inquiry which I propose to pursue; in submitting the answer of the noble defendant to the charges contained in the ten articles of impeachment. It would certainly have been competent to him, if he had been so disposed, or those who appear for him, to have addressed a distinct and separate answer to each article; a different course has been adopted on the part of the prosecution, and it is not the intention of the defendant to depart from it. It will be the means of very much saving your lordships valuable time, to pursue that course; and there appears to be so much of unity of subject, though extending over a very considerable period of time, that I hope no confusion in the consideration of it, especially before your lordships, is to be apprehended from consolidating the charges, and refuting them in one unbroken defence.

My lords, I shall also (with your lordships permission) follow the example set me particularly by the honourable and learned manager, whose able address your lordships last heard, by not attempting — what it would be quite impossible to effectuate—to travel through the immense mass of written and parol evidence, and the various criminatory topics that have at any time been introduced in the course of these proceedings, but I shall rather follow him in the topics which he has selected for accusation. He has with great candor stated to your lordships those were the points meant to be pressed against the defendant, which he has distinctly stated himself to have thus selected, for the purpose of calling the defendant's attention to them, thinking as he very humanely and honorably said, that it was fair and just to the defendant to draw under his notice those points of charge to which he was expected to address his defence. I hope, therefore, that neither on the part of the managers, nor, I am sure, on the part of any one of your lordships, will any inferences be drawn to the disadvantage of the defendant, if I should omit to notice other points of less importance, that have not been thus pointedly pressed and relied upon.

My lords, I cannot but feel a considerable degree of anxiety on this subject, after what has already happened; when in more than one instance the conduct of the counsel has, in a way not very usual in a criminal case, been endeavoured to be transferred to the defendant; I feel particularly anxious, that in this instance any omissions and defects of mine, infinitely numerous as I know they must be, should not be suffered in any respect to afford any matter of unjust inference to the disadvantage of the defendant.

The general subject presented to your lordships by the ten articles of impeachment, divides itself into two general heads. Two of the articles, the first and tenth, relate solely to matters that preceded the statute of the 25th of the king, and must therefore be considered with reference to the then state of the law and the office in question. The other eight articles relate altogether to matters arising posterior to that act of parliament, and therefore involve all the questions that can result, not only from the consideration of the law as it stood antecedent to that period, in what it was not altered by that act, but also from all the new obligations which that act of parliament has created.

In the two articles, the first and the tenth, which are in pari materiâ upon the same subject, and at the same period; in these two articles the sole charge against the defendant is a corrupt appropriation to his own use, or to other corrupt purposes, or to other than the naval services of the public money imprested to him as treasurer of the navy; the continuing that appropriation posterior to the passing of the act of parliament; and, in the first article the declaration made in the House of Commons upon the subject of it.

The criminatory matter is in the second article described as a breach of the act of parliament considered abstractedly, without reference to the use made of the money withdrawn from the Bank and deposited at a private bank. The mere act of removing it from the one place to the other, independent of all reference to the corrupt or improper use of it, being in that article stated as a criminal offence, a wilful violation of the act of parliament, a breach of duty, and an high crime and misdemeanor.

My lords, in all the other seven articles the corrupt use is united with the charge of withdrawing it from the Bank for private profit and emolument. Your lordships will observe, that in the articles it is left a little vague and loose, without stating for whose private use and emolument, a generality throughout that could hardly have escaped observation, or arisen from inadvertence. In addition to those charges, there is contained in one of the other articles a charge, not indeed a distinct one, but which I now understand is meant to be relied on as constituting a distinct offence, viz. The charge of having destroyed vouchers; which is stated to be in a public accountant itself a crime; besides affording the inferences of criminality and guilt which have been drawn from it, in aid of the charge of corruption. My lords, these I believe form the general outline of all the articles which are now before your lordships.

I shall, in the first place, address myself to the two first articles, the first and the tenth. In the first article the charge is, "that the defendant took and received from out of the money imprested to him as treasurer of his majesty's navy, from his majesty's exchequer, the sum of 10,000*l.* or some other large sum of money, and did fraudulently and illegally convert and apply the same to his own use, or to some other corrupt and illegal purposes; and to other purposes than those of the public navy services of the kingdom, to which alone the same was lawfully applicable;" that he continued this posterior to the act of parliament; and that the defendant has declared that he never would reveal the application of this sum; and, in particular, made such a declaration in the House of Commons on the 11th of June, 1805, and stated the motives by which he conceived himself to be induced to make that declaration to be motives of public duty, private honor, and personal convenience. The article then states all this to be contrary to the duty of his office, a breach of the trust reposed in him, and a violation of the laws and statutes of the realm.

Your lordships will observe, that the period of time when this is stated to have been committed was previous to the 10th of January, 1786, the day when the operation of the act of parliament commenced, the statute of 25th of the king relating entirely to money issued from the Exchequer posterior to that date.

Now, my lords, upon the subject of corruption imputed to the noble defendant, I beg your lordships in the outset to understand me explicitly, on his part, to declare that he entreats of your lordships the most vigilant, the most scrupulous, the most rigid inquiry into the whole of his conduct;—whatever irregularities, whatever imprudence, whatever negligence, whatever of blame may lie at his door upon any other subject, upon that subject he pleads not guilty,—UPON THAT SUBJECT, MY LORDS, HE ENTREATS OF YOUR LORDSHIPS THAT HE MAY EXPERIENCE NO FAVOR OR INDULGENCE WHATEVER. If it shall be discovered that in any instance the mind of the noble defendant has been corrupt; that he has in any one instance violated his trust for the sake of money; if he has ever lost sight of his duty in pursuit of money for his own profit and gain, he entreats of your lordships that he may have no indulgence, but that he may receive from your lordships that sentence and condemnation, which, however, being pronounced against him, will be worse than death itself. But, before that sentence is pronounced, I am sure your lordships will weigh the matter well, will carefully compare the charge with the proof throughout, will be disposed to make every proper allowance for the difficulties that must attend the defence, for all that from the length of time may elude the possibility of exact and minute investigation—all that from the death of witnesses, or from the inability to trace and examine the subject, may still remain not entirely cleared up. If your lordships shall find, that all that looks like suspicion of corrupt conduct is fairly referrible to another cause,—considering what was the situation of the noble defendant, what his various occupations, what his natural character, what the general habits of his life upon money matters in particular, and how easily with respect to him, much of what in others differently circumstanced would appear unaccountable,—much which, in the case of a private unoccupied individual, might afford matter of just observation, might yet be consistent with the purest innocence. What are the sentiments and principles of the noble defendant, your lordships will throughout bear in remembrance, do not rest in evidence of general character, or in loose assertions, but in that which is proved on the part of the prosecution by every witness, and every piece of evidence that has been produced, to have been the natural habit and true character of the defendant. And here, my lords, upon this subject I must do justice to the candour of the honourable manager who opened this charge, and who frankly and fairly stated to your lordships, that the sordid imputation of avarice never for a moment, in the mind of any man, alighted upon the head of the defendant:—Nay, farther, my lords, the honorable manager, he who had certainly possessed, and as certainly employed, the best opportunities of looking through his whole life, of examining into all the history of it for the last twenty-four years, and following him through all his private accounts with every banker, and every agent, public or private, with whom he had ever any dealings—in every item—in every paper—in every book that can be traced to give the history of his pecuniary concerns—with most laudable industry, with indefatigable zeal, for months and months, he has fairly given to your lordships the inference arising from all his labours. To use his own language, "the result (he says) of all my inquiries into his private affairs is, that I believe him to be a man of a generous spirit upon money matters." I hope, therefore, it will be remembered that your lordships are considering the conduct of a man, who, if he has departed from that line and spirit of conduct, in any part of these proceedings that are the subject of inquiry, has done it for the first time in his life; that he has wholly departed from his natural character, and that he has forsaken all that every one acquainted with him knows to have been the darling objects of his life, the estimation of his country, his fame, his reputation, and his honor; that he has sacrificed all for the sake of what never was an object of desire, never his ruling passion, never a pursuit that it entered into his mind to contemplate. His disregard of money, unfortunately for himself and all his private concerns, is matter of perfect notoriety; his present situation, and the known state of his private fortune, exhibit the most decisive proof of it. Yet he must be supposed, if corruption is fastened upon him, to have been guilty of this dereliction of duty, for the sake of that which never formed an object of attention to him, in any period of his life—and at what period is he supposed to have done this? Was it when the mind would naturally have been disposed to devote itself to such an object? No, my lords, directly the contrary; it is supposed that one, bred with the feelings and education of a gentleman, placed in the situation most calculated to elevate the mind, descended to the meanness of the most dishonorable and degrading prostitution of his character, for money. What were the stations which he filled at the period when he is supposed to have formed and executed these plans of corruption? At a period the most eventful of our history, it is well known the defendant filled the highest departments of the state; that the care of our Indian empire was committed to him as president of the board of control, then newly established, and at the same time united with it the office of secretary of state for the home department, in times of the greatest domestic peril: and afterwards for the foreign department, when the war broke out with France, and all the affairs of Europe were cast upon him: Surely, my lords, if, under these circumstances, concerns of less magnitude should appear to have been altogether neglected—if, in the private affairs of one never accustomed in his life to figures or accounts, there should be found the marks of what might be termed the grossest inattention and neglect—if he should have altogether committed such concerns to others—if he should never have been brought to give his mind or attention to them, steadily intent upon, and wrapt up in the great public concerns intrusted to his care, surely, my lords, no candid mind would be at a loss to account for such conduct, without any inferences unfavourable to the honour and character of the defendant. In discussing transactions of a more ancient date, your lordships will not expect that I should be enabled, after the lapse of twenty-four years, when the principal agent by whom they were conducted is dead, to be prepared with a detailed defence to cover each distinct item in a banker's book, and to explain how it happened, that at one particular time his account was overdrawn at his banker's, or how, in the mixture of accounts between his paymaster and himself, the Bank-notes belonging to one were transferred to the other. In more recent transactions, which admit of a more correct and distinct investigation, where the agent is living, from whom an account of the transactions in charge can, though not without considerable disadvantages, yet with somewhat of more certainty, be got at, I trust your lordships will receive more satisfaction.

I proceed now to the charge in the first article, respecting the misapplication of ten thousand pounds, and the declaration concerning it in the House of Commons.—I deny that lord Melville has committed any violation of the duty of his office of trust, reposed in him; or of any law or statute of the realm. It is admitted that this transaction took place at a period when there existed no law whatever, respecting public money imprested to the treasurer of the navy, restrictive upon the place of deposit. I insist farther, that there existed no law, either common or statute law, restraining the use of money so imprested, and that whatever obligation existed upon the subject, beyond the rule of official duty, resulted from the compact made with the king; the implied compact resulting from the warrant, by which an annuity, as an addition to the salary was given, from the year 1782, to the treasurer of the navy.

Now, my lords, I beg again, that upon this subject I may not be misunderstood, I hope your lordships will not, when I am about to discharge my duty, in examining the correctness of the allegations made as to the state of the common law, antecedent to the passing of the act, and as to the construction and operation of the act upon this subject, I hope your lordships will not therefore think, that I am flying from the charge of corruption, and taking shelter under a legal argument. My lords, I distinctly avow, on the part of the defendant, that he was under an obligation, an honorable obligation, an obligation of compact, an obligation of agreement, equally powerful upon an honourable mind, to abstain from making use of money imprested to him as treasurer of the navy, for his own profit and emolument. Let it not, therefore, be understood, that I mean to deny the existence of such an obligation. I only wish it to be ascertained what was the sort of obligation that existed. I contend, that independent of the compact resulting from the warrant, and as the law stood prior to it, there was no rule of the common law, no statute, no duty of any kind, legal, official, or moral whatever, that precluded the treasurer of the navy, or any other officer of a similar description,—provided he is at all times ready to answer the public exigency, and to apply the money imprested to him, when wanted, to the purposes for which it was destined,—from making the freest use of money imprested to him, in the mean time, and when it is not wanted for the public, to every purpose not criminal, to every purpose of profit, emolument or advantage, that can be stated, not only without incurring any criminality or punishment whatever; but likewise without, in the smallest degree deviating from the pure and honourable discharge of the duty of his office, and the trust reposed in him.

My lords, I am aware that upon this subject, I am taking up the gauntlet thrown down by the honourable manager, who, with so much ability opened these articles. I am aware that he has distinctly and ably argued that antecedent to the resolutions of 1782, antecedent to any statute upon the subject, by the common law, a public officer of this description could not apply money imprested to him, even for a time, or when not wanted by the public, to his own use; that the resolutions of the House of Commons, of June, 1782, only recognised the law as it antecedently stood: and the honourable and learned manager who has summed up the case, although he has not in terms pointedly repeated the same doctrine, yet the course of his argument throughout assumes it, and particularly that part of it which relates to the declaration made by the defendant in the House of Commons. In that animated and impressive address which the honourable and learned manager, with so much eloquence, pressed upon your lordships in enforcing the criminality of that declaration, he stated it to have been made by a public accountant, that (as the honourable and learned manager said) in the sanctuary of liberty, the defendant had daringly and openly avowed the right to conceal what use he had made of the public money, that such declaration was alarming to the constitution, claiming, on the part of a public officer entrusted with the public money, a right to make those uses of it which might be destructive to the liberties of his country, and this he had dared to utter in the sanctuary of liberty.—My lords, all these arguments would equally have applied to the case of any one who had made a similar declaration in the sanctuary of liberty, at any period as well prior as subsequent to the passing of the statute; upon the same general principles it was equally at all times fitting that the public money should be reserved for the use to which it was ultimately destined, without a right of temporary and intermediate use. If it be dangerous to the constitution to allow any individual to possess an unlimited right of applying public money imprested to him, to all purposes public or private, it was undoubtedly at all times dangerous. The same course of duty was uniformly prescribed at all times, to the paymaster of the army, the treasurer of the navy, and all public officers and accountants to whom money was imprested for ulterior purposes, and the same danger and guilt must attach whenever the public money whilst in their hands, is made use of by them for any purpose of temporary profit, before it is wanted for the public service. The arguments of the honourable and learned manager, would equally apply to prohibit and condemn such conduct universally, antecedent to any positive statute upon the subject.

My lords, it is necessary therefore to consider how far these arguments are well founded; and notwithstanding the length of time that this doctrine has been suffered to pass current with the public, I do not shrink from the consideration of it; and with your lordships' permission, I trust I may be allowed to say, in this great assembly, and well knowing before whom I speak, that upon this subject there is not, there never was one particle of doubt respecting the law; that the whole argument, on the part of the prosecution, is founded on mistake—that what has been contended for by the managers, is not the law; that it never was before declared to be the law, and that the direct contrary has been stated to be the law, not only universally stated in every book, in which any thing is to be found upon the subject, but likewise openly, publicly stated in that very sanctuary of liberty, stated repeatedly by one who may be considered the highest living authority in that great assembly, in the most distinct and positive terms that language can convey, and under circumstances that indicated the most decided and deliberate conviction.

My lords, as we are now travelling back, and led by these arguments into an historical review of what passed in the year 1782, when subjects of this nature were brought under the consideration of parliament; as your lordships are called upon by these articles in a most novel and extraordinary manner, to infer breaches of law, not from acts of parliament, not from the common law, but picked up from the reports of commissioners, from the resolutions of one house of parliament, which with all the deference that belongs to them, do not and cannot constitute the law of the land:—My lords, when this is the case, I trust it may be allowed me to accompany these inquiries with a contemporary history of what is stated to have been the proceedings of parliament, at the period referred to in the preamble to the articles of impeachment, and upon the subject on which your lordships are called upon to pronounce your judgment.

My lords, the preamble to the articles, and the honourable manager who opened them, stated that subsequent to the conclusion of the American war, the public accounts of the kingdom invited public attention; that the great expenditure of public money had created an attention to public economy; that the subject was referred to commissioners of public accounts. The resolutions of the House of Commons, and the acts which subsequently passed are presented to your lordships' consideration; but a most extraordinary and singular account of these proceedings is given in the preamble to these articles. Your lordships will find detached and particular periods fixed upon, and parts of the proceedings only extracted, whereas if the whole subject which was brought before parliament at different periods is fairly looked at, it will be found to afford a conclusion directly opposite to that which from the very same sources your lordships are desired now to draw.

My lords, it appears by the journals of the House, that upon the 11th of June, 1781, the then minister submitted to the House of Commons, what should be done consequent upon the reports of the commissioners of accounts. My lords, upon a subject of this nature I hope that, without any irregularity, I may be permitted to refer to those contemporary historians of the proceedings in parliament who have recorded the discussion of that day, as being authorities sufficiently correct for this purpose. My lords, upon that occasion, the subject had created a considerable degree of ferment. It appears upon the report of the commissioners, which the honourable managers have given in evidence, and which stands upon your lordships' minutes, that very large balances were then in the hands of public accountants who had long gone out of office. It is not necessary to state all the particulars—I observe that at one time, one noble family had had from the year 1719 and 1720, a very large sum of more than 300,000*l.* of which no account had been given; that another noble lord whose representative was then in the House of Commons, who went out of office in 1765, had carried with him a balance of about 300,000*l.* and had ever since been in possession of it. It appeared, I think, that the total of the simple interest made of that balance by that noble lord, had been between two and three hundred thousand pounds. Upon that occasion the executor of that noble family,* who was then a member of the House of Commons, in his own manly and energetic way, upon the very point we are now considering, ventured to make a public declaration in this “Sanctuary of Liberty.” Did he say that he was bound to declare what was done with the public money? Did he say that as a public accountant, he was bound to come forward with the large sum of which the balance consisted, the sum at that time reported by the commissioners being 450,000*l.* in the hands of the family whose executor he was? My lords, in the parliamentary history of those times, this right honourable gentleman is related to have declared in the manly and decisive language, for which he is so distinguished, which he has never since disavowed, and which, not upon this occasion only, but in subsequent debates was repeated, “Lord Holland, he was willing to confess, and indeed it was useless to deny it, made advantage of the public money, while it remained in his hands. And here he was ready to throw down his gauntlet, and to argue it against whoever maintained a contrary opinion, that if a public accountant held himself able at all times, without possibility of check, or prevention, to produce the whole of the public money in his hands, whenever he was called upon so to do; it was in that case, a matter of perfect indifference to the public, whether he used it for his own advantage or not.”†

Now, my lords, had the honourable and learned manager, the ornament of his profession, who exhibited such proofs of his eloquence upon this subject, been a member of the House of Commons at that time, I presume he would instantly have started up, and, in his own indignant language, have arraigned the declaration of his right honourable fellow manager. “How dare you, a public accountant, in this sanctuary of liberty, to advance so alarming a doctrine? You have thrown down your gauntlet in bold defiance, and insist upon it, whoever shall maintain the contrary, that you have an unlimited right of the use of the public money, to every purpose whatever, and this not in respect of a sum of ten thousand, but in respect to a balance of between three and four hundred thousand pounds and indeed a balance to any extent.”

My lords, did this declaration provoke any one in that great assembly to take up the gauntlet, and dispute the doctrine thus advanced? It did not pass unnoticed; in the same account of the proceedings, the minister of the day,* one of no mean talent, nor of light experience, then at the head of the board of revenue, and having recently this subject under his consideration, is stated to have adverted to this declaration of his political opponent, not for the purpose of controverting but of confirming his opinion, “With regard” (he says) “to the position laid down by the honourable gentleman who spoke last, that if a public accountant, was at all times ready to produce and pay in the full amount of the public money in his hands, it was a matter of indifference to the public, what use he put it to, if it was ready when it was called for—he was ready to admit it.† Thus, my lords, did two of the most distinguished members of the House of Commons, who at that time never agreed upon any other subject, upon this, unitedly concur in admitting the law on this subject to be the direct opposite of what it was stated to be by the honourable manager; and upon the ground of which he requires your lordships to support this article of impeachment. My lords, we have heard a great deal said of the opposite conduct of one great personage, the head of a noble family, whose illustrious descendant‡ has lately been taken from us—the great earl of Chatham, who (when paymaster of the army) made no use of the money imprested to him, but deposited it in the Bank; I observe in the debates alluded to, the same distinguished person§ to whom I have referred, gives his opinion upon this subject: “The late earl of Chatham, he says, it was well known, and for which he neither blamed him nor was ready to say he greatly admired him—did not make a shilling advantage of all the public money that lay in his hands; the whole was placed either in the Bank of England, or at a private banker’s.”|| So did that great statesman think even with respect to this conduct so highly extolled as a model; though he did not blame, yet he did not greatly admire it; nor indeed was it a subject of particular admiration, because, however magnanimous it may be, yet unquestionably if the use of the * Charles James Fox, one of the managers for the Commons, and his majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, at the time of this trial.

† 22 New Parl. Hist. 427.

* Lord North.

† 22 New Parl. Hist. 433.

‡ William Pitt.

§ Charles James Fox.

|| 22 New Parl. Hist. 427.

public money constitutes the fair emolument of office, it is just as laudable, it is just as proper for any public officer to make use of it as it is for any great magistrate or other person, having a lucrative office in his gift, to give it to one of his family, or dispose of it to his advantage in some other way, without making a present of it to the public, or abandoning the right that he and his predecessors have constantly enjoyed.

This same subject came under discussion in the following year, at the period when the resolutions quoted in the preamble of the 18th of June, 1782, were first proposed,—proposed not as the honourable manager stated, as declaratory of an antecedent law, but as expressive of what ought to be made law in future; they were brought in by the minister* of that day, during the latter part of lord Rockingham's life, and he at the time stated that the lateness of the session prevented the adoption of any parliamentary measure consequent upon the report of the commissioners, and therefore these resolutions were introduced for the purpose of pledging parliament to their adoption, by a subsequent act of parliament; the ministers then pledging themselves in case they continued in office, or if they did not, pledging their successors to resume the subject in the ensuing session. Your lordships remember a new series of events by lord Rockingham's death soon succeeded, and when parliament met again the new ministers had something else to attend to, and in fact, these resolutions never were after that time resumed, or acted upon by parliament and yet are these resolutions now selected and introduced into this preamble to the articles of impeachment, and your lordships are desired to consider them as constituting the written law of the land, and the violation of any one of them as a public offence.

My lords, upon the occasion of these resolutions being brought under the consideration of parliament, the subject before stated was again resumed; and we find the same distinguished person, to whom I have already alluded, resuming the subject, not in a declaration made suddenly, or in his own defence, but after he had had twelve months to reconsider the subject, in the month of June, 1782, again repeats his former sentiments, "In the first place he contended as he had often done before, that when a balance of public money lay in the hands of a public accountant, all the public had a right to expect from him was, that whenever the money should be called for, it should be forth-coming, and what he did with it was nothing to the public, provided he had it always ready to answer the calls of the public."† There, my lords, was again an impeachable offence committed by this right honourable gentleman in the "Sanctuary of Liberty."

But, my lords, he was not singular in this opinion. It appears that the attorney-general of that day* proposed various resolutions to the consideration of parliament in a day or two after, viz. on the 25th of June, in the same year; the subject of the balances in the hands of public accountants, was again considered: the attorney-general, who was particularly alive to a subject of this nature, proposed, what? not that any of the accountants who had employed the public money to their own use should be indicted as offenders; all that he could bring himself to propose, was, first to examine into the state of the balances of those who were out of office, and in the next place, that such persons should be called upon to pay interest of the balances in their hands, from the time of their quitting office. The subject was considered by parliament, assuming that interest had been made, assuming that the free use and possession of the money was in the hands of those accountants, or laid out by them for their own benefit, and all that was proposed to be claimed was a civil right in the Crown to call for interest, under the above restriction. The voice of parliament was however so clearly against the proposition, and all sides of the House so decidedly adverse upon this abstract question of civil right, that the attorney-general, who brought in the resolution, was obliged to withdraw the resolution; and the right of the public to demand interest for the large balances then in the hands of the public accountants, even after going out of office, was abandoned and given up. In the course of the debate, it having been stated that the crown had by law a right to interest in these cases, a great and distinguished lawyer of that day, to whose opinion I am persuaded such of your lordships as are acquainted with the profession, will pay the highest respect, I mean Mr. Wallace, stated, in his place "he found no difficulty in declaring on the question of the right which the public might have to the interest arising from the public money in the hands of the great national accountants, for his own part, he felt no difficulty whatever in declaring that the public had no such right, and he believed that he should not be found singular in his opinion among the gentlemen of the long robe. It was a clear maxim in law, that whatever party received the profit, that same party ought to bear such losses as might befall that property; that if the public should take an interest on this balance, the public ought in justice to put up with whatever loss should happen from failure of security—but was this the case?—not at all—the public had nothing to do with the losses; the accountant was responsible for the whole of his balances; he had a right to any profit he might make of the money, but he must answer for any deficiency."* My lords, I forbear to state to your lordships, the other proceedings in which the same opinion as to the right appears to have prevailed on all sides, upon the discussion of the subject: no idea of imputing criminality to the use of the public money, no idea of danger resulting to the constitution, or public liberty, from leaving large sums in the hands of public accountants, and allowing them the free use of these balances, ever entered into the head of any individual in that "Sanctuary of Liberty;" on the contrary, a distinguished member† who had lately filled the office of treasurer of the navy, and whose balance I think then was 348,000*l.*, publicly declared in this place in the House of Commons, that, "If the balance had been ten times greater than it was, the ancient practice of the office, would justify him in making as much advantage of it as he could."‡

* Lord John Cavendish.

† Vide Mr. Fox's Speech in the House of Commons June 18, 1782, 23 New Parl Hist. 117.

* Kenyon.

Such, my lords, were the sentiments, which prevailed upon the subject at that time, and they were not confined solely to the offices before mentioned. I observe in the account of the proceedings upon a similar subject, in respect to another office, one that I believe to this day remains unaltered by any statute, or by any resolution: I mean the balances in the hands of the receivers general of the land tax, who receive money under circumstances very different from those attending the balances we are now discussing. A receiver general of the land tax, receives the public money before it has got into the Exchequer, and every hour of delay in its transit, while it rests with the receiver, is a direct loss to the public. Yet even with respect to these officers, when it was proposed to make them responsible; and when, to enforce that which the annual land tax act directs, viz. that within twenty days they shall pay up their balances, the minister of the day proposed that the receivers general should be compelled to pay their balances, a right honourable person, then a member of the House of Commons, now a distinguished ornament of your lordships' house, rose up in his place, and had no scruple to argue directly against the proposition, stating the hardship of it, the injustice to compel an accountant to pay in his balance, and particularly that in the county with which he was connected, by arithmetical calculations he showed that if the proposed measure should pass, the place of a collector of the land tax would not be worth 15*l.* a year, and consequently no man of character would undertake the office; this was in the proceedings of the 20th June, 1781. Now did it appear to that noble lord that there was any thing dangerous to the constitution, or contrary to the nature of their trust, to allow these accountants to have this public money in their hands, and to make use of it for their own benefit? on the contrary his lordship complains that unless they were allowed to continue in the enjoyment of such a privilege, no man of character would take the office: plainly intimating that it was not in his opinion inconsistent with the character of a man of honour, to hold the office and continue to use this privilege.

Another noble person observed on the same occasion, "that let the salary of the collector be what it would, still the employment would be lucrative, for most of the collectors were bankers and turned the money to private advantage while in their hands; and such as were not bankers, placed it in the hands of bankers, and got such a premium for so doing, as was greater than their salaries."

My lords, I beg I may not be misunderstood upon this subject, or supposed to be arguing against the validity or the operation of the warrant. I have expressly reserved that consideration, and only for a moment request your lordships to consider how this matter stood, independent of the warrant, and the act of 25 Geo. 3rd? that neither from the common law, nor from the nature of the official duty or trust, was any obligation restraining a public accountant to whom the public money was imprested, from making a temporary use of the money, before it was wanted for the public service; and when properly considered the point is too clear to want any authority upon the subject. For independent of any compact or statute it is clear that the nature of the duty of a treasurer of the Navy, or other similar officer, prescribes no such restriction. A treasurer or a paymaster, or any other person to whom money is imprested for a particular service, unless he is limited as to the time in which he is to pay it over (and then to delay it is an offence), but if he is not, what is the result? why that he becomes a public debtor to the amount of the money placed in his hands. A great deal of fallacy has arisen from supposing the deposit of money, to be the same as the deposit of a personal chattel; in respect of which latter there is always an obligation to restore in solido the identical article deposited. Whereas when money is deposited, no such obligation exists: the money is the depository's own, he is liable to be proceeded against as a public accountant, and bound by the nature of his engagement to be ready at all times to answer the current demands of public service, punctually, honourably, and faithfully whenever he shall be called upon; he is bound also to keep himself in a situation to be capable of doing that: but provided he does so, he fulfils all the engagement which he enters into by the nature of his office.

My lords, this is plain sense. This is distinctly stated, by the high parliamentary authorities I have quoted, to be the nature and extent of the obligation imposed: it is of some consequence that this should be distinctly understood. If it be a crime for a public officer to use balances in his hands for his own profit, independent of compact, independent of statute, at the common law a breach of duty and trust, and a violation of moral probity and honour, I can only say, the most honourable families, the most respectable persons in the kingdom have spent their lives in a constant violation of the law, in a constant transgression of duty. If there was any thing in the act contrary to moral duty, if any thing inconsistent with the principles of the constitution, the noble family to whom I have alluded,—hitherto uncontaminated with any such imputation, though exposed to much of unjust obloquy at that time, on account of the large balances in their hands,—as well as all the most distinguished and honourable persons, who have filled offices of this description at all times, have all incurred this heavy guilt. Your lordships have before you the examination of one member of a noble family, upon whose purity and unspotted honour, the breath of slander never cast the least suspicion: I mean the representative of the late Mr. Grenville, of whom it is recorded upon your lordships minutes, that on his examination before the commissioners of accounts in 1781, he desired two months time to pay into the Exchequer, the balance due from his late father as treasurer of the navy. Why require that time if the money was lying at the Bank unused? why could not he pay it in two hours? why because two months were necessary to call in the money, from the securities on which it had been laid out, for the benefit of the family. Would these noble persons have done any thing inconsistent with any principle of moral honesty, or the most conscientious regard to the nature of the duty and trust reposed in them?

* Vide 23 New Parl. Hist. 130.

† Mr. Welbore Ellis.

‡ 23 New Parl. Hist. 131.

It is certainly not immaterial to carry these principles into the consideration of the whole subject before us; because we are perpetually weighed down in the consideration of it, constantly referred, though not always avowedly, to a supposed antecedent law, duty and trust that created obligations different from what has been in all former times universally understood, in and out of parliament, to be the existing law; and what I humbly conceive must be acted upon as the law, if the question should arise in any other court of justice. If, for instance, an indictment were to be preferred against a receiver of the land tax, for making use of the public money for his advantage, it must be contended upon the principles advanced on the part of the prosecution, that such an indictment might be sustained, and a fortiori in that case, because keeping the money in his hands retards the progress of it into the public coffer; whereas in the present instance, it is a balance not wanted by the public, remaining necessarily dead, and the only question is whether it shall remain dead; locked up in a drawer, useless to every body or be made beneficial to the individual, before it is wanted for any other purpose.

My lords, if I have succeeded in showing what the law was in 1782, I submit with great deference, that, in respect to the use of public money, the law has since undergone no change whatever, further than as in the case of the treasurer of the navy, it may be affected by the warrant, which is a question I shall presently discuss. As to the statute of 25 Geo. 3rd. it might be enough to state with respect to the declaration in question, that it relates to a balance incurred prior to the statute, and to which nothing in the statute applies. But, my lords, I might go a step further, and say, that even the 25th of the king so much relied upon, upon the subject of the use of public money, is wholly silent, and imposes no negative upon the right of the treasurer to make that use. If the true construction of that statute were, what the managers have contended it is, no such provision could have been introduced therein; they contend that the true import of the act, is, to impose a larger negative in respect to the public money, by preventing the transfer of it to any other place than the Bank of England, and the pocket of the public creditor; and excluding the treasurer from ever possessing any part of it. This may be said to comprehend a prohibition on the use, and in that way I do not deny that it does, if such were the true construction and effect of the act, which however I shall hereafter show it is not; but all that I mean at present to state, is, that there is no definite, no distinct and positive prohibition upon the treasurer's use of the public money, as a statutable regulation prescribed by that act: that it does not purport to take up the resolutions of 1782, or to adopt the provision therein contained on this subject which in distinct and positive terms, had proposed to negative the right to any such use directly or indirectly. The statute has upon this subject left the law precisely as it stood before, save and except as it may be included in the regulations with respect to the transfer and deposit of the public money, which I shall have occasion to consider hereafter.

But, my lords, the declaration charged as a criminal act in the first article, respects a balance of 10,000*l.*, which was a balance of an ex-treasurer's account, arising prior to the act of parliament.

It appears, my lords, in evidence, that it was a balance which at that period of time, was not wanted for the public service; nay, my lords, it further appears that not one farthing of this balance ever was called for, or wanted down to the time when the whole of it was paid into the Exchequer; it therefore was not only money that was not wanted, but money that could not have been made use of by the public. It is in proof before your lordships by the officer of the Exchequer, who was examined on this point, that the treasurer was to hold this money, together with whatever other balance he had as an ex-treasurer, being liable to be called upon from time to time to pay demands of assigned bills, seamen's wages, and various other contingent demands; the period when such demands should be made, being altogether uncertain, and he being bound to the full extent to keep this balance in his hands for the purpose of satisfying them. That by the constant usage of the office, that balance was never paid over into the hands of the public until the accounts were passed.—The usage of the office was so, as I have shown your lordships, to a very large amount. From the year 1765, down to the year 1781, the large balances I have stated, were in the hands of one noble family, and it was expressly contended by their representative in the House of Commons, that not one shilling should or ought to be paid till the accounts of lord Holland were passed: that they had a right to have their quietus before the balance was parted with. Instances have occurred in which parliament has interposed, to call for the earlier payment of balances which had been long in the hands of treasurers and paymasters out of office, when perfectly satisfied that from the length of time, there was no chance of any further demands upon them: but whenever that was not the case, the accountant in general was left to pass his accounts in the ordinary course, and when he had passed his accounts, and not before, to transfer whatever balance remained in his hands.

My lords, the declaration in question respects a balance of 10,000*l.*, that stood in that predicament. The ex-treasurer was in respect of this balance, under no obligation legal, moral, conventional, or otherwise as to the place of deposit: he might have placed the 10,000*l.* in any drawer of his house; he might have left it with any friend; he might have deposited it in any private bank, or wherever he thought fit; his only obligation was that which arose from the warrant by which an annuity was granted to him by the king in lieu of all emoluments enjoyed by his predecessors, from whence it may fairly be argued, that he was by the nature of his agreement with government, impliedly precluded from the emolument derived from making profit of money in his hands. I have already admitted that he was under such obligation; but with great submission to your lordships, I deny that the breach of such a compact, had it been committed (which I also deny) could have amounted to a public crime or offence. When there has been the grant of an annuity, upon a condition implied or expressed; the violation of that condition unquestionably will subject the party to civil consequences. In all cases of grants from the crown, if a patent for instance, or any other thing is granted upon condition, the violation of that condition undoubtedly subjects the party to the forfeiture of his civil right; it exposes him to civil process, a scire facias may issue to repeal his patent, and he becomes liable for all the consequences of a violation of his contract with government; unquestionably in the case of grants, from one subject to another, the breach of a condition creates no crime; neither does it, in case of a breach of a condition annexed to a common grant of the crown. I do not say there may not be some difference in the case of a warrant augmenting the salary of office: it must however be remembered, that the duties of the office were not thereby altered, though the pay was increased; the duties therefore remain to be collected from the patent, and the nature of the office. But what I wish to establish at present is, that the creation of such an obligation does not necessarily constitute the law: that it cannot be pronounced afterwards to be the common law of the land, nor be the foundation of a criminal charge. It is further to be observed, that, at all events, whatever be the nature of the obligation, it can only be coextensive with the instrument creating it; that it ceases when the treasurer goes out of office, and can have no effect, or operation upon him, for all that he does whilst an ex-treasurer, or for any balance duly retained in that character. This was precisely the situation in which the noble defendant stood with respect to this balance.

Suppose, my lords, the noble defendant had not been appointed a second time treasurer of the navy, his situation in respect to this balance of 10,000*l.* would have been the same as it was then; he was not an officer quoad hoc at the time he made the declaration in the House of Commons; he was an accountant liable at all times to account whenever the public chose to call for this money, and he would pass his accounts and get his quietus in that case. If he had refused to account for the money in his hands when so called upon, he would have then incurred a violation of his duty; but this was not the case, he was ready at all times to account: he has done so; he has paid up every shilling of his balance, and passed his accounts. But he is called upon collaterally to answer for a crime in the House of Commons, not called upon in the Exchequer to pass his account as an accountant, he is called upon to answer to a criminal charge of his having made an illegal use of the money. Then, my lords, is not it a fallacy to apply to such a case all the law and all the duties belonging to public accountants rendering their accounts? Is it not a totally different case, when an individual out of office is called upon to answer for misconduct imputed to him whilst he was in office? In what respect does such an one differ from any other individual in the kingdom, who is called upon to answer in any place for any crime imputed to him?

My lords, was such a charge as this ever heard of in a court of British justice? was this new created offence ever heard of in this country, that it is a crime for one under accusation in his voluntary defence not to have told enough respecting the matters in charge? that as to parts of the accusation he chooses to be silent. Is silence a crime, my lords? That is the nature of the offence here imputed to the noble defendant. What! is it my lords, the place that makes the criminality? Is it because he has presumed to exercise this discretion in his defence in the House of Commons? is it because it was in that 'Sanctuary of Liberty,' peculiarly distinguished by that noble liberty, which is so zealously claimed and so amply enjoyed therein, I mean the freedom of speech, is it in this sanctuary alone that to use that freedom is a crime? What! my lords, is it meant, that when a defendant is brought into the House of Commons to make his voluntary defence, he makes it at such a peril? Is it a snare laid for him? do they mean to catch his words and impeach him for every indiscreet expression? My lords, what is the course observed towards the accused in the humane administration of justice throughout the kingdom? What is the conduct of every private magistrate before whom any individual is brought, charged with crimes of the deepest and highest malignity? does he push interrogatory after interrogatory? Does he seek to extort a confession from him or endeavour to draw him into declarations that may embarrass him in his future defence? No, my lords, directly otherwise is the conduct of every humane magistrate upon the subject. You are at liberty to say what you please, and it is perhaps better for you to say nothing; reserve your defence for the time of trial; but if you choose to say any thing, say what you please, and what you choose voluntarily to say shall be taken down. But did it ever enter into the head of any man since the administration of justice in this country was established: did it ever before happen to a British subject to hear that the silence of the accused, or an avowal not to disclose either the whole or part of what was imputed to him, could be converted into a substantive crime, or an offence at the common law? Was it ever before doubted that the accused had the right, in every place, and before every assembly in this country, to exercise a full and free discretion upon what he shall acknowledge, or what he shall not acknowledge? He has an undoubted right not to speak at all; when he does speak he may at his option utter only part of his defence, or defend himself at large. What can be said for pushing this into a high crime and misdemeanor? The defendant has been guilty of—what?—an indiscretion, a piece of rashness?—impeached for rashness, impeached for indiscretion! It is a high crime and misdemeanor to have made an indiscreet admission, or rather not to have made enough of indiscreet admission; that he did not tell enough against himself, or for himself, is the whole of his crime. My lords, I insist that what or how much he should say in answer to the imputation was perfectly voluntary that he had the same free right of defence before the House of Commons as any British subject when accused has in any other place, to open his mouth or shut it, to open or half open it, to utter sentences or half sentences; and that what he says, or omits to say, can never be converted into a crime or misdemeanor.

But, my lords, what is this high crime? how does this declaration become criminal? he has refused to disclose the application of this money. Why?—for any considerations that respect himself? to protect, to guard himself against all the peril that awaited him? No, my lords; that which never was a crime by the law of England before becomes so—Why?—because of the assigned motive for this declaration. What is the motive? my lords, it was a motive which one would have supposed would have spoken strongly to the generous feelings of every British breast, a scrupulous regard to an obligation of a high and imperious nature upon an honourable mind, such was the motive, which, as it is expressly stated, is a high crime and a misdemeanor. The noble defendant is charged with having stated himself to be under obligations to be silent from a sense of public duty, private honour, and personal convenience. Does this then convert it into a crime? The defendant was perfectly free to place this sum of 10,000*l.* where he pleased, to use it as he pleased, provided it was not applied to any criminal purpose, or to his own emolument; and because he stated himself not to be at liberty to say more, than positively to negative all the imputed criminality, by a denial of having applied it to any corrupt purpose; (which was all the charge against him, and to which he did explicitly answer); because he would not go further than the matter of charge, being restrained from motives that are obligatory upon every honourable mind; it is for this he is impeached of a high crime and misdemeanor. Surely, my lords, if the silence of one accused as to the matter of accusation upon any subject is not in general criminal, it cannot be made criminal when it is observed under such circumstances and from such motives.

Inferences and suspicions are then attempted to be raised from this declaration. It is said, are we to give lord Melville credit that he applied this 10,000*l.* in the way he has stated? do you believe it? why conceal it if it is an honourable purpose? why do not you speak out? why do not you tell us what the use is? if you do not tell I will insinuate, I will suggest in argument this, that, and the other corrupt purpose; and I will cause it to be believed by your judges that it was used for a criminal purpose; that is, I will supply the defect of proof in a court of criminal justice, and will establish upon my suggestion, and your silence, that you are guilty to the extent imputed to you. Now, undoubtedly the noble defendant did feel that he was in a hard and perilous situation, both with respect to this and another sum of a similar amount that constitutes one of the posterior articles of charge; he was perfectly aware what obloquy and what suspicions would not fail to be raised against one, situated as he was from the declaration that he made, bound as he conceived himself to be by the sacred obligation of a great minister of state, bound as a public man in high trust at all hazards, and to the extent of any penal consequences that might await him, to carry with him to his grave secret services to which this money had been applied; he was firmly determined not to violate the obligations imposed upon him of public duty and of private honour. If he is to suffer for this, he scruples not to expose himself to all the consequences. Let suspicion be alive, let it follow him wherever imagination can suggest.

I should be glad to ask, what would have been the consequence with respect to those two sums, and with respect to another sum of 40,000*l.* which was taken from the public money under similar circumstances? Suppose lord Melville had been called upon at an earlier period to account for all these sums in the same place; and suppose it had happened unfortunately for the country that the great statesman, who is now no more, had been taken from his country one year prior to the date of his lamented death; and after his death the noble defendant had been called upon to make a disclosure with respect to the whole. My lords, perhaps here with his accusers he will have no credit; but, my lords, with those who know him I trust he will have credit for what would have been his conduct; that the prospect of all the penal consequences in the world to himself, would not have induced him to come forward, and betray his dear departed lamented friend by a disclosure of his having delivered over to him the 40,000*l.* for the public use in an irregular mode. My lords, he would have locked up the secret in his own breast, though he should have been punished to any extent; and he would have had the satisfaction of an honourable mind conscious of having acted right. Under circumstances that appeared to him to preclude the disclosure he would have carried the secret with him to his grave, and sustained in his own person all the suspicions and all the consequences that would have followed that concealment. My lords, lord Melville did so; he pertinaciously refused to answer upon the subject, till it was voluntarily disclosed by the individual who was to be affected by it. Lord Melville never did and never would have disclosed it. Now that by accidental circumstances the purpose to which this sum of 40,000*l.* was applied, has since been disclosed, every one has been perfectly satisfied that upon that, for a time unknown and concealed purpose, the honour and integrity of lord Melville has been fully vindicated. Had this not been disclosed, what would have been the suspicions respecting it? Would it not have been said, "Oh? the 40,000*l.* is gone to Scotland to buy up some parliamentary interest; it is applied to poison and corrupt the voters in some rotten borough in this country, or to accomplish some wicked purpose of your own. It is fine swaggering language to hold out high sounding motives for secrecy. We know to what corrupt, scandalous purposes, ruinous to the liberties of the country, the 40,000*l.* has been applied." Such, my lords, undoubtedly would have been in the case put, the insinuations against lord Melville; but the accidental investigation which has since taken place of this subject has done this all away, and has, to the full satisfaction of every honourable mind, rendered the conduct of all parties, concerned in the use of this sum, so completely free from every kind of imputation as to be made the subject of parliamentary sanction and approbation.

Still, my lords, it may be said that it does not follow, because accidents have brought forward this disclosure, and enabled the public to be satisfied with respect to this sum of money, that an inference is to be drawn in favour of lord Melville as to the two other sums, the purpose of which is not yet disclosed. Undoubtedly, my lords, such is their predicament, and therefore at present the managers are at liberty to exercise their imaginations, to entertain their suspicions, and to advance all their theories upon the unknown purpose to which these two other sums were applied.

To your lordships liberal minds I appeal whether the circumstances of the case do not fairly lead to different conclusions? whether it is not more likely that a public man placed in a situation of the highest eminence, deeply charged with the country's safety in the most perilous periods, with respect both to its foreign and domestic enemies, ardent and zealous for the public good, and eager to promote it by every means in his power—one who had never betrayed the least regard to money, or the advancement of his private fortune—that such a man, under such circumstances, should have employed the sums, as he has declared he did, in some public and honourable purpose, than in the promotion of his own pecuniary profit and emolument? Recollect, my lords, the period of time when the sums were taken; recollect what was the state of the country, what were the dangers that hung over all our heads; what were the nightly watches; what the affiliated societies by night and by day; what the necessity for great and liberal use to be made of every means and power government possessed to secure the public safety. Perhaps it may be owing,—I hope I may be excused for saying so—to the exertions of the noble defendant at the awful crisis alluded to, that this court has now the power of assembling to try him: his vigorous exertions at that and other periods, it is well known, contributed mainly to preserve the state; must there not at such periods have been many occasions for advances out of the public purse in various modes, that consistently with private honour, consistently with public duty, could not be disclosed? I might be at liberty surely for a defendant, as well as the accusers, to have recourse to suggestions. I might state various honourable—proper—purposes, to which the money might innocently and laudably be applied, which yet (after the application) could not (consistently with a regard to the private honour due to the individuals, who may have been in a situation to make it fitting on the part of the public to reward or to conciliate to the public interest) be disclosed; I say there may have been uses of that nature to which the money may have been not only innocently but meritoriously applied, with an obligation to secrecy still resting upon them.

But, my lords, perhaps it may be said to us, what are your conjectures, what are your suggestions? They pass for little. I know I speak not with the authority of those who speak against me; but, my lords, in a criminal court the suggestions on one side are as good as the suggestions on the other. Your lordships perhaps will attend to neither, but will attend to proof. Try it then by that test. Now, my lords, the result of the evidence is only this, that lord Melville applied his money to an unknown purpose, that purpose not being proved to be criminal, and being positively proved to have been one from which no benefit accrued to himself. Is that the crime meant to be charged? My lords, it may be said the application to any other than a naval purpose is charged. Is it then meant to be contended that under these terms of the article the charge is meant to be comprehended? My lords, if this be contended to be criminal it must be so, not upon the footing of the warrant, but upon the general principles in respect to the duty of a treasurer, and the effect of the appropriation acts, which would have at all times equally applied to every person holding the office of treasurer; as well before the year 1782, as after. The treasurer, at all periods, was under the same obligation, to keep the money imprested to him, destined for its proper purposes. Do you mean to state then that it was a violation of those acts, and a breach of that duty, to apply the public money, though for a time only, and before it was wanted for the public, to any other than a naval purpose? If so, then every treasurer who at any time laid out the public money to his own use was guilty of this crime. Then all the doctrine laid down in parliament by the high authorities I have stated was erroneous, and it was universally the duty of the treasurer,—and on the same principles, the paymaster of the army,—never to make use of the public money, though for a temporary purpose only. But, my lords, I conceive this proceeds entirely upon a mistaken application of the appropriation acts, which have nothing to do with the case; they are restrictive upon the Exchequer, restrictive upon the minister, and, to a certain degree, restrictive upon the treasurer, to appropriate finally and definitely money destined for any public service to that public service only. It was not competent for the treasurer at any time to apply money imprested to him to any other purpose that would interfere with the naval purpose; it was not competent for him at any time to transfer it without competent authority definitely and permanently to any other use. And there, with great submission, is the fallacy of the arguments; but to apply the money to a temporary use during the period when it is not wanted for that purpose to which it is ultimately destined, while it is in the custody of the treasurer, and may be locked up in his drawer—he being always ready to supply the public service from other money of his own if wanted,—such an application I submit never was considered, nor can properly be considered as constituting any violation of the appropriation acts, or any offence whatever. Besides which, the application to other than naval services is not made a substantive charge, but is added copulatively to the charge of corruption; the only charge therefore that need be considered in this first article, in respect to this sum of 10,000*l.*, is the applying it to a corrupt and illegal purpose. Now, my lords, I beg to ask, what evidence is there that lord Melville did so apply it? None whatever, not a tittle of evidence upon the subject; the only evidence adduced with respect to it is the testimony of Mr. Trotter, and of the honourable manager, respecting acknowledgments made by the noble defendant.

With respect to the evidence of Mr. Trotter, he has proved nothing, but that lord Melville acknowledged to him, that he had this balance in his hands, for which he was accountable. Did he acknowledge (the question was put to him upon the cross-examination) that he had applied it to any private purpose of his own, any purpose from which he was to derive emolument? Never at all. Did you not understand it to be a public purpose, from whence there was probably loss to him, and no gain upon that subject? his recollection is not very clear, but he thinks it was so;—but he is quite clear that lord Melville never did acknowledge to him, that he applied it to any private purpose; this witness therefore does not prove the corrupt or illegal application. The other witness called to this point, is the honourable manager who conducts this accusation against the noble defendant, and who offered himself as a witness, to prove the acknowledgment made by him, on this subject, in the House of Commons; to prove that of which three or four hundred other persons, who must have heard the same declaration, might have given evidence. There is some awkwardness in this union of character; it has put us under some difficulty, and has rather hampered the situation of the honourable manager. We had from him a little playfulness of wit, I remember, on the supposed appearance of the defendant, in two characters, in his Treasury accounts. The right honourable Mr. Dundas, borrowing from, and lending to Henry Dundas: he himself will have a little difficulty by-and-by to avoid being exposed to a similar remark; when the honourable manager is to observe upon the testimony of Mr. Whitbread, and will have to explain all that he has said as a witness, there will be considerable difficulty to ascertain whether he is speaking as a manager or as a witness; and if he should add to the testimony he has given, whether we may not have a right to interrupt him with a cross-examination, on the new matter introduced.

There will certainly be a degree of embarrassment attending the honourable manager, when he comes to observe upon his own testimony, more especially as he stands unconfirmed by any one of the three or four hundred persons who were in the house with him, AND PARTICULARLY AS HE SHOULD SEEM TO STAND IN THE PREDICAMENT OF BEING THE ONLY PERSON THAT SHOULD NOT HAVE BEEN CALLED. He describes himself to have been at the time listening to the noble defendant, for the purpose of answering him; and his testimony, as your lordships may remember, is the result of the impressions produced upon his mind. Impressions produced upon what mind? Upon the mind of an accuser, upon the mind of a person watching to answer the defence at the time. Now, with great submission, if there were any other witnesses, who could have proved the same thing, and who had not quite the same impressions, it would have been rather more satisfactory to have heard their testimony; not that these were not very honourable impressions, resulting from a laudable zeal, of one who on the part of the public, was pursuing to punishment an individual whom he conceived to be highly criminal; impressions naturally operating upon the fairest mind in such a predicament. But when we are to have a witness speak to what another has said at a distant period, especially when what is so said is made the foundation of a criminal charge in an impeachment; I cannot but think it something extraordinary that we should only have one witness, and he standing in the situation that he himself has described on this occasion. We were told by the managers, that some written evidence was to be produced upon the subject; but no such was adduced, and it stands upon the sole testimony of the honourable manager himself. We have the evidence of a most honourable and respectable gentleman, who, I am sure, means to convey all that he recollects upon the subject. Yet he having unfortunately left the notes taken at the time, behind;—having either lost them, or not having referred to them, when he was to be the only witness to support this important charge, which the learned and honourable manager, in his summing up, pressed so strongly:—we have been prevented, on the cross examination, from obtaining that full explanation and testimony, respecting the whole of what was said by the defendant, that might have been procured from other witnesses, had they been called.

It does not seem to me, however, that the evidence of the honourable manager has proved the charge; on the contrary, his testimony has expressly negatived all that constitutes the charge, viz.—all corruption, I mean as far as rests on the acknowledgment of the noble defendant. He has proved an admission by the defendant of his having been accountable for the sum of 10,000*l.*; but it is expressly stated by the honourable manager, upon his cross-examination, that the noble defendant at the same time, in the same breath (and his declaration must be taken altogether) positively averred, that he never had derived any private benefit, or emolument whatever from the use of it.

Then, my lords, this charge, supposing it to depend, as I have shown it does, upon criminal corruption, is not only not supported by any testimony adduced on behalf of the prosecution, but is directly, clearly, and positively disproved by the two witnesses who have been called to give testimony respecting it.

My lords, I am sure I need not add, what at the same time would afford abundant satisfaction to your lordships, upon the subject on which I am now speaking, if any confirmatory testimony were wanting in support of this part of the case, how strongly the circumstances tend to remove every ground of suspicion. I think your lordships can have no doubt, that if these sums had in any way been applied to lord Melville's own profit or benefit some traces of such an application must have been discovered by the vigilance of his accusers. If then, after all the industry that has been employed, (and certainly greater industry, and better opportunities for employing it, never were given to any prosecution whatever); if after the exertions made in ransacking every corner of the kingdom, in visiting every banker in England or Scotland, with whom lord Melville ever had a concern in his life; in getting at every letter received from, or written to him during the last 24 years by all his bankers and agents,—the correspondence with whom during all this period, is proved to be in the managers possession, or to have been submitted to their inspection;—if after having examined all the books in all the public offices, all the papers of the living and the dead; if after the extraordinary zeal of personally visiting the attics of a widow, and bringing away all the books and papers of her deceased husband;—rather an arduous and awkward task to be cast upon the honourable manager, who is a little hardly dealt with, in having to sustain a triple duty, and having this character added to that of a manager and a witness;—if the final result of all this, is, that the accusers have not been able to discover either as to this, or the other sum of 10,000*l.* any, the least ground of suspicion, of their having been one farthing of either carried to the private use of lord Melville; one farthing used to augment his fortune, laid out on private security, or appropriated to the purchase of any stock; though every engine has been set at work by the solicitor of the Bank, who is also solicitor for the prosecution, to ransack all the entries in the books of the Bank for half a century back, wherein, if any stock had been purchased during any part of that period, from any quarter, it must have appeared, for the managers are undoubtedly possessed of the knowledge of all the defendant's concerns; they have stripped him like an insolvent debtor, and examined into every farthing he is worth in the world; every expenditure he has ever made; every item in every account book; they have examined all, and sifted to the bran; and in the result, if the negative appears, of any, the least trace of either of these sums being appropriated to any private use whatever, would not this be sufficient to remove every remnant of suspicion, and satisfactorily to prove that neither of these sums had ever been mixed with lord Melville's private concerns, and that they must have been wholly applied to a public, and not a private purpose? and if so, my lords, there is an end of this charge.

My lords, with respect to the other appendant article, it is stated to be only an amplification of the first; and upon this we are considerably relieved by the declaration made by the honourable and learned manager, who summed up this case; that this additional article (the tenth) was not one that need excite any very considerable degree of alarm on the part of the defendant; he stated that in truth,—this was I think his expression,—it was introduced in fairness and candor to the defendant, to apprise him particularly of the enumeration of sums that were meant to be given in evidence, and which without that enumeration, might have been given in evidence, under the generality of the first charge; but that it arose only from that extreme desire of candor and fairness to the defendant, to apprise him of the particulars of what they meant to charge against him; on this account it was thought better to make these the subject of a specific article, in order that he might be the better prepared for his defence.

My lords, I am considerably relieved by this declaration, for I had before been in an error on the subject; and I hope your lordships will pardon me if I was in that error, because the direct contrary to what the honourable manager has stated, had been stated in, the report from the committee of managers, to the House of Commons; for after stating the importance of this article, they say, being strongly impressed with the importance of the facts, they think it a proper ground of a further article; and, my lords, I rather think that the honourable and learned manager is himself under some mistake upon this subject; and though I certainly feel very grateful for every act of candor and fairness on the part of the prosecution towards the defendant, yet he will excuse me, if I cannot feel any very great obligation, upon the subject of the mode in which this candor is shown towards the defendant, by introducing another article in charge against him; to have an additional article to answer, is fairness and candour which I do not want; it is very candid and fair, but I would dispense with such candour and fairness.

Again, I should have thought, that if the object had only been to enumerate the particulars of charge, the prosecutors might have directed to be sent to us a particular account of what they meant to give in charge against us, which would have answered the alleged purpose, without giving your lordships the trouble of receiving an additional article in a mode unprecedented, after the defendant had answered the first set of articles; however, this is only candour and fairness, all done to apprise us of the particulars meant to be given in charge.

Now, my lords, it so happens, that if it is to be considered as nothing but an enumeration of what was contained before, it is a little extraordinary that it does not tally with what is stated in the first article, as to the character and station held by the defendant at the time of taking the money. It so happens too, that this tenth article calls our attention to no particulars at all; it states that he “did on divers days, and times, between the 19th of August, 1782, and the 5th of January 1784, take,” &c. This is to apprise us particularly what day, and time, “I tell you it was on some day or days between 1782 and 1784.” The article further proceeds, “and between the 5th January, 1784, and the 1st of January, 1786.” Now we have got an enlargement of the period, so that in truth the charge is, that on some days and times, between 1782 and 1786, the defendant took divers large sums, amounting to 27,000*l.* or thereabouts;—a lumping charge with respect to dates and sums, is introduced by way of candour, for the purpose of setting forth particulars, that we may be distinctly apprized of what we have to answer. Undoubtedly we might have had a more specific enumeration. We are left at large to discover during a period of four years, when it was, and the taking of what sum or sums it was, that was meant to be proved in charge against us. We are by this article left more in doubt than we were by the former; the former had left it large, but confined to the sum of 10,000*l.*; this extends the sum, and extends the date; nay, my lords, besides this, it has made the subject ten times more confused than it was before, because your lordships will observe that that interval, commencing on the 19th of August, 1782, and ending January, 1784, comprises a period of eighteen months, one half of which lord Melville was an ex-treasurer. It appears upon the evidence that he went out of office in April, 1783, and did not again come into office till January following. There was a period therefore of nine months within this interval, during which he was an ex-treasurer; and it is stated in this charge which is supposed to be so specific, that he did take and receive from the money issued to him, either as treasurer, or as ex-treasurer, &c. Which is it? why, it is one or other, find out which it is; this is for particularity. This candid article informs us that it was money issued to the defendant, either while he was treasurer, or ex-treasurer, and will not tell which; that he did either at one period or at another, during this interval, convert the monies that were issued out to him, either in that predicament or in another. Now it certainly is material for your lordships distinctly to know, whether it was money issued to him whilst he was a treasurer, or an ex-treasurer, because, whatever argument can arise upon the effect of the warrant, applies only to the period whilst he was a treasurer in office. Suppose for the sake of argument, that, within the period stated, namely, posterior to the 10th of April, 1783, when he ceased to be treasurer, and prior to January, 1784, when he came into office again, he had made any private use of the public money for his own benefit, why it is quite clear that he was not then even under the temporary obligation, such as it was, of his warrant; the charge is upon the face of it defective. If an indictment were framed in the same terms, covering a period during one part of which what is charged to have been done was no offence, and during another part it was an offence; the indictment it is clear would be bad upon the face of it, from the equivocal generality, and the want of a sufficient specification, showing whether the act done was done under those circumstances under which any law applied to it, or not.

But, my lords, what is this elaborate history, this arithmetical evidence, after all the researches upon the subject, and all the industry that has been employed upon it? What does it all come to? Take the result of the four solid days employed in the production of old papers and books of account, official and private, which have all been collated, we are told with industry; and the honourable manager if any book had been lost, I dare say could have given evidence of its contents from memory; what is the final result? They have gone back twenty-four years into the defendant's history, and I desire to ask whether there ever was adduced in a court of justice, such evidence for the purpose of establishing the point in issue, in any case, civil or criminal.

My lords, much of the evidence that has been given in support of this charge, appears to me, with great submission to your lordships, to apply to a subject that is not properly comprehended within it. Your lordships will all recollect that you are still at a period in this article, as in the former, when the place of deposit was matter of option. It can never be necessary, therefore, to travel through all that mass of evidence which applies solely to the transit of the money from place to place, to and from any custody (supposing it distinctly proved) private or public, to and from, for instance, the banking house of Mure and Atkinson, a mercantile house (as the honourable manager stated it, and as it is proved) of great credit at that time. As little is it necessary to follow the laborious detail of evidence, to show the transit of the money, when in the hands of the treasurer or ex-treasurer, from one account to another account; that is, a transfer from the account which stood in his name at the Bank under one head, to an account in his name under another head. With great submission, if they had proved ten thousand instances of a similar nature they would not have advanced in support of this charge one iota. The fallacy of all the attempted application of this evidence, is the erroneous supposition that there existed an obligation at that time upon the treasurer, or the ex-treasurer, to keep the money at the Bank, and to keep it in a particular mode at the Bank, viz. under one head of service, without being transferred to another.

My lords, I shall therefore forbear to trouble your lordships with any examination of the whole evidence, which employed so many hours and days of your lordships valuable time, in travelling through the history of a treasurer's and an ex-treasurer's money, which at times was out of the Bank, and deposited with Mure and Atkinson, and then came back from them, or from any other private quarter, into the Bank. My answer, in general, is that the whole of the money imprested either to a treasurer, or ex-treasurer, might have been lawfully deposited with Mure and Atkinson, or with any other private individuals of note, or not of note, throughout the whole metropolis, with or without account, in any mode which the discretion, the prudence, the responsibility of the treasurer dictated. The transfer from one account to another account, which was spoken of by one of the witnesses, and which he truly said, cannot be done by a treasurer, or an ex-treasurer, without the authority of the board, is a transfer of another, and a perfectly distinct nature. It applies wholly to the account kept by a treasurer, or an ex-treasurer, not with the Bank, but with the public. He cannot, for instance, permanently in that account, transfer any part of the balance with which he is chargeable under one head of service to another head; he cannot hand any part of it over to the treasurer in office, or to any other ex-treasurer; or if he fills both characters himself, he cannot transfer it from his account with the public in one chaacter, to his account in another, so as to discharge himself of all responsibility in one character, and make himself responsible for it in another; that he cannot do without authority.

I must confess, my lords, I am struck with astonishment, considering the accuracy of the knowledge possessed by the honourable managers, that they should have so singularly confounded two subjects, which are of so perfectly distinct a nature; and should have represented the account, which the treasurer or ex-treasurer kept at the Bank at that time, as a public account. He kept his cash at the Bank, if he thought fit, just as any private individual might, under whatever head he pleased; and he might at any time at his option transfer it in his own account with himself, from one character or head of service to another, but he did not thereby in the least affect or alter the separate and distinct responsibility and charge, in which he stood with the public under either head or character. He might just as well have been impeached for taking his money from one drawer and putting it into another, or from one bureau into another, or from an iron chest into a wooden chest; all this was done from time to time, just as suited the convenience, I will not say of himself,—your lordships will not suppose he was managing the detail of this business,—but of his paymaster, to whom it was wholly left; and it was perfectly legal and competent for him to act in these respects as convenience directed.

My lords, I will not trouble your lordships with particularizing the sums; if I have made myself intelligible upon this part of the case, my argument will be found to dispose of the whole of the evidence which applies to 27,000*l.*, except two distinct sums of 1,000*l.* each of Bank notes, which are endeavoured to be traced from the Exchequer to the bankers of the defendant; as to all the remainder, the evidence is nothing but an history of the travels of the money to and from different places under different circumstances, and, whether it was prudent or imprudent to deposit it at one place or at another; it is quite enough to state that there is not a tittle of evidence before your lordships to prove, and the fact unquestionably is otherwise, that any profit or any emolument of any kind whatever was ever derived to lord Melville from the transfer from place to place; and it is corruption, emolument, profit, that alone constitutes the imputed guilt, not the transfer from one place to another. You have proved only the change of place of deposit—you have proved no profit or emolument derived from it whatever, and in the absence of all proof your lordships cannot supply it. The whole imputation of corruption therefore in these two articles, my lords, and all the business relating to it during this ancient period, commencing with the year 1782, and ending with 1786, is at length reduced to these two sums of 1,000*l.* each.

Now, my lords, I will suppose for a moment that I am not able to give your lordships any answer, or any explanation upon the subject of these two sums—I desire to ask, if I may presume so to do,—Is there any one of your lordships, who would convict lord Melville, of this foul crime of corruption, upon the ground of the evidence as it stands respecting these two items, and pronounce that he had been a corrupt man, making use of the public money, knowingly, intentionally, to his own private use and emolument? why? because he is not able to explain or account for these two sums, after a lapse of four and twenty years, occupied too as that interval has been by one never from the hour of his birth attentive to his accounts, never preserving his documents or vouchers (as it is in proof before your lordships he never did, at any period, not that he withheld or destroyed them for a criminal purpose at a particular time, as I shall hereafter show, in answer to insinuations and suspicions, which have been most unfortunately, I had almost said most unfairly pressed against him) never in the habit of attending correctly to these subjects, never having any relish or taste for them; whose whole heart and mind was in the public service, occupying his vigorous and energetic mind,—at periods also when a man of less vigour and public spirit, could not but have been roused and called from his desk, when if he had been ever of a disposition low, mean, and base enough, to pry into these petty concerns, the danger of the state and the great interests committed to his care, could not but have preferably engaged his whole time and attention;—would any one of your lordships doom the noble defendant to ignominy for ever, because he is not able under such circumstances to trace a sum of 2,000*l.*, paid into the hands of his banker, after a lapse of twenty-four years, and after the death of the person who managed the business for him?

My lords, what is the sort of evidence adduced upon this subject?—documentary evidence, extracts from entries in old books of accounts—how correct your lordships accidentally discovered in some striking instances of gross errors—how far to be depended upon in a criminal case when the witnesses are interrogated with respect to any entry in their books—“have you any recollection upon the subject? can you now give us an explanatory account of any one of these items, so that we may be enabled to know what the transaction was, how there happened to be a mixture of public and private money, how it happened that Mr. Douglas, when money was issued out of the Exchequer, carried it to the two private bankers of lord Melville, with his own hands, or those of any messenger sent by him? Can any one of you give us any account of this business?”—no, they uniformly answer, we have not the least recollection upon the subject; the remote period of time prevents the possibility of our having any memory or recollection respecting it. We know only that the entry is in our hand-writing; and that entry is received as evidence of the fact.

Now, my lords, what is the result and what do the managers desire of your lordships? Why, that in your lordships minds every presumption should be made against the defendant, unless he can explain what all the witnesses say, it is impossible for any man now living to explain, when the only man who could give any explanation, viz. Mr. Douglas, is dead; who is proved on the part of the prosecution, to have been the sole manager of all these pecuniary matters; who was the agent, and by the course of office necessarily had the management committed to him, of all the details; to whom, as the paymaster, all the different sums from the Exchequer de facto were issued. In the absence of this testimony, what is the course taken by the prosecutor? Why, he proceeds to supply the defects in the proof by conjecture against the defendant; and without one single witness proving any one act done by the noble defendant, showing his mind to have gone along with the subject, your lordships are to presume that he knew of, and was watching his account at the Bank; that he was apprised of having overdrawn his account, and that he therefore derived knowingly a quantum of benefit by the payment of the two sums in question, into Drummonds and Moffatts' banks, which if they had not been paid, he would have had a few pounds of interest to pay, to the extent in which his banker's account was overdrawn. Your lordships are to presume the noble defendant was watching all this, and was intentionally using the public money in aid of his own private funds, for the purpose of saving himself a pitiful sum of interest for a small interval, during which his account would have been otherwise overdrawn, though it is proved that prior to that period of time, no interest had ever been charged him by that banker, and though it appears that the first suggestion coming from that banker to lord Melville, of his account being overdrawn, was in the month of June 1785, long after the payment of this money into that bank.—Your lordships will observe too, what alone is sufficient to satisfy every fair mind, that no such use as is charged, was made by lord Melville of the public money; a piece of evidence that came out by mere accident from a book which was given in evidence by the managers; the notice from Messieurs Drummonds' house, to lord Melville of his account being overdrawn, was in June, 1785, to the amount of 2,900*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*: there appear in the very same book two entries, immediately following the entry read by the prosecutors, and which I am sure from inadvertence only were overlooked, and not read by them: the book, your lordships may remember, had been carried away, but these entries being discovered, it was at our instance brought back, and the entries read. From one of them it appears, that in October of the same year (1785) 2,000*l.* was paid by lord Melville, to Messieurs Drummonds, by remittances from Scotland, and in December of the same year, 3,600*l.* to ditto by ditto, that is, by remittances from Scotland, making together 5,600*l.* Now, I desire to ask your lordships, whether this is the conduct of a man who was in the habit of resorting to the public money, practising upon his banking account, and relieving himself by payments from the public funds. It appears, that upon the first notice he receives of his private account being overdrawn, he takes measures for supplying it within as short a period as the time and circumstances would reasonably admit, viz. in the short interval between June and October; and how does he do this? Does he put his hand into the public purse and help himself out of the balances remaining there? It is in evidence before your lordships, that there were at that time balances kept at the Bank by lord Melville, uncalled for by the public, to the amount of 56,000*l.*; and that in 1791, there was 21,000*l.* left, so that from 1785 to 1791, there had been more than the latter sum lying at the Bank unwanted for the public service, exclusive and independent of the 10,000*l.* of which I have before spoken.

VOL. XXIX.

Now, my lords, I desire to ask, if this were a question, in a civil suit, and a recent case, would not this afford a most decisive proof of innocence? If the defendant had been in the habit of relinquishing duty for the sake of pecuniary interest, and of pursuing one object at the expense of the other, is it to be believed that he would not have acted throughout upon the same lucrative principle? Would he have been picking up shillings? Would he have sold his dearest honour and fame for comparatively nothing; his high rank, his elevated station, his estimation with the world, the darling object of his life; would he have given up all for the sake of a miserable saving of a few shillings of interest on a banker's account? But if that had been his object, why, in God's name, does he pay 56,000*l.* into the Bank, when he goes out of office? He was under no obligation to part with this balance, or deposit it in any particular place; it was matter of perfect option to pay one farthing into the Bank. Why did he not keep it all in his own custody, doling it out as occasion called for it, and in the interim making use of it for his private benefit?

Can it then be doubted, my lords, that the voluntary payment of the large sum of 56,000*l.* into the Bank, there to lie dead till wanted for the public, negatives all idea of a corrupt intention in the noble defendant, to make use of the public money for himself, or to aid his own private account, by the application of that which did not belong to him?

But, my lords, again, after he had paid this 56,000*l.* into the Bank, and it stood there at his disposal, and after he was called upon, at the peril of being liable to interest, by this dunning letter, unless he made good the balance there was against him, at Messieurs Drummonds'; why does not this put it into his head, to make it instantly good by a transfer of the amount of the balance, or more, from the money at the Bank, which he was as free to keep at Drummonds' as at the Bank? Now, is it not the most clear and decisive proof, that that was not his practice, when we find him, the instant he is apprised of the state of his account at Drummonds', going to Scotland, and remitting to Drummonds' from thence, out of his own private money, to the amount of 5,600*l.*, which he must have done at a loss to himself; for it is not to be supposed, in whatever way the money was raised, but that it must have been taken from a fund that either brought him interest, or for which he would have to pay it.

My lords, I will not follow the subject through every minute observation. With respect to the identity of the two Bank notes, which has been made out with so much ostentation and parade of industry, as if we were trying a forgery upon the Bank; it proves nothing to the present purpose; for, supposing that Mr. Douglas, who appears to have, at that time, received lord Melville's salary, and other monies due to his lordship as his private agent, and to have been paying sums from time to time into lord Melville's account, at Messieurs Drummonds', supposing that he having received at the Exchequer a Bank note of 1,000*l.*, pays that identical note into Messieurs Drummonds' bank, on lord Melville's account, what then? If he had received an equal sum, or was to receive an equal sum in amount from lord Melville's own private funds, what criminality was there in that? Why might he not have paid sums into the Bank, for the private use of lord Melville, in the management of his concerns, unknown to lord Melville? or if lord Melville did know of the payment, and of the fund from which it came, yet if Mr. Douglas had in his hands, money of lord Melville's to an equal amount, what objection was there to such a payment? The identity of the notes only proves that such was the mode adopted by Mr. Douglas, in the arrangement of these concerns; but in the absence of all explanatory testimony from Mr. Douglas, how can any satisfactory judgment be formed on this subject? It appears undoubtedly, that Mr. Douglas did mix one account with another, it being proved that at a posterior date, 1,000*l.* of lord Melville's salary was received and paid by Mr. Douglas, into the public account; I submit therefore that the bare circumstance of identity, proves nothing upon the point we are now arguing, viz. that there was a criminal intent, on the part of the noble defendant, to make profit and to lay out to his own use and benefit any portion of public money.— And here I beg leave to observe, that I hope your lordships will all along advert to this, in the course of this inquiry, that the question is not precisely what the terms used by the hon. and learned manager, who concluded, might lead your lordships to suppose, viz. that if it be proved (I think the expression was) that lord Melville had made advantage of the public money to the amount of one shilling, the managers have substantiated the charge; I hope your lordships will not consider such to be the question between us, because if many shillings and many pounds of advantage were, without the knowledge of lord Melville, without his privity, without his direction, without his authority and consent, inadvertently or by the management of others, appropriated to his benefit, yet the charge would not be established; it is the wilful application of the public money to his own benefit that constitutes the guilt; and it is that, and that only, that must be unequivocally fastened upon the noble defendant, before your lordships can pronounce him guilty of this charge.

My lords, I beg leave also to object to the general principles of evidence applicable to this subject, which were stated by the honourable and learned manager. I do not mean at present to advert to the extraordinary doctrine, which I own was a little new to me in a criminal case, the doctrine of presumption. I dare say it is owing to my ignorance, and want of experience; but I own the principles I heard stated, with respect to the rules of evidence, governing a criminal case, were a little novel to me. That honourable and learned manager referred your lordships upon the subject of presumptions, to a case determined by my lord Eldon, and reported in Vesey's Reports; with respect to which, with great deference to him, it does not seem to me to afford much assistance in this particular case; the question in that case was entirely confined to what was the proper rule to be adopted in a court of equity, in adjusting the accounts between a principal and his agent; two persons standing in that relation one to the other; and I observe in that case the noble and learned lord, in the only doctrine that is of general application, lays down a principle that may be useful on the present occasion. He observes, "that as a general proposition, nothing can be stated more mischievous than that this Court should readily act, at the end of nineteen or twenty years, when no regular accounts have been kept, upon such conjectural, argumentative, and irregular grounds, and documents to supply the place of regular accounts, as in this case are made the foundation of this charge; and the Court must hold a very strict hand over cases of exception.*"—So, my lords, I say, in the present case, it would be most mischievous to act upon conjecture in the place of proof, at the distance not of nineteen or twenty years, but at the distance of twenty-four years, after all living testimony is gone, and after all opportunity of examining the subject is lost; nay, farther, my lords, after it has been proved to your lordships, that by the general course and rule of the service, all the details of these pecuniary matters, naturally and properly devolve upon, and are conducted by the paymaster, and not by the treasurer—after there has been a total failure of proof of any one act of corruption on the part of lord Melville, and when their negative of that imputation is fairly deducible, as far as can be discovered, by the same written documents which are adduced against him; under such circumstances I submit that it would be the wildest presumption in the world, if, upon such sort of testimony, it were possible for your lordships to pronounce that fatal judgment against the noble defendant, declaring that your lordships are satisfied he was a corrupt man, that his mind went along with these acts, and that these sums of 2,000*l.* were knowingly and wilfully applied to his own temporary profit for the sake of obtaining the mean, dirty, paltry benefit, to be derived from a saving of the trifling charge of interest, which might have accrued from an over-drawing of his banker's account.

* 8 Ves. Jur. 369.

My lords, to the charge contained in both these articles, of the continuance of a balance in his hands after the act of parliament, I do not know that it is necessary for me to advert at all; because I did not observe that the honourable and learned manager, or even (I think) the honourable manager who opened the business,—certainly not the honourable and learned manager who concluded it,—ventured to rely at all upon that, as constituting any crime whatever. In truth, it is clear it does not; because your lordships have only to look at the act of parliament to see, that it relates altogether, from one end of it to the other, to money issued posterior to the date of it; to money that is issued from the 1st of July, I think, 1785; and that it has not the smallest reference to, that it could not contain any direction whatever concerning, that it could not regulate in any respect whatever, any money that had been antecedently issued to the treasurer's own account under the former system.—In truth, my lords, a perfectly fresh account is directed to be opened, a new place of deposit is made by that act, and a new course of proceeding is adopted by it; but with respect to all antecedent sums they remain untouched; and both with respect to lord Melville, and any one of his predecessors, if any one stood in the same situation, as I believe some did, not having passed their account, no obligation was cast upon any one of them to bring their balances to the Bank; but their option of keeping the public money wherever they thought fit, rested entirely upon the same footing as it did before; as to all balances, therefore, existing prior to July, 1785, the case is precisely the same after the act of parliament as it was before:

I have now, my lords, closed what I proposed to offer to your lordships by way of answer and defence to those two articles. If exhausts all the first period during the time of Mr. Douglas's paymastership, and comprehends every item of charge contained in the first and tenth articles.

The next subject for your lordships' consideration relates to the second period, posterior to the act of parliament 25 Geo. 3rd. It begins with the second article, and your lordships will observe, by the frame of that second article the use of the money is not mentioned: It seems framed for the purpose of drawing from your lordships an adjudication upon an abstract principle of law, upon the construction of the act of the 25th of the king, which lord Melville is stated to have violated very soon after it had passed.

To augment the responsibility for the due observance of this act, the preamble to the articles introduces a history of this act, in a way not very usual in a criminal charge; and I believe it is a little novel to such of your lordships as are used to legal proceedings, to see stated in a criminal charge for the breach of an act of parliament, who brought the bill into the House of Commons, and who carried it up to the House of Lords, for the purpose of raising the charge of personal criminality in the violation of it. It is the first time I ever heard this topic so urged. In the second article it is charged, that lord Melville “did, after the passing of the said act (25 Geo. 3rd.) and whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville continued to hold and enjoy the said office, connive at and permit and suffer the said Alexander Trotter, under and by virtue of the said authority so given to him by the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, illegally to draw, receive, and take from the governor and company of the Bank of England, for other purposes than for” (your lordships will have the goodness to watch the expression here slipped in, not contained in the act of parliament, though contended to be warranted by the construction of the act) “immediate application to navy services, large sums of money, from and out of the monies before then issued unto the said governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, as treasurer of his majesty's navy: and the said Henry lord viscount Melville did connive at, and permit and suffer the said Alexander Trotter to place the said last-mentioned sums of money, or a great part thereof, so illegally drawn, received, and taken by him from the governor and company of the Bank of England as aforesaid, in the hands of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and company the private bankers of the said Alexander Trotter, in his own name, and subject to his sole control and disposition.”

Your lordships will observe that, by the terms of this article, the charge is altogether confined to the bare transfer of money from one place to another, without stating it as done for any private purpose; but only predi-cating of the act done, that it was a permission to draw from the Bank to Coutts's for other than immediate naval purposes. It does not aver that it was not a transfer for naval purposes, but only that those naval purposes were not immediate; that is to say, it was a removal of the public money from one place to the other, the latter to be a place of deposit intermediate before it reached its destined object, a naval purpose. That is, to take the money from the Bank of England, and place it at Coutts's bank, although remaining there honestly and bona fide for naval purposes, or to put it in the iron chest for naval purposes, but those naval purposes not immediate, but of a nature contingent, whence it was uncertain whether they would be immediate or not, such as is the case your lordships know with respect to all assigned bills, all demands where bills are drawn upon the treasurer, and which are called for at uncertain periods, although immediately due to a very large amount, and the treasurer has notice given him, intimating that he is to be prepared to answer those bills whenever called upon by the payee, for they are payable at sight. I say, to have had the money in any place of deposit, though bona fide and faithfully reserved for these purposes, and though no part of it be used for any private purpose whatever, yet this is stated by this article to be contrary to the duty of a treasurer, contrary to the statute, and to constitute a high crime and misdemeanor.

Now, with great deference to your lordships, this proposition I deny—I deny the consequence—I deny the law—I say this charge proceeds on a misunderstanding of the law. The discussion of this legal question I am afraid will unavoidably produce the necessity of entering into the consideration of the clauses of the act, and the import and meaning of every part of it. I must therefore entreat your lordships' indulgent attention to a subject of so dry a nature; and I feel particularly anxious to be honoured with that attention, because, upon this subject, my lord Melville has been subjected to a great deal of popular clamour; lord Melville, it has been said, takes great merit for being the author of the act one day, and he immediately breaks it the next. He, the reformer of former abuses—he who was expected to be possessed of the spirit as well as the letter of the act—he, who being the author of the act, and the treasurer in office, had encouraged the public to entertain a hope of great benefit to be derived from his carrying his own reforms into execution—how lamentably was the country disappointed to find this framer of his own act the instant violator of it!

Now, let us see and consider the act; and here, my lords, with great submission, unless I have most egregiously mistaken this act in every word, and in every part of it,—and I have taken some pains not to do so,—I do humbly submit that there never was a clearer question agitated in a court of justice, as to the true construction of it; and that what lord Melville did—respecting which I shall observe hereafter—was not a breach either of the letter or of the spirit of the act—was not in the least contravening one single particle of it—nay, further, that if this law were what it is contended to be on the part of the prosecution,—what your lordships are desired to assert it to be upon your honour,—upon the footing of which your lordships are to convict lord Melville of a high crime and misdemeanor,—that if that were the law, parliament ought not to lose one hour in repealing it, as being one of the most mischievous statutes that ever passed, operating most injuriously against a meritorious class of men, for whose benefit it was supposed to provide, and tending to arrest the pay and service of the Navy, to overturn the whole conduct of the treasurer's office; that it ought to be repealed in a day, from the danger of the terrible consequences that might follow if it were not. Nay, my lords, further, that this act, if such be the construction of it, is violated every day and every hour—that it has been violated by every one of lord Melville's successors—violated after it was declared that such was the construction of it—that it continues to be violated down to this very hour—nay, violated after an unsuccessful attempt made on the part of the present treasurer, to carry into execution the construction of it, which is attempted upon the part of the prosecution to be established. The present treasurer, it has been proved, has declared it impossible to put such a construction in practice; and that the public service could not have gone on if he had not relinquished it. If lord Melville had been the author of this bill, and the construction were that which is contended for; knowing his duty and the nature of the service, he must have been indeed a most flagitious treasurer, to have introduced regulations which he must have known to be ruinous to the service, and incompatible with the discharge of every part of the duty of the office with which he was entrusted.

Now, my lords, I shall beg leave to make use of a topic in aid of my argument, since the prosecutors have chosen to introduce it, which I conceive will be considerably in favour of it, viz. that my lord Melville, the quondam treasurer, and the then treasurer, was the author of the bill: I will take in aid with me likewise, what the learned and honourable manager pleased to introduce, the knowledge which lord Melville had acquired with respect to this office which he had so long conducted. The doctrine contended for on the part of the prosecution is this, that after the public money has issued from the Exchequer, the act allows only one place of deposit for it; that in the language of the preamble to the articles, the Bank is to be the sole place of deposit; that it was the object of the commissioners of accounts in 1780, to make the Bank the sole place of deposit, and the construction put upon the act on the part of the prosecution has been, that this object was adopted and made a peremptory rule of law by that statute. It has been expressly in terms stated, that the legislature intended that the public money, the instant of its issuing from the Bank, should go into the pocket of the public creditor.

Now, my lords, I beg, in the outset of the argument, to exclude one attempt that may be made to raise distinctions between one private custody and another private custody. It can never be contended, that the words of the act tend to authorize any such distinction; still less can it be contended, I presume, that it was the intention of the act to authorize cash to be deposited with a subordinate in the office, and to forbid its being trusted with the principal. Your lordships will hardly suppose that the legislature, in a public act, regulating the treasurer's office for all times to come, would be less jealous of the inferiors than of the superior in office. It is in evidence, that the subordinates give no security. They are appointed by the treasurer, and he is responsible for them. They have small salaries, and are in the nature of the treasurer's clerks. Neither will it be supposed, that lord Melville, who introduced the act, had suspicions of himself but entire confidence in the integrity of his subordinates, and that he meant to lay restrictions upon himself and his paymaster and not to lay them also upon his sub-accountants.

I state this for the purpose of establishing this primary proposition, that the prosecutor is driven to the alternative of saying, that either the act allows no other place of deposit, save and except the Bank, and the pocket of the creditor authorized under the act to receive the money; or that, if there is to be any other place of custody, the act not having specified what that place was to be, it must be determined by reference to the antecedent course of office.

Now, my lords, let us see what was the course of office antecedent to the passing of the act; because, undoubtedly, if the course of office is not changed expressly by the act; if the act, in the terms of it, can be made consistent with the course of office; and if, in order to carry on the public service, it appears to be necessary that such course of office should be pursued, and accordingly such course has ever since been observed; and if no provision is made in the act for substituting new modes of proceeding, in the place of the old course of office; then I apprehend the true construction of the act must be procured from the terms of the act, coupled with the course of office that existed before, and that continued unbroken ever after.

Now, what was that course of office? The course of office is proved in evidence, to have been antecedent to passing the act precisely the same as it continued afterwards, and it was this: the treasurer by his paymaster was accustomed to draw upon the naval fund, wherever that fund was, which was kept usually at the Bank, for the purpose of possessing himself of money, which he afterwards distributed to the different sub-accountants, who were to make payment to the several creditors, calling for it from day to day; for instance, he drew upon the public, and possessed himself of 1,000*l.*, of which he distributed 500*l.* to one sub-accountant, 200*l.* to another, and so on till the whole was exhausted, for the purpose of carrying on the current service of the day; the treasurer, or his paymaster, exercising his discretion, with what sums he would thus supply his subordinates, as the means of carrying on the public service.

In the next place, it is proved that the actual daily demands made upon this fund were very numerous, and for very small sums. In the month of January, 1785, I think a short time before passing the act, there were no less than eighteen hundred very small payments by the treasurer, many, I think, below eight shillings and ninepence, and ten shillings, and most of them below one pound; and it is in evidence that a great many such payments are called for daily; and called for by whom? by sailors who have omitted to put in their claim at the out-ports when the ships were paid off, and who present their claims to the office in London to be paid the small fragments that remained due to them for wages; or by their widows and their families, under the humane and salutary regulations, established by that admirable system of laws, framed by the defendant for the benefit of every part of the service. Various small sums are under that system distributed to sailors' wives in their absence; to their widows and families after their death, from day to day, at the public office at Somerset house.

Now, my lords, it is supposed to have been the intention of this act, that the Bank was to be the sole place of deposit; and that all the claimants I have mentioned, calling for their money from day to day, are to be sent to the Bank with drafts for payment, that is to say, that a sailor, his wife, his widow, or his child, having a demand to the amount of eight or nine shillings, is not to receive it without being put to the trouble of being sent to the Bank, and going through all the checks and forms prescribed by the course of office, which would be equally required to be observed in the payment of a small sum, such as eight shillings, as of eight thousand pounds. Now I beg to ask, whether, if a sailor were put into that predicament, if he were told when he came for his wages to Somerset-house, "We have no money here, it is all at the Bank; you must go to the Bank for your money; take this draft, and go and get paid there;" would not many a sailor be disposed to answer, "I won't go there; I don't know where the Bank is; and if I am not to have my pay without all this trouble, take your paper back, and tear it to pieces; I will not thank you for it:" or if he took the draft, I should be glad to ask how this mode of payment would facilitate the service, or operate to guard that meritorious class of men, against the frauds and impositions that would be practised upon them, by those who would always be in waiting, to facilitate the forms of office to them, and who would for a small or large premium give them cash for their draft, and take all the trouble off their hands, of going through all the details of office at the Bank?

But, my lords, still more, if this had been the course prescribed, not only would it have raised all these obstacles in the daily payment of this class of men, but it would have gone further; for the consequence would have been that all payments below the sum of twenty shillings, could never have been made at all.

My lords, I will explain what I mean: I beg to refer your lordships to a public act of parliament still in force, which renders the construction of the act of 25th Geo. 3rd, contended for on the part of the prosecution, quite impossible; the statute I mean is, the 15th Geo. 3rd, cap. 51. Your lordships will find that by that act, all drafts under twenty shillings, are absolutely illegal and prohibited. Then, my lords, what is to become of the sailors? what is to become of their wives and families who have these demands of small sums below twenty shillings? they cannot be paid in cash at Somerset house, because the Bank is to be the sole place of deposit, and they cannot be paid by a draft, because the act prohibits the issue of any draft under twenty shillings. I should be glad to ask what becomes of this new curious system, supposed to be prescribed by the act, and that too by one well acquainted with the course of office? Nay, my lords, even to the amount of five pounds, there would be considerable difficulties; for by the statute 17th Geo. 3rd, cap. 30, great restrictions are imposed upon any drafts under five pounds, such as it would be extremely difficult, if not impracticable to render compatible with the course of office pursued in this department.

These two acts therefore, applied to the act in question, necessarily exclude the construction contended for, and show, that it could not possibly have been the intent of the legislature, to put a negative upon the ancient course of office; to prohibit cash being lodged at Somerset house; or to make the Bank the sole place of deposit.

But I desire to ask, is this the necessary construction of the words of the act? Is there any thing in the act, that by any fair interpretation, in any respect interferes with the former duty of the treasurer and paymaster, carried on prior to the act in the way that I have stated? Not only is there no word in the act to take from the treasurer the power he before exercised of drawing for money to carry on the public service; but the words contained in it, are not to be construed without a continuance of that power. Nay, if the power had not existed before, it would have been expressly given by the very terms of the act, which are supposed to deprive him of it. Here, my lords, I beg your lordships will permit me, with great deference, to state one clue, that appears to me to solve much of the fallacy that has prevailed, in reasoning upon the construction of the act. It has arisen from not attending to the distinction between the original and primary place of deposit, and the place of the sole ultimate and continuing deposit; and, if your lordships will have the goodness to advert to what was the history and occasion of the act, and what the real nature of the provisions contained in it, for the supposed violation of which the unfortunate defendant has been so much blamed; your lordships will find it to have been an important, salutary, and beneficial act, and that it has been by the noble defendant, at all times from the passing of it, rigidly, correctly, honesty, and punctually observed, and carried into execution both in its letter and spirit.

What were the mischiefs intended to be guarded against by the act? one great evil which had preceded that act was, that the treasurer's business did not cease with his office: that the business was carried on by the ex-treasurer, with all the mischiefs attending such a proceeding; that the public business belonging to the treasurer of the Navy, was transferred into the hands of persons who were under no obligation of office whatever, the discharge of whose duties was perfectly voluntary. In one instance it is stated by the commissioners of accounts, that an ex-treasurer positively refused to carry on the payments at all, and a great detriment arose to the service; a stoppage of all payments for I believe eight months: it had besides the effect of enabling ex-treasurers to have large balances in their hands for a long period of time; for they carried their balances with them when they went out of office, and they neither did nor could pay into the Exchequer those balances, until the final settlement of their accounts. These accounts were for a long time retarded in the passing them, and therefore it was that salutary acts were introduced for substituting commissioners, instead of the old auditors of accounts, with new powers and provisions for accelerating the passing of the accounts, and getting back into the public coffer, out of private custody, money that was no longer wanted for any public use.

Another great object of the act was, to prevent the issuing of the public money from the public Exchequer, one hour before it was wanted; because it was felt to be a solid and an important object for the public, that the public money should be brought into the Exchequer from the pocket of the subject as soon as possible; and that it should not be taken out of it, before it was wanted for the public service. These great objects therefore were to be obtained by making, as this act did, an alteration in the whole course of the business, by providing that no longer should any part of the treasurer's business be carried on by him, after he went out of office; but that upon going out he should transfer all his balances, all his duties, and all his functions to his successor. It rendered the account no longer personal, but official; whatever existing balance there was, within one month after the treasurer went out of office, is directed to be handed over to his successor, who becomes immediately accountable for the whole expenditure.

Another object undoubtedly was, to prevent money being drawn from the Treasury or the Bank, even by the treasurer in office, beyond what was necessary for the naval service. For it certainly was an object, to lessen and keep down balances in the hands of the existing treasurer, just as it was an object to prevent any balance whatever, from being in the hands of an ex-treasurer. To lessen the balance of the one, and to take away altogether the balances from the other, these were the two great objects of the act; with that view, it is directed that the money should issue primarily, not as heretofore to the treasurer, but that it shall instantly go to the Bank. To guard also against the issuing of more than the service requires, important salutary checks are imposed in calling for money from the Exchequer. The act provides, that the treasurer shall never be permitted to ascertain the quantum of the sum, but that shall be done by the several boards who know the amount the several services require; and in drawing upon the Treasury for money from time to time, the treasurer is directed by the act, to accompany his memorial with the letter from the board, specifying the sum wanted, and accompanying it also with an account of his existing balance at the time, in order that the board may, in the first instance, be apprized of the necessity there is for any further issue, and that the Treasury may exercise their judgment as to the propriety of a further issue.

In furtherance of the same object, the act directs, that whenever the treasurer has got a supply of money, he is immediately to communicate the result to the several boards, to give them an account from month to month, and from time to time of the actual amount in the Bank to the treasurer's credit, or in his hands, in order that they may be apprized how the balance stands at the then period, and regulate their calls upon the Treasury from time to time accordingly. Now, all this is for the purpose of regulating the primary original issue from the Exchequer to the Bank; and I distinctly admit that in that respect the Bank is the primary place of the receipt of the money from the Exchequer; that it must go in the first instance altogether, and be lodged at the Bank. But how is the service to be carried on afterwards? What is next to be done? Is it, as before, that the treasurer and his paymaster are to draw upon the Bank for the money, possessing themselves of a fund to carry on a head of service? or are they prohibited from doing so, and ordered to send every body to the Bank for payment, or if they draw at all, are they to draw only in the name of the payee? not one word upon the subject; that which, if it had been intended, would have required the most direct, positive, and explicit negative to overturn, and to innovate upon the whole course of service carried on before. There is not one word about it; but all that there is in the act upon the subject is perfectly consonant with, nay cannot fairly be interpreted without a reference to, and continuation of the ancient course of service.

We are now, my lords, inquiring whether there is any prohibition, any negative upon the antecedent right of the treasurer to draw upon the Bank, for the purpose of carrying on the public service. Now the words of the act are these: the 4th section provides "that the treasurer of his majesty's navy, for the time being, by himself, or the person or persons in his office duly authorized by the said treasurer (plainly alluding to the existing course of office, by which it was usual for the treasurer to authorize the paymaster, or some other person, to carry on the detail of the service); "that the treasurer for the time being, or the person in his office duly authorized by him, from and after the 1st of July, 1785, shall draw upon the governor and company of the Bank of England for all navy service whatever, and shall specify in each and every draft the head of Service for which the same is drawn: and no draft of the treasurer, &c. shall be a sufficient voucher unless it specifies the head of Service."

Now, can words be used more clearly, aptly, and distinctly, continuing the course of service by means of the draft of the treasurer? are they to be drafts in favour of an individual? no; what is the import of the word? is it not an aggregate term? for "a head of Service?" what is meant by that? the treasurer is to draw for a head of service—Is not that in order to possess himself of a fund to carry on that head of service? does it not point out most distinctly and clearly, to any body who will read the words, the intended continuance of the discretionary power of the treasurer to draw out a sufficient fund to carry on the service? It is not to be a draft drawn in favor of any of his subordinates, or of any particular persons: but without any specification of payee, without any further limitation upon him, than that he is to specify the aggregate head of service, for which he wants the fund, it leaves him to carry on that head of service, precisely as it was carried on before. Your lordships will more strongly perceive this meaning of the act, when you compare it with a modern act, upon a similar subject; wherein it may be seen by the contrast in what mode the legislature has imposed restrictions such as are contended for. The act deprives the treasurer of the right of drawing in the aggregate for the whole head of service, and prescribes a form of draft, and a fixed obligation of drawing in favour of a particular individual, as the occasion arises; I mean the late act for regulating the office of the treasurer of the ordnance. Your lordships will there see that this act is a copy of the act of 25th Geo. 3rd; but in addition thereto it has introduced several new clauses for the purpose, supplying the regulations on this very subject. The treasurer is precluded from drawing in the aggregate for all the money imprested, and directed to draw in detail in favour of each individual, in the form of notes, the form of the notes to be ascertained by the Treasury. It is further provided, that he shall never possess himself of a fund to carry on his petty payments, till authorized so to do by the ordinance. My lords, I submit that the comparison of the one act with the other, and the particularity of the new provisions introduced by way of addition into the latter act, decisively show the opinion of the legislature as to the necessity of such new provisions, and fortifies the construction which we contend the act of the 25th Geo. 3rd, without any such provisions, ought to receive.

But, my lords, the ninth section of the act 25th Geo. 3rd seems to me decisive upon the subject. It is there provided, that from and after "the 1st day of July, the treasurer of his majesty's navy, for the time being, shall keep the account with the Bank, of all monies issued to, or directed to be paid to him for the service of the navy." He is to keep an account of all monies paid to him; and yet according to the prosecutor's construction of the act, no monies ever could be paid to him—then how is he to keep an account of what he never could receive?

Besides this, even the eleventh section, which out of great caution was introduced to enable the treasurer to supply the out-ports, and which was relied upon as evincing the opposite construction of the act, when correctly examined, affords an inference directly to the contrary; for it is there provided, that "nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to prevent the treasurer of his majesty's navy from issuing to the pay-clerks, at the several out-ports, such sums as may be thought necessary by the navy board, for paying ships, and carrying on recalls." But how is the treasurer to issue any sums, unless he has them? How is he to create the sums? According to the manager's construction, he never can have any sum in his possession, he never can possess himself of any fund, and yet he is there authorized to supply the out-ports, out of the sums he has in his hands.

I would submit to your lordships that throughout the whole of this act, through which I am too tediously travelling, in every clause, when attentively considered, the regulations prescribed will fairly appear to be perfectly compatible with the old course of office, and to leave it in fact precisely as it existed before, with this restriction only, that the money is undoubtedly to be drawn for, only for naval services. It is to be drawn, in the same manner as before the act, by the treasurer, or his paymaster, and when possessed by him, it is to be distributed through the medium of the sub-accountants, to carry on the current service of the navy, precisely as it was before.

I hope none of your lordships will misunderstand me, or suppose that I am now anticipating that part of the argument which relates to the use that is charged to have been made of the power given. That is matter of subsequent consideration. What power was given by lord Melville, and what use was made of it by Mr. Trotter, are perfectly distinct and separate questions; I am at present only considering the construction of the act in the abstract and upon the face of the act itself, compared with the known current service of the navy, for the purpose of showing that the proposition contained in the second article of the impeachment, is directly contrary to the construction of the act, and would tend to disturb, to innovate, and to break in upon the whole course of the service as established by that act.

With respect to the argument used on the other side, that the service may be carried on, by the paymaster's drawing for the money in favour of a sub-accountant, without retaining any part of it himself; that is also a different question, and does not interfere with what I have stated. If the argument is a sound one, that the act has made the Bank the sole place of deposit, the violation of the law would be the same, if the money was drawn from the Bank, and in the interim, before its distribution in naval services, was placed in the iron chest, though unused, and to be doled out from thence for the current service, or placed directly in the sub-accountant's hands waiting its ultimate destination. This would equally militate with the absolute exclusion contended for, of every place of deposit, except the Bank, previous to the money being paid to the public creditors. For these reasons, I contend that the second article must be negatived, as containing a proposition contrary to the fair construction and import of the law, upon which it is founded.

I would only beg your lordships' permission, to advert to one observation more, respecting this act, that I may not be supposed to have overlooked or purposely omitted it. It relates to the third section of the act, which is supposed to contain a negative upon any money, being, at any time, placed in the treasurer's hands, because it is there stated "that no money for the service of the navy shall be issued from the Exchequer, or shall be placed, or directed to be placed in his possession." This is still perfectly consistent with my argument. The first part of this section is "that no money for the service of the navy, shall be issued from his majesty's Exchequer to the treasurer of the navy." The next is, "or shall be placed, or directed to be placed in his hands or possession." Both these relate to the issue of money to the primary place of deposit, the Bank. Your lordships know the money used to issue from the Exchequer to the treasurer; there were also other sources from which money used to be carried, and put into the hands of the treasurer. The act meaning to negative both, directs that both the money which issued from the Treasury, and also that which issued from any other source, shall in the first instance be all carried to and constitute a head of account at the Bank. Then follows the clause, that all shall be carried to different heads of service, in the treasurer's account at the Bank; and then succeed the directions, how the treasurer is from thence to draw the money from time to time as occasion may require, for the benefit of the public service. I beg pardon for having omitted to notice this clause before. The answer is obvious, but I would not pass it by, lest it might be thought that I had designedly omitted that, which might seem at first view to contravene the argument, with which I have troubled your lordships.

My lords, I have now disposed of the charges contained in three of the articles of impeachment; the seven that remain, are reducible to one general head; they relate to a new period, and I am afraid will unavoidably branch out, from the detailed manner in which they have been treated, into some length.

Lord Chancellor.—Mr. Plumer. If you seek for a resting place in a course so complicated and extensive as this, you may freely choose it for yourself. This Court, which ought to be an example to all other courts, will ever hold in the highest reverence, the indulgent character of British justice. I am persuaded, without calling for the formal consent of their lordships, that if you find it more consistent with the duty which you owe to your client, or more comfortable to yourself, you may rest here, and proceed tomorrow morning in your defence.

Mr. Plumer.—I cannot express the gratitude I feel for your lordships' great indulgence. The subject upon which I am entering, is undoubtedly of considerable length and detail, it is one entire subject, which I am afraid it would be quite impossible for me with any exertion, to conclude within any limits I could hope to be allowed in the course of this day—I am entirely at your lordships' disposal.

Adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

TWELFTH DAY.

Wednesday, May 14th, 1806.

The Lords and others came from the Chamber.
VOL. XXIX.

ber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, who are of counsel for lord Melville, you may now proceed with the defence, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, under favour of your lordships' great indulgence, for which I trust your lordships will believe me to be impressed with every sense of the deepest gratitude, I proceed now to examine the remaining articles of impeachment.

My lords, I begin first with the third article of impeachment, which presents, in addition to the circumstance of withdrawing the money from the Bank, and placing it at Messieurs Coutts's, the circumstance of the corrupt use of it; and your lordships will have the goodness to advert to the terms in which that is charged in the article. The introductory part of it states the fact of the removal from the Bank to Coutts's, and then proceeds to state that lord Melville "did, after the 10th of January, 1786, fraudulently and illegally permit and suffer Alexander Trotter to place many of the said sums of money so drawn, received, and taken by him from the Governor and Company of the Bank of England as aforesaid, in the hands of Messieurs Thomas Coutts and Company, the private bankers of the said Alexander Trotter, in his own name, and at his own disposal." It then charges, that "Alexander Trotter did thereupon, with the privity, by the connivance, and with the permission of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, apply and use the said last-mentioned sums of money, or great part thereof, for purposes of private advantage or interest, profit, and emolument, and did place the said sums of money, or a great part thereof, in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and Company, mixed with and undistinguished from the proper monies of the said Alexander Trotter, whereby the said last-mentioned sums of money were not only applied to and used for purposes of private advantage, or interest, profit, and emolument, and for purposes other than navy services; but were also exposed to great risk of loss, and were withdrawn from the control and disposition of the treasurer of his majesty's navy;" and then it states, that "by these acts" (enumerating them) "lord Melville has acted in breach of the great trust and confidence reposed in him, in violation of the said act of parliament, made for regulating his said office, contrary to his duty, and against the laws of this realm, and to the evil example of all persons entrusted in the great departments of the public service, with any control over the application and expenditure of the public money."

Your lordships will have the goodness to observe first, negatively, what the charge is not. It is not a charge against lord Melville for negligence. It is not a charge, that by his omitting to keep a vigilant and superintendant eye over the conduct of his paymaster, the paymaster was enabled to be guilty of the abuses which have been proved. That is not the charge; but the charge is, that he wilfully, knowingly, illegally, and fraudulently, with full knowledge, connived at, and permitted, and authorized all that was done; that is the question, in this article, and in all that follow it. Your lordships will see, that the impeachment is not, in any part of it, founded upon any thing that lord Melville, in the regular course of his duty, omitted to do; or upon any charge, that, by reason of any omission, abuses crept into the office placed under his general superintendence; but it is a charge of a much higher nature. It is not what he omitted to do, but what he did. The misconduct imputed is of an active nature, that he did know of the use made of the public money, and for corrupt purposes confederated and participated with Mr. Trotter for purposes of private emolument. In substance, the charge is a corrupt confederacy between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter to enrich themselves by a breach of official duty.

My lords, the next article (the fourth) charges, that "whilst lord Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, the said Alexander Trotter did, with the privity, or by the connivance and permission of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, place sums of money, issued from his majesty's Exchequer unto the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, and drawn, received, and taken by him the said Alexander Trotter from the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, in the hands of Mark Sprot and other persons." Here again lord Melville is charged expressly with privity and knowledge of the placing of the money in the hands of one individual by name, and other persons. Your lordships observe it is not stated that these acts were done by Mr. Trotter for want of due vigilance and care in lord Melville, but expressly that they were done with his lordship's privity and knowledge.

The fifth article relates to a distinct subject—a sum of money charged to have been taken by lord Melville, to the amount of 10,000*l.*, and that he fraudulently and illegally converted and applied the same to his own use, or to some other corrupt and illegal purpose.

Your lordships will observe, that here it is expressly charged—and it constitutes the main part of the crime—the corrupt and illegal purpose to which the money was applied;—not that it is some unknown purpose—nor that it is some purpose not yet disclosed, but the prosecutor takes upon himself to state, that he does know it, and he undertakes to prove it to have been a corrupt and illegal purpose. He is bound to prove that, and in the absence of proof it cannot be supplied.

The sixth article, after a little repetition of what had been before stated respecting the money drawn from one place to the other, proceeds to state, that "during the time the said Alexander Trotter held and enjoyed the said office of paymaster to the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, and whilst the said Henry lord viscount Melville, held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy as aforesaid, he the said Alexander Trotter kept with the said Henry lord viscount Melville an account current, entered in certain books of account, containing entries of all the sums paid and received by the said Alexander Trotter, on the account of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and by agreement between the said Henry lord viscount Melville and the said Alexander Trotter, bearing date the 18th and 23rd days of February, 1803."—Your lordships will have the goodness to observe the order in which these facts are stated; it begins with, first, stating books of account to be kept, and items entered in them, containing the receipts and payments between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter; and then, dropping for a time the business of the books, it takes up another transaction, the release and agreement made between these two parties upon the 18th and 23rd of February, 1783, wherein "it is stated that they had either mutually delivered up to each other, or resolved and agreed mutually to cancel or destroy all the vouchers or other memorandums and writings, that at any time theretofore might have existed, passed, or been interchanged between them relative to the said accounts, and the different items and articles of which the said accounts were composed or consisted." This intermediate passage, your lordships will observe, interposed between the first statement of the books of account, respects the release which has been given in evidence, and speaks of its contents. Then again it resumes the subject of the books:—"and the said books of account, containing the said account current, together with all vouchers or other memorandums and writings in the possession of the said Alexander Trotter, and also of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, relative thereto, were burnt and destroyed by the said Henry lord viscount Melville and Alexander Trotter." The books of account were burnt by lord Melville and Mr. Trotter. That is the averment, which the prosecutor has undertaken to prove.—"And the said stipulation contained in the said agreement, for the said Henry lord viscount Melville and Alexander Trotter mutually delivering up to each other, or for mutually cancelling and destroying all the said vouchers, or other memorandums or writings relative to the said account, was so entered into; and the said books of account, vouchers, and memorandums and writings were so burnt and destroyed, with a view to conceal and prevent the discovery of the several advances of money made by the said Alexander Trotter to the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and of the several accounts or considerations for or upon which the same were so advanced."

I have taken the liberty to draw your lordships' attention particularly to the framing of this article; because, undoubtedly, without correct attention to it, the subject of the books of account is so intermixed with the subject of the release, and the vouchers and papers to which alone the release related (it having stated nothing at all respecting the books of account); it might have led an unwary reader to believe, that the release had a close relation to the books of account; that it was preparatory to their destruction, that it stipulated for their destruction, and that the destruction of them was the confederate act of lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, for the purpose of concealing their corrupt transactions. That is expressly the charge in this article.

The seventh article relates to advances of money made on lord Melville's account. It states, that he "did procure, obtain, and receive from the said Alexander Trotter a sum of 22,000*l.*, or some other large sum or sums of money, advanced by the said Alexander Trotter to the said Henry lord viscount Melville without interest; part whereof was so advanced exclusively from public money, so as aforesaid illegally drawn from the Governor and Company of the Bank of England by the said Alexander Trotter; and other part whereof was advanced from the said mixed fund, composed as well of public money so as aforesaid illegally drawn by the said Alexander Trotter from the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and placed by him in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and Company as aforesaid, as of the proper monies of the said Alexander Trotter in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and Company, which had been mixed therewith, and remained undistinguished therefrom."

Then, without stating that this money was, with the knowledge of lord Melville, advanced out of that mixed fund, but stating simply the fact that it was so advanced, it goes on to charge, "that for the purpose of more effectually concealing the said advances of money, the said books of account, vouchers, memorandums, and writings, were so as aforesaid burnt and destroyed."

The next article, the eighth, charges, "That amongst other advances of money, so as aforesaid obtained and received by the said Henry lord viscount Melville from the said Alexander Trotter, the said Henry lord viscount Melville did obtain and receive a sum of 22,000*l.*, or some other large sum or sums of money, advanced to him by the said Alexander Trotter." And here follows a very singular and novel allegation in a criminal charge: "and for which it has been alleged by lord Melville that he was to pay interest, and for the purpose of concealing these advances the books were destroyed."

Your lordships observe, that this charge in the article states no more than merely the advances of money by Mr. Trotter to lord Melville, not stating out of what funds, as the preceding article and the one that follows have done, but simpliciter advances by Mr. Trotter to lord Melville, and the allegation of lord Melville that he was to pay interest for them, without averring that allegation of lord Melville to be true or false, but leaving it upon the allegation of his lordship. In the preceding article it is stated expressly, that the other advances were without interest; but as to these the article does not state the fact either way, whether they were with interest or without interest, but merely the allegation of lord Melville upon the subject.

The ninth and last article states, that "during all, or great part of the time, the said Alexander Trotter held and enjoyed the said office of paymaster of Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, and the said Henry lord viscount Melville held and enjoyed the said office of treasurer of his majesty's navy as aforesaid, he the said Alexander Trotter did gratuitously, and without salary or other pecuniary compensation, act in and transact the private business of the said Henry lord viscount Melville as his agent, and was from time to time in advance for the said Henry lord viscount Melville in that respect, to the amount of from ten thousand to twenty thousand pounds, or to some other great amount; and which advances were taken from the said sums of money so placed by the said Alexander Trotter in the hands of the said Messieurs Coutts and Company, consisting in part of public money, drawn by him from the Governor and Company of the Bank of England as aforesaid, and in part of his own private monies mixed therewith and undistinguished therefrom."

It further states, that "the said Alexander Trotter, did so gratuitously, and without salary, act, and transact the private business of the said Henry lord viscount Melville, and make him such advances of money as aforesaid, in consideration of Henry lord viscount Melville conniving at and permitting and suffering the said Alexander Trotter so as aforesaid to apply and make use of the said sums of public money so drawn by him from the Bank of England, and applied and appropriated for purposes of private advantage or interest, profit, and emolument as aforesaid; and the said Alexander Trotter would not have been, and was well known to the said Henry lord viscount Melville not to have been able to make such advances of money to the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, otherwise than from and by means of the said sums of public money so drawn by the said Alexander Trotter from the Bank of England, with the privity, connivance, and permission of the said Henry lord viscount Melville as aforesaid, and applied by the said Alexander Trotter for purposes of private advantage, interest, profit, and emolument."

Then it concludes, generally, with stating these acts to be high crimes and misdemeanors.

Your lordships will be pleased to observe, that this last article contains a summary of the motives and considerations that operated upon the mind of lord Melville, as inducements with him to give permission and authority to Mr. Trotter to make use of the public money; and they consist, your lordships observe, of two considerations, one being the consideration of Mr. Trotter acting as his private agent without salary; that is one of the alleged motives: the second motive assigned is the advances of money made from time to time as before described, referring to those gradual advances, from ten to twenty thousand pounds, that were occasionally made to lord Melville out of the mixed fund.

My lords, I have stated these articles together, because they appear to me to be very much upon the same subject, and to present to your lordships altogether, as the honourable and learned manager who summed up the evidence stated, a combined and collected charge, consisting of a charge of corrupt confederacy between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, thus to abuse their trust and make use of the public money, originating in an illegal and fraudulent permission to remove the public money from the Bank of England to a private bank, and then proceeding mutually to make use of it for their common benefit and advantage, with full knowledge on the part of lord Melville of all the uses made of it for corrupt purposes, and destroying all the vestiges of proof by which these corrupt transactions could have been discovered. I hope, my lords, I state the charge fairly; and, my lords, undoubtedly this is a charge, as was truly stated, of the greatest magnitude, and one that most affects the honour of the defendant. Part of the transactions, that are the subject of charge also, are not of equal antiquity, but are of more modern occurrence than those that were the subject of the former articles; and therefore are more capable of being investigated, and of having greater light thrown upon them. They are transactions, respecting which there is a living witness, who was the great actor in them, and who has been called on the part of the prosecution. Undoubtedly this is the main and principal foundation of the impeachment, and which your lordships would expect to be clearly and satisfactorily investigated and proved on the part of the prosecution, before your lordships pronounce a judgment against the defendant, by which crimes of such turpitude and enormity are to be fixed upon him.

Now, my lords, I have egregiously deceived myself,—and that, too, after a most attentive and careful comparison of the charge with the evidence;—if, even with the feeble powers I possess, should I have the honour of receiving your lordships' attention, I am not able to prove (I hope I am not too arrogant in presuming to say to your lordships' satisfaction), not only that the whole of the charge is in every part unsupported by the evidence—not only that there is not any balance of testimony upon the subject, but that the evidence adduced by the prosecutor has totally failed him; that the charges are directly, positively, clearly, and satisfactorily disproved in toto by the very evidence adduced in support of them.

My lords, the subject of this charge introduces your lordships to the history of that person who was the principal actor and witness in the whole business, Mr. Trotter; concerning whom your lordships have heard from the honourable managers an account who he was—how introduced to my lord Melville—the situation he occupied—and the part he took. Much observation has been made upon the conduct of lord Melville, and much inference drawn from his having committed the care of all this business too much to Mr. Trotter: that he delegated a considerable part of the duties of this office without due examination to Mr. Trotter; that the permission he was desired to give originally, to remove money from the Bank, was enough to awaken suspicion; nay, that the first permission given for that removal was a corrupt act, done for the very purpose of the use that was afterwards made of it; it was preliminary, introductory to it, and was the commencement in the year 1786 of that systematic plan of corrupt confederacy, which pervaded the fourteen following years prior to lord Melville's quitting this office in 1800.

The honourable and learned manager, who selected what the managers conceived to be the evidence constituting the proof of the charge, stated the instances of sums of money laid out for the benefit of lord Melville to consist principally of four distinct items, all, as it was stated, with public money, viz. the 13,500*l.* India stock, purchased in the years 1789, 1790, 1793, 13,500*l.* or 14,500*l.*; the loyalty loan, amounting to 11,000*l.*, and a fraction in the year 1797; the sum of 2,000*l.* India stock, and the sum of 7,000*l.* 3 per cent reduced, bought also in the year 1797. There are other remittances mentioned, but these I think constitute the principal articles, which were selected as forming the ground upon which this heavy charge of corruption rests against lord Melville. All this was done corruptly with his full privity and knowledge, at least in breach of the terms of the warrant, though not of any act of parliament; nay, in drawing from the Bank for purposes of corruption, in clear violation of the act, introduced by himself; that lord Melville corruptly and knowingly, at different periods of time, laid out the public money in the public funds, for the purpose of augmenting his private fortune; and that to a very considerable amount he suffered Mr. Trotter to do the same.

Now, my lords, the account which the honourable manager, who opened the charge, has given of Mr. Trotter, upon whose testimony every thing in these articles depends, is this;—that early in the year 1786, after the death of Mr. Douglas, which happened in the latter end of the year 1785, Mr. Trotter was introduced into the employ of lord Melville to whom he had before recommended himself by the important assistance which he had afforded in this office. He had been a clerk in the Navy-pay-office, and was very conversant with all the details of the business of it; a gentleman of creditable and opulent connections, proved to be the son and the brother of opulent bankers; having another brother engaged in large mercantile concerns, and of considerable opulence;—a gentleman stated by the honourable manager to have been (with the exception of the transactions which are in charge, and which were for the first time discovered in the year 1803), prior to that time, and in all the other parts of his life, of unsullied character. The honourable manager has borne this testimony respecting him, and the honourable manager has certainly had better means of knowing all his history, and more intimate communication and acquaintance with him perhaps than any body else; for in the course of his duty he has been led to make every possible inquiry concerning him and his affairs; has had frequent interviews with him, during a long course of time past, for the purpose of interrogating him, and discovering every thing that related both to him and the charge. He has informed your lordships that in all other parts of his conduct, either his public or private life, he stood free from all imputation whatever: a man of high estimation, of reputed probity and integrity; a man conversant with figures, with the detail of all the business of the office; and as your lordships have seen from his demeanor and deportment before this high court, a man not wanting in understanding, of a ready and comprehensive mind, and of accurate information upon all the business committed to him.

The honourable manager added likewise that he was a gentleman of unspotted private character, of very amiable manners, recommended by every thing at that time that could give confidence and credit to him. The additional circumstances of recommendation, particularly to one in lord Melville's situation, were his accuracy and knowledge in that species of business, to which it was quite impossible for his lordship (and to which his own natural habits certainly never led him) to give any attention, and his merit as an officer in this department, and the useful and important regulations which he had been the means of enabling the noble lord to reduce into that extensive system and code of laws, for the benefit of the navy, which has been so fairly and candidly spoken of by the honourable manager who opened the charges.

It therefore cannot be said to have been extraordinary to find under these circumstances and at this time—nothing having then occurred to prevent it—the transfer from lord

Melville of all his confidence to such a gentleman. I think no candid mind can hesitate in the opinion that, whatever may have passed since (and which I am sure your lordships will not permit to be antedated and ingrafted upon the then view of the case), in all that was then known of this gentleman's life and character, there was any thing to induce lord Melville to withhold from him, what he certainly received, his full, entire, and unqualified confidence.

My lords, the honourable manager further stated with respect to Mr. Trotter, even after all that has passed and is known of him, that he is a person to whom your lordships may give full credit as to every thing he said. The honourable manager having, previous to that declaration, had certain opportunities of knowing all that he was to say, having been for a period of a great many months, in a course of minutely examining him, during which Mr. Trotter had at one period incurred the displeasure of those before whom he was privately examined, and for a time suffered corrective punishment, until he had satisfactorily expiated that offence, and at their instance was released and declared to have given satisfactory intelligence and answers to all their inquiries.*

He has been examined with all his books and papers; access has been had to his banker's account, and all the items that compose it; every paper that could produce impressions or conjectures adverse to the defendant has been shown him to refresh or bias his memory, to which your lordships must have observed him repeatedly referring in the course of his examination. Frequently declaring, I had no recollection upon the subject, but a paper was shown me yesterday, or some time ago, from whence I am induced to believe so and so. Referring to that sort of examination, which undoubtedly the course of this proceeding authorises, the private examination of the witnesses by the committee of the managers, from day to day, from week to week, and from month to month, with all the great power they possess of the compulsory production of all books, papers, and writings from every quarter that can throw any light upon the subject,—a power which certainly has been very fully used upon the present occasion. Upon the result of all this investigation, thus pursued for more than twelve months, the honourable manager tells your lordships that you may give credit to every thing that Mr. Trotter says.

That I may not misrepresent the honourable manager, or be supposed to speak from loose recollection, I will beg to state to your lordships the note I myself took of this part of his opening speech. I do not mean to offer myself as a witness, my lords, upon the subject, but only to endeavour to be accurate as to the expressions used upon this subject. I understood the honourable manager to say, that in earlier life Mr. Trotter had shown the greatest possible propriety, and ever since, except in the instances that were the subject of charge; that he had been employed as paymaster not only by lord Melville, but by the two treasurers who succeeded him—two persons of undoubted honour and probity, one of whom, Mr. Bragge Bathurst, has been examined before your lordships, the other a member of your lordships' house, who succeeded lord Melville.

* Vide 6 Hans. Parl. Deb. 353, 359.

The honourable manager gave credit to the noble defendant for having in an honourable, generous, and manly way said of Mr. Trotter that he was a meritorious man, and one who had deserved to be trusted; he adds "a man more beloved by his relations I know not, and he has the strongest testimonies in his favour."

The honourable manager was also pleased to state, that "it was very fortunate that what Mr. Trotter would say would be confirmed by books; that in every statement his veracity was established; that it was most fortunate for the prosecution and for Mr. Trotter himself, that he was living and able to give his testimony;" he also stated that "there was no human being could give the account of these transactions but Mr. Trotter, and the noble defendant himself;" that on "that account a bill of indemnity had passed that he might be rendered a witness able to speak the truth *."

Your lordships will all remember that the testimony of Mr. Trotter, considered as the main pillar of the prosecution, was deemed so important as to be the subject of one act, and to give rise to another for the purpose of removing every possible obstacle in the way of having this important witness brought forward to substantiate the charge; that as the accomplice he was to be received into indemnity and favour, provided he would give testimony against the principal, against the person who was concerned with him in this joint and mutual guilt.

My lords, the other passage to which I alluded was, "you may believe Mr. Trotter in this, as you may in every part of his testimony." This was the account with which this gentleman was introduced by the prosecutors themselves.

Now, my lords, who is this Mr. Trotter, and what is the situation in which he is brought forward as a witness? I entreat your lordships to consider whether there ever was a witness brought before a court of justice who had stronger motives to give testimony hostile to a defendant, for the purpose of exonerating himself, and transferring at least an equal share of guilt to the defendant; whether there ever was a witness brought forward under circumstances, if he could be capable of attending to them, of stronger bias upon his mind, and creating a greater interest in his taking part with the accusers? To give testimony favourable to his fallen patron, I mean false testimony, undoubtedly there cannot be supposed any possible inducement;—but by speaking the truth, by discovering their joint guilt, what is the situation to which he would recommend himself?

He recommends himself to his own conscience, and avoids the guilt of perjury; besides which he recommends himself to a great, a mighty, and a powerful prosecutor. He has the best assurance of protection and indemnity under that act, which has made it an express condition of his indemnity, that he should speak the truth distinctly, fairly, and explicitly; and which therefore if he omitted to do, he would violate all title to that protection and indemnity; in addition to which he would subject himself, and justly subject himself, to that civil prosecution in the Exchequer, which is suspended over his head, and by which he and his family would be involved in ruin, and the produce of the labour of his whole life taken from him.

I hope, my lords, I do not overstate it in saying, that a witness standing in this predicament, has undoubtedly no inducement that can operate upon his mind to give any testimony favourable to the defendant, but certainly every motive that could induce him, if the truth would permit, to give testimony against him.

In addition to this, consider my lords, not only has Mr. Trotter every motive of interest to transfer upon the defendant, or to participate with him the guilt imputed; but by taking it all upon himself, and completely exonerating lord Melville, what a deep accumulation of guilt does he fix upon himself! what perfidy! what abuse of trust and confidence!—what an accumulation of misery brought upon his patron and protector does he thus authenticate by his own evidence, and lodge upon his own guilty head.

My lords, would he not naturally be tempted to say, "I am not the man that I have been thought to be; I did not act in this instance without authority; I had the full explicit authority of the noble defendant for all that I did; I was not treacherously betraying him; I was not secretly, and without his knowledge, acting upon this subject? but he has to answer for all that was done. He participated in it; I, the subordinate, obeyed his orders in what I did, and he is at least equally responsible with myself." Undoubtedly, my lords, that representation of the subject would have taken off the additional reproach upon Mr. Trotter, for having acted in the manner he did, without the knowledge, without the participation, without the connivance, without the encouragement, without the authority, of his principal. My lords, I hope I state the case fairly as it really stands in respect to the situation and credit of this witness, and the circumstances under which his testimony is adduced by the prosecutor.

* See Mr. Whitbread's opening speech, p. 641, 642, 643.

Now, my lords, if, after all that has passed, when this person is compelled to speak out, and to do away all the mystery, all the doubt, all the suspicions that once hung upon these transactions;—if coming forward, under all the circumstances which have been stated before this great tribunal, and in the face of the public, Mr. Trotter distinctly avows upon his oath, that the acts which are in charge were all his own unauthorized acts, committed without the knowledge of the defendant, without any thing to lead him to the discovery of them, for his own exclusive gain, for the entire unparticipated profit of himself alone, of which he never rendered any account, not of one farthing from the beginning to the end,—if he confesses all the employment of the public money to have been carried on behind the back of the defendant, without one single circumstance ever communicated that might draw the attention of the noble defendant to it, engaged as he knew him to be in public concerns, and inattentive, as he also knew him to be, to matters of this description;—can any honourable mind hesitate to believe that this is a true statement of the case? My lords, I would submit, before I examine any part of the detail of the business, whether this, if it be the result, does not afford a strong, an invincible ground of defence, that supersedes the necessity of minute and particular inquiry, that must bring conviction home to the mind of every man of the falsehood and injustice of the accusation.

But, my lords, if there should, or could be any doubt entertained in private upon the subject, yet if this be the state of the case proved by the witness adduced by the prosecution, your lordships cannot, I submit, declare it to have been otherwise, still less if that witness stands uncontradicted; if the whole of the prosecution as to these charges, rests upon his testimony; and if all the rest of the evidence is only confirmatory of that testimony; as it was stated to be by the honourable manager; least of all will your lordships be disposed to make that declaration, when the evidence before you is not only all on one side, and in favour of the defendant, but where it appears to be all the evidence that the nature of the subject admits of, as was also stated by the honourable manager, who certainly knows perfectly and accurately what evidence can be adduced. He has stated that these transactions were known only to two persons, viz. Lord Melville, and Mr. Trotter. Lord Melville's account has been given in evidence, in which he has in the most positive terms,—offering to authenticate his asseveration in a still more solemn manner,—declared the negative of his knowledge of, the negative in toto of his participation in the use of the public money at any one period of time by Mr. Trotter, for any purpose of emolument or benefit whatever. This is the declaration of one of the persons stated by the honourable manager to be cognizant of the subject. There is only one other person, he has truly said, acquainted with it; and that other person is Mr. Trotter; no other human being in the world can state what the fact was; and that other person under the circumstances I have stated, confirms the account of lord Melville, exonerates him completely, takes the whole upon himself, and declares,

Me me, adsum qui feci, nihil ille nec ausus
Nec potuit.

My lords, under these circumstances, I trust your lordships will be satisfied that you cannot fairly and justly fix upon the noble defendant the foul reproach contained in these charges, which I am sure your lordships will feel ought to be supported by the clearest and most positive testimony, before they can receive any sanction in your lordships' judgment.

I shall not, however, rest here, I do not mean to avoid the detail. With your lordships' permission, I will examine every one of the transactions relied upon on the part of the prosecution—and I hope to be able to satisfy your lordships, that upon the prosecutor's own evidence, the instances selected for the purpose of proving corrupt confederacy in the defendant, and a participation of guilt with Mr. Trotter, when they are correctly examined fairly afford an inference directly the reverse. But, my lords, before entering into this detail, I must entreat your lordships' attention to a few leading and general considerations. The history of these transactions commences with the year 1786; and I beg your lordships will permit me to possess you with what appears upon the evidence to have been the situation of lord Melville at that time. In the year 1784, he had been appointed president of the board of control, in which office he continued, as is proved before your lordships, for a period of seventeen years, down to the year 1801; for the first nine years performing the duties without salary, in consideration, I presume, of his having united with it this office of treasurer of the navy. It is also proved that it was the period of the first establishment of that board,—a period in which the affairs of the East India company recently under the consideration of parliament, had been proved to be in a very dilapidated state; and to call for all the vigour and energy that could be directed to the restoration of prosperity to our eastern empire. It is in proof before your lordships, that lord Melville was a vigilant, active, and laborious servant of the public in that department, bestowing his daily and unremitted assiduity and care to the duties of that office, under circumstances of considerable difficulty. He was not only called upon to conduct the affairs of that great department, but to make new establishments both at home and abroad; he had to form new systems, as well as to carry them into execution; he had to provide for the prosperity and comfort of all the inhabitants of the East, by the new and important regulations which were happily framed and carried into execution under his management.

In the year 1791, a very memorable period in the annals of Europe, and particularly in this country,—a period your lordships all remember, when certain principles threatened the destruction of the constitution, and when a revolution in a neighbouring country had created so much alarm in this;—in that period lord Melville, from a knowledge of the vigour and energy with which he had conducted himself in every department entrusted to him, was appointed by his majesty, secretary of state in the home department, an office that particularly required vigilance day and night, to watch over what was going forward at that interesting and important period; all the highest concerns of the country were thus necessarily brought under his superintending management, from the year 1791, to the year 1794; and when new difficulties threatened, when besides all the alarm that prevailed at home, Great Britain was threatened with external war by an inveterate enemy, and soon afterwards involved in it; your lordships find that lord Melville was then appointed by his majesty, secretary of state for the war department; continuing in that situation from the year 1794, till the year 1801. He was during this period, I may be permitted to say, as the fact is known to many of your lordships, much against his own inclinations, called upon by his majesty, to fill those high departments of the state, in moments of the greatest peril at home and abroad. He continued to possess a plurality of important duty, such as rarely had been placed in the hands of any other public man; not only filling this situation of treasurer of the Navy, the whole detail of which had always been left to a subordinate, but he had at the same moment united himself to the care of our eastern empire, as president of the board of control, during the whole period from 1784 to 1801; and during the same period, he was occupied as I have shown, first as secretary of state for the home department, and afterwards as secretary of state for the war department.

My lords, as I am upon this subject, I hope your lordships will forgive me for adverting to a circumstance relative to one of these offices mentioned by the honourable manager, who opened the charges, for the purpose, as I understood the honourable manager, of abridging lord Melville's means of income at the time. He stated, and certainly truly stated, that the noble defendant, who is now held up to the public as a corrupt man, sacrificing all principle, all duty to his interest, for the sake of amassing a sum, according to the summary calculation of the solicitor for the prosecution, (which I shall by-and-by examine) but even upon that exaggerated statement, screwed up to a total of profit throughout the whole period of fourteen years, to 22,000*l.*; this same corrupt man, who basely, vilely, and wickedly forgot all his duty to the public and himself, and for the sake of this paltry sum, descended from his high situation, to mingle in these petty concerns, was at the same period of time voluntarily relinquishing his undoubted right to the legal salary annexed to the situation of secretary of state, to a much larger amount; the amount of the sum relinquished, appears in respect of one department, in the second volume of the Reports of the Committee of Finance, page 62, which is a public document, and to which I presume I may refer; but if it be the subject of the least doubt, it is capable of being, and will be made the subject of evidence before your lordships. There is in those reports stated to have been a saving to the public, by the voluntary renunciation of salary, by Mr. Secretary Dundas, to the amount of 5,933*l.* 10*s.* 3½*d.* in the home department; and this, my lords, only for one part of the period. With respect to the other department, the voluntary relinquishment of salary by this corrupt man, during the very same period of those corrupt transactions with Mr. Trotter, unnecessarily and voluntarily, while he was performing all the duties of this arduous situation, he forbore to receive the legitimate salary belonging to it, to the amount of 26,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* which added to the former sum, make together, during the same period, a relinquishment to the public of 34,266*l.* 16*s.* 11½*d.* Now, my lords, surely I am warranted in saying that these are not vestiges of a corrupt, money-getting man, a man who was looking after his mercenary interest. What he might have received,—without the sacrifice of any duty, without the relinquishment of any trust, without any risk to his honour, to his character, or to the constant legitimate usage of the situations in which he was placed;—he voluntarily gives up to the public, exceeding in amount all that he is charged to have obtained by illicit profit, in the difference between 22,000*l.* the aggregate of gain he is stated to have made, and 34,266*l.*

These circumstances, I hope your lordships will bear in remembrance, in entering upon this subject; and if there should, in the progress of this business, appear to be circumstances of suspicion belonging to any part of the conduct of the defendant, if there are circumstances which are not easily reconcileable to that active, vigilant, and proper attention to pecuniary concerns of a private nature, which men in general observe, and which might particularly be expected in a person, who like the defendant, has filled considerable stations, and long been in habits of business, a subject so much dwelt upon by the honourable and learned manager; still I trust every charitable mind when driven to the alternative either of inferring these circumstances to have proceeded from a corrupt intention and plan of gain on the part of this noble defendant, or from a very considerable degree of negligence, remissness, and improvidence in his private concerns,—the known features of his character at all times, and such as to a certain degree might be expected in any one, engaged as lord Melville then was,—will not hesitate to adopt the latter, as the more probable presumption under the circumstances of this case. May I not anticipate the opinion your lordships would be disposed to form upon the subject, had the question arisen in a civil case, or were it to be decided out of court upon the principles which govern rational and charitable men, judging of the conduct of each other? whether driven to the necessity of adopting one or other of the alternatives stated, you would not prefer the favourable conclusion rather than adopt so improbable a supposition as the one you are desired to authenticate by your judgment; that such an individual under such circumstances could have descended for such an object into the practices imputed to him? more especially, I am persuaded, will your lordships prefer that inference in a criminal case, the result of which is to be attended with such effects as a judgment of condemnation upon this subject must produce.

Permit me, my lords, to solicit your lordships to consider the case under one more general head, I mean that of a gross improbability. Is it to be conceived possible for any one, I had almost said in the language of the honourable and learned manager, above the degree of an idiot, to have embarked in this concern, in the manner and under the circumstances lord Melville is supposed to have done? Why, my lords, consider for a moment in the first place what was the risk attending the undertaking. If lord Melville and Mr. Trotter constituted this joint firm of mutual gain and profit, and if, with his lordship's knowledge, participation, authority, and connivance, Mr. Trotter was drawing large sums out of the public purse from month to month, for the purpose of laying them out in all the various speculations he engaged in; consider what was the situation of lord Melville, what was the danger to which he was continually exposed! In the first place he was responsible to the extent of his whole fortune for any loss which might have arisen from any pecuniary speculations of Mr. Trotter—In the next, the whole business from the very nature of it, was attended with very great risk of discovery, the execution of it constantly coming to the knowledge of a great variety of persons. It could not be carried on without drawing large sums of money out of the hands of the governor and company of the Bank of England, who your lordships will remember are all this time making use and profit of the public money deposited with them, without being supposed to transgress any law, or incur any offence. It is proved that when the Bank-notes paid at the Exchequer are brought into the Bank they are destroyed, by which so much of that company's outstanding debt is for a time annihilated, and their means of discount and of issuing fresh paper increased; the larger the depôt, the greater is their capital, and of course their means of profit and advantage. This might naturally operate to quicken a commercial company, to look a little sharp after the state of their depôt. It is in proof too that from the manner in which the business of Mr. Trotter was carried on, other persons were employed in laying out the public money for his benefit. It is proved that that particularly intelligent gentleman in money matters, Mr. Mark Sprot, who was examined, was frequently and largely employed in the business; and he says that though he certainly had a belief and a knowledge that to a certain extent Mr. Trotter could have engaged in money concerns from his opulent connections, yet that the circumstance of his being paymaster enabled him (Sprot), to account for the very large extent in which he was monthly engaged in money concerns. My lords, was not this then an undertaking of infinite peril (I am now supposing lord Melville to have been purposely and intentionally concerned in it, which is the charge made against him), and must not the consequences of detection have infallibly been productive of the downfall and ruin of the noble defendant? He could never in such a case expect any mercy to be shown to him. It was obvious, that if ever it should be discovered, undoubtedly the minor offender would be protected, and made use of (as he ought to be if necessary) to give evidence against the greater. If therefore lord Melville was engaged in these foul transactions, all the risk was his.

Now, my lords, do I ask too much of your lordships, in presuming to suppose, that if your lordships could believe lord Melville to have been base, and mean enough to have been capable of bringing himself to engage in these corrupt transactions, without any restraint from principles of integrity or duty, yet that at least your lordships would expect to be satisfied, that there existed an adequate object for such conduct? Do men throw away their character, or even expose it to risk for nothing? My lords, what is the fact proved by Mr. Trotter? I take it now in the outline of his evidence, without entering into particulars; what is proved in the mass and in the general. For fourteen years this system is carried on; surely, my lords, if it was a joint concern, he who risks most ought to have most profit; he, who for the sake of lucre and gain, exposed to great hazard his high station, and the proud elevation of a great name and character, to engage as a dormant partner in these low pursuits, would at least expect to have secured for himself a very considerable share of the emolument. Now, my lords, what is the result? what is the account given by the prosecutor's own witness upon the subject? That throughout the fourteen years, and during the whole period of these transactions, the whole profit arising from them was, as Mr. Trotter has described it, exclusively his own; so that we have my lord Melville giving his name, his countenance, his sanction, and his authority, to transactions of this description, attended with this risk, and his departure from all principle for the sake of pecuniary gain, and at the same time voluntarily, without a possible motive, giving up the profit unparticipated wholly to Mr. Trotter. Now, my lords, was there ever such an extraordinary union of generosity and avarice? sacrificing every thing that was dear and valuable in life for money, to the dereliction of all principle; engaging in pursuits most adverse to his nature, money-lending, stockjobbing, &c. to obtain it, and at the same time never during the whole fourteen years receiving or claiming any the least share of the profit arising from these pursuits, though it was in his power at all times to have enriched himself by them to any extent. This is certainly a new transaction in the history of the world, such as no man living was ever before engaged in. It is sufficient to state such a charge, to obtain a refutation of it. It is utterly incredible and absurd upon the face of it. I would only add, on this head of probability, with what little colour of justice this charge of corruption is made against the noble defendant. If money had ever been the object of the noble defendant's life, what opportunities had he for accumulating it? Recollect what during the greatest part of it has been his situation, what the stations he has filled, and at what periods. Consider the command of money he has had under his control, supposing him to have considered, as his accusers contend he did, the public money imprested to him, at his own disposal. It appears by the evidence, I think, that a hundred and twenty millions went through his hands, as treasurer of the Navy, and it is well known, that at any period, if money had been his object to the dereliction of principle, there was not a month in which he had not abundant and abundant opportunities, without the knowledge of Mr. Trotter, without the knowledge of any body who was not in his closest confidence, of accumulating wealth to any amount his avarice might have dictated. And yet, my lords, what is now at the end of his long services, admitted to be the state of his fortune, and the whole of what he possesses in the world? The utmost amount of any receipt of money, which has ever reached him in any shape, and from any quarter whatever, has been laid open to public inspection. And indeed the state of his fortune sufficiently appears from the proof of the manner in which he adjusted his debt to Mr. Trotter, upon the settlement in the year 1800. The efforts then made to gather together all he was worth, and scrape up all he could, by the assistance of an affectionate son, borrowing money for him to make good the sum he owed to Mr. Trotter, completely negative the idea of any hidden treasure, or of any sum he had ever amassed throughout the whole of his long and laborious service.

My lords, I should hope that it would require under the circumstances I have stated, the most decisive body of evidence to raise a belief in any candid mind of the charge of corruption. But, my lords, let us see what positive body of evidence there is upon the subject. The first circumstance that is introduced as proof of corruption in lord Melville, is, the permission to Mr. Trotter to withdraw the money from the Bank and remove it to Mr. Coutts's house, and it is said that this was a corrupt transaction; that it was done for the purpose of making use of it to private emolument; that all the rest was cover, pretext, a veil, to remove it from one place to another upon pretence of official convenience, but that the real object and motive was private emolument.

My lords, I should think it would be quite sufficient upon this subject, without troubling your lordships with a detail of proof, or examining the evidence upon the subject, to say that all the hypothesis, all the reasoning by the honourable and learned manager upon this subject, consists, in this instance, as it does, if I have not misunderstood it, almost in every instance, that he has examined, of very ingenious arguments and reasonings, but unfortunately directly in the teeth of the evidence that the prosecutors have adduced in support of their charge. Upon this subject I have only to refer your lordships to the testimony of Mr. Trotter which is before you, which has directly negated the charge in toto. He swears positively, in the most direct and positive terms, to the negative of the purpose suggested of private interest or emolument, having actuated either party in soliciting or granting the permission for the removal of the money to Coutts's; he denies that such object was in the least discussed or adverted to by either party; nay, my lords, he has further expressly sworn to the best of his recollection, he had not even himself the object of emolument in view at the time he made the proposal to lord Melville. It can hardly then I think be said, that lord Melville could know of an intention in the mind of Mr. Trotter, which intention Mr. Trotter has denied upon his oath to have entertained at the time. I think, my lords, it can hardly be necessary to examine this charge further, when the prosecutor's own witness has positively and distinctly disproved it.

In opposition to this, my lords, are we to have recourse to arguments, and to be nicely examining the propriety of this permission and the alleged reasons for it, for the purpose of raising doubts by ingenious reasonings, and of attempting to show that the act carries with it internal evidence of the falsehood of the account given by Mr. Trotter? Is the prosecutor to be at liberty in this instance to reject the testimony of his own witness, that witness whom the honorable manager, said your lordships were to believe in every word, and in respect of whom the honorable manager declared he should, as he has attempted uniformly to do, give confirmatory testimony in support of him? Your lordships must so declare, if you pronounce judgment in favour of this charge. Your lordships must say you disbelieve Mr. Trotter on his oath examined on the part of the prosecution, by reason of the circumstances that attended this transaction. Were those circumstances ever so strong, I contend, my lords, it would not be competent for the prosecutors to oppose them to the testimony of Mr. Trotter. A prosecutor cannot deal with his own witness in that way; he builds upon the testimony of Trotter, his charge stands upon it, he cannot pick out parts of his testimony and say this and the other part you shall believe, but whenever his testimony makes for the defendant you shall discredit it. Your lordships cannot upon such partial application of credit and disbelief as it serves the purpose of the prosecution or of the defendant, shift about with the same witness, believe him one minute and disbelieve him the next. The whole of this charge stands, and is stated to stand upon the testimony of Mr. Trotter, and he has positively denied it.

But, my lords, if your lordships were at liberty to look beyond his testimony, are there any such circumstances belonging to this transaction, as should induce your lordships to entertain any doubt of the account given by Mr. Trotter? on the contrary, when properly examined, do they not afford fair and rational inferences directly otherwise?

Upon this subject it seems to me that a great deal of fallacy has been introduced into the mode of considering this subject, by confounding what lord Melville did, with all the subsequent unauthorized use made by Mr. Trotter, of the legal, innocent, and proper authority that was given him; mixing the corruption of Mr. Trotter with, and attaching it to give a character to, the acts of lord Melville; assuming all the posterior acts of Mr. Trotter to have been with the gift of prophecy foreseen at the moment, and present to the mind of lord Melville, when he gave this permission, and so to qualify and characterize the nature of it. This erroneous view of the subject proceeds from that, which is so apt to mislead the mind in any retrospect of past conduct. When consequences have followed and are before the public, how frequent is the mistaken supposition that all of them must have been foreseen. Instead of carrying back the mind and judgment to the situation in which lord Melville stood in the year 1786, when applied to for his permission, his conduct is examined as if he had been in the situation in which any one now called upon to form a judgment of the subject would be, with his eyes open to all the transactions which have since happened to govern his judgment, and to direct it upon this point.

Again I would with great deference, submit that your lordships ought not to make the guilt or innocence of lord Melville in this transaction, depend on the criterion of the rectitude and propriety of the measure; whether to remove the money from the Bank to Mr. Coutts's was or not the wisest, the most proper, the most discreet, or the most prudent step to be taken to facilitate the distribution of the money among the several persons entitled to it, is not the present question. Whether, now that the mind has been long given to the subject, that ill consequences have been seen to arise from one mode of transacting the business after every intellect has been employed to contrive some other and better plan for conducting the same business, whether there may be suggested one less exceptionable, is not the question. If it were, a great deal of doubt might arise with respect to the policy, wisdom, and even the safety of that measure which has been lately substituted in the place of the one for which lord Melville has been so much censured. I do not say in the comparison which is the best mode, but I am certain of this, that the new mode is exposed to evils similar to those which have been experienced under the former; that a very considerable transfer of confidence thereby takes place from the treasurer to a subordinate, inferior to the paymaster, and a larger sum of money is intrusted to the control of an officer of inferior description. I mean the plan of supplying the sub-accountants with cash by means of the write-off, and the transfer of cash from the account of the treasurer to the account of a sub-accountant at the Bank. This becomes a private cash-account of the sub-accountant's own at the Bank, and he has the power to draw the money out the next minute. Suppose, for instance, 50,000*l.* transferred to the sub-accountant's account in the morning, he has a credit to that amount at the Bank; and if disposed to act dishonestly, or to make a profitable use of the money, he has as much the power to employ this 50,000*l.* in the interim before it is wanted for the public service, as ever Mr. Trotter had, under any authority that ever was given him.

But, my lords, let us inquire whether there was any thing in the nature of this proposal of Mr. Trotter's, to remove money for official convenience to Coutts's bank, that should have alarmed and excited suspicion in lord Melville; or rather that should have afforded to his mind decisive proofs of its being for corrupt purposes. Your lordships have heard a great deal of observation with respect to the transfer of duty from lord Melville to Mr. Trotter. It is said he seems to have abdicated the trust the public reposed in him; he had a salary for superintendence only, yet he omitted that superintendence, and it was owing to that negligence, which a public accountant ought not to be tolerated to say he was guilty of, that Mr. Trotter was enabled to do what he did. I will not follow in detail this argument, because, as I have already observed, there is no charge against lord Melville in any of the articles of impeachment, of negligence or remissness; and therefore any observation on that head is foreign to the question. I shall only advert to it for the purpose of obviating any inference being derived from it in aid of what is in charge, namely, a corrupt intention, by showing how totally void of foundation any complaint against lord Melville is upon this subject. It appears in evidence before your lordships that this office, the duties of which lord Melville is supposed not to have properly discharged, by not having himself superintended and exactly watched the detail of the business, has always by the established usage of it been left to the paymaster. It is in evidence by the testimony of Mr. Bragge Bathurst, the witness examined by the prosecutors for the purpose of substantiating what were the duties of this office (a subject postponed to the latter part of the evidence for the prosecution), undoubtedly a gentleman of the highest probity, honour, and ability, that "the office was conducted by the paymaster; the practice (he says) of my predecessor, had been to delegate all the power to the paymaster by a general power of attorney; all pecuniary transactions were conducted by him; there were references made to the treasurer in particular cases, sometimes daily, but as to the payment and receipt of money that was conducted entirely by the paymaster; the paymaster acted without reference and completely performed all the duties;" surely then, my lords, no fair inference can be drawn to the disadvantage of lord Melville upon this subject; if under the pressure of his other duties he acted in the same manner as Mr. Bragge Bathurst, who had at the time no other office. But in addition to this, I hope I may refer to a public document, stating what was the nature of the duties of this office, certainly not drawn up with any disposition to favour lord Melville; I mean the tenth report of the commissioners of naval inquiry.

The treasurer of the navy is there stated "to be appointed by patent; he does not perform in person any of the official duties of his situation, but he nominates and appoints the paymaster, to whom he delegates the whole charge and conduct of the office by a general power of attorney; the other officers and clerks are also nominated by the treasurer; the paymaster is liable to be displaced upon the removal or resignation of his principal; but it has not been usual to remove the inferior officers or clerks except in cases of misconduct."

My lords, in addition to this, I would refer your lordships to the preamble of the articles of charge, to what has been stated upon this subject, which is now pressed against the defendant as a circumstance affording inferences of criminal corruption. In that preamble this transfer of duty to the paymaster by lord Melville, is expressly recognised not only without censure, but in a way implying approbation. The preamble states it thus. "Whereas on the tenth of January, 1786, whilst lord Melville held and enjoyed the office of treasurer of his majesty's navy, he did constitute and appoint Alexander Trotter his paymaster, and the said lord Melville did on the 10th day of January, 1786, duly authorize and empower the said Alexander Trotter to draw on the governor and company of the Bank of England, for and upon the account of him, the said Henry lord viscount Melville, as treasurer of his majesty's navy, all and every sum and sums of money that then were, or should thereafter be wanted for the public services under the care of payment of the said lord Melville, the said Alexander Trotter being particularly careful to specify on each and every draft, the service for which the money should be drawn."

Now, my lords, I say this delegation of authority to the paymaster, is here by the prosecutor himself, stated to be a regular and proper act, and yet, my lords, by that act and not, as has been endeavoured to be shown, by the permission to remove from the Bank to Mr. Coutts's, did there originate that power of Mr. Trotter to draw from the Bank with unlimited power all the money that was there. My lords, did that power and control over the public money originate in any conversation, or a verbal authority to remove it from one place to another? No, my lords, if it was an improper act to give such a power, if it was improper to arm Mr. Trotter with an unqualified authority over the whole fund at the Bank, by which he could make the uses of it he did, whether it was or was not immediately deposited for a time at this or the other Bank, the general power over it and all the means of making use of it had been given before, by the power of attorney mentioned in the preamble. Nay, my lords, all the use that Mr. Trotter made of the public money, was under and by virtue of the general authority. Some of the money was placed in transitu at Mr. Coutts's bank, but a very large proportion of it, as the honourable managers have themselves proved, was never there at all, but directly drawn from the Bank and laid out. They have shown that many times when there was very little money at Mr. Coutts's; nay, even when Mr. Coutts's account made Mr. Trotter debtor, yet there was outstanding, that is short of the official balance at the Bank, to the amount of fifty, sixty, and a hundred thousand pounds. Why then, my lords, all the mischief, all the command over the fund, was derived under that which appears to have been the constant, uniform, unbroken, uncomplained of delegation of entire power and authority (continued even to this day) given in the regular course of duty and office to the paymaster. It may happen that a paymaster may abuse his trust; it may happen that any subordinate in any situation may abuse it, but what was done by lord Melville was a proper and legitimate act; nothing of suspicion attaches upon the delegation of authority, because it was the course of the office to give it. Had lord Melville been in the situation of Mr. Bragge Bathurst, having no other concern of a public nature to attend to, still he would have been warranted in doing what he did: nay, his successor says he did it after him; and in questions put to Mr. Bragge Bathurst even now respecting the detail of the official duty, he fairly acknowledges that it was a subject not within his cognizance, and to which he could therefore give no direct answer.

Then, my lords, what inference of misconduct, if that had been the charge, and still more what inferences of a corrupt criminal intent are to be derived from this act, which is not only agreeable to all the established course of official duty belonging to this department, but which is stated upon the face of the impeachment, to have been a due, legal, authoritative act.

My lords, I shall entreat of your lordships to give us the benefit of this observation, when you are considering the question of law arising upon the construction of the act of parliament, which I have before discussed: for if this was a due and legal authority which the preamble states it was, it puts an end to the question of law. If it was competent, after the act of parliament had passed, to give to the paymaster a general power of drawing upon the account of the treasurer of the navy, all and every sum and sums of money, in the words of the power of attorney "which should thereafter be wanted for the public service:" how is it possible for the prosecutor, in the teeth of that averment by which he has stated that to be a due authority, now to contend it was an illegal one? the power of attorney was the authority, and the only authority under which Mr. Trotter acted. My lords, the verbal conversation that passed gave him no authority whatever, no fresh authority could it give him it must be an authority in writing under the statute. The authority therefore under which he acted, if he acted illegally, if he acted improperly, was that written authority which the honourable managers have authenticated, which they have stated to be a due authority in the very front and introduction of all the charges.

Your lordships will observe, that the written authority I have referred to, was undoubtedly restrained to the public service. The verbal authority that has been proved by Mr. Trotter, was limited in the same manner; I mean the authority to remove the money from the Bank, in transitu, and prior to its distribution to the other services, to a temporary deposit at Mr. Coutts's; it was in the same manner confined to public services: That is proved by Mr. Trotter.

My lords, this mode was proposed by Mr. Trotter, as he swore, for the reasons given for it at the time, viz. that it would facilitate official convenience, and that it would protect the money from the danger of losses; it is said that these are not good reasons, that they are not warranted in fact, for that the official convenience is not forwarded by it, and that the danger is not obviated; that the danger of conveyance was incurred afterwards by a million of money being drawn and conveyed from the Bank, by the order of the same person who made this proposition.—Now here again, my lords, is an instance of urging what was done by Mr. Trotter, under the authority given him, as an argument against the propriety, the reason, and the fitness of the authority itself. It is said that the difference of the Bank hours and the office hours, shows that this was an improper authority, for that the latter closes at two, and the other not till five. I cannot say that I enter very clearly into the force of that argument, for let the Bank continue open as long as it will, yet any body who is to be paid by a draft, must have previously got the draft from the office, and this he could not have got at a later hour than the office was kept open: it would be of no advantage to him to have the Bank open till five, if he could not have a draft from the office after two: but it is surely quite enough to rebut any inference of corrupt intention, that Mr. Trotter has sworn that he gave it as his judgment at the time to his superior, he,—the person most conversant with this business, and to whom it was natural to give credit on such a subject,—positively swears that he honestly, bona fide, and for the real object and purpose professed, and no other, did at the time, think and declare, that it would advance the public service, that it would be more convenient, the office having been removed from Broad-street to Somerset-house, to have as a depôt, a sum lodged at Coutts's bank, from which he could occasionally supply the sub-accountants, who were to distribute it; and with respect to the argument that has been urged so repeatedly, that the paymaster does not with his own hands pay any money, and therefore this must have been a pretence, that it is the sub-accountants only who pay; surely that will not appear to have any great weight in it, when it is considered what is the nature of the establishment of this office, and the course of payments in it. I include not the payments at the out-ports; they are regulated by a totally different mode, and that is the reason why there is a distinct clause in the act respecting the out-ports; because when money is issued to the out-ports, to carry on the service, it is by an order from the board, and the treasurer is immediately exonerated from all responsibility respecting it, and that is the reason why the clause is introduced into the act authorising the treasurer to go on in respect to the out-ports as he had theretofore done. But with respect to payments in London: for every one of them, made by whatever hand they may be, the treasurer is responsible as he is for money that is possessed by any of the sub-accountants to the extent of his fortune; and therefore it is proper matter of discretion with him, how much he will dole out from time to time, and deposit in the hands of any sub-accountant; in truth, all the payments originate with him; the direction of money through all its channels, the quantum of deposit at each place, the provision for each day, and whether there should be for any reason toties quoties remitted supplies in the course of the day to one whom he did not choose to trust with a large sum at one time,—all this is entirely in the discretion of the treasurer, acting through his paymaster who managed all the business; and therefore it might answer very proper, honest naval purposes, to have money deposited in the hands of a banking-house of the first credit in London, in order that from thence the paymaster might supply Somerset-house with the money that was wanted for all the naval purposes, as occasion demanded. He might think, too, such a mode of supply would obviate any inconvenience that had been before experienced, and the danger that had been incurred by bringing the money from the Bank, which had usually been done by common messengers, not by the principal money conductor of the office, as in the case of the million of money alluded to. But supposing all these reasons given by Mr. Trotter to have been bad, it would not alter the case; because Mr. Trotter has sworn they were his, and were stated to lord Melville to be his real reasons, at the time that the proposal was made, bona fide, with a view to these objects, and to these only, and that he had not any idea of profit whatever to be derived from it.

My lords, I would beg next to advert to what was much relied upon by the honourable and learned manager, upon this subject, the examination of lord Melville before the commissioners of naval inquiry, in which it is said lord Melville has acknowledged that he gave permission for the removal of the money, for the profit and emolument of Mr. Trotter; I do not exactly remember the words, your lordships will refer to them, but the examination is referred to as affording that inference from the mouth of lord Melville himself; that his object upon this subject was the profit and emolument of Mr. Trotter. Now, my lords, I submit that, adverting to the whole context, and to the manner in which it was understood, even by those to whom it was addressed, the examination does not fairly afford such an inference. Lord Melville there expressly states, that he did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge money drawn from the Bank for public purposes, in his private banker's hands, during the period it was not demanded for the purposes for which it was drawn; and when asked farther with respect to it, he says, that if the whole monies necessarily drawn from the Bank, in pursuance of orders from the competent boards, were lodged in the hands of a respectable banker, under the control of the paymaster of the navy, it would add more facility to the conduct of the business of the office, in the multitude of small payments to be made, than if the money were deposited according to the constitution of the office, in an iron chest. I likewise (says he) had it in contemplation, that in the receipt of these various small payments made to such a variety of persons, they would be less liable to be imposed upon by that mode of transacting the business, than if they were to receive drafts for such small sums upon the Bank. Then he is asked (which is the question and answer relied upon on the part of the prosecution) respecting the permission to withdraw it, with a view of deriving advantage or emolument therefrom; he says, "If it is meant to ask me whether I ever gave any direct authority to the paymaster to use the money, in the manner above mentioned, I should certainly answer no; but I have no hesitation in saying that I believed and understood he did, and never prohibited him from doing so; and I believe it was so understood by others, at different times, when the establishment of the Navy-pay-office, was under consideration; when certainly no competent provision was made for the person exercising that trust of great extent and responsibility."* From this passage it is inferred that lord Melville had a knowledge of Mr. Trotter deriving profit and emolument, from the removal of the money, and that that had operated as the impelling motive, and as one of the causes that induced the permission for that removal.

Now, my lords, the context fairly negatives this inference. It was clearly understood by the commissioners, to whom this examination was addressed, that my lord Melville meant entirely to qualify his permission altogether to the fair, honest, and legitimate purpose of carrying on the navy service. In their 10th report I observe the commissioners speaking of this examination, say, "Lord Melville states, that he certainly did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge any money drawn from the Bank, for public purposes, in his private banker's hands during the period that it was not demanded for the purposes for which it was drawn; but it is to be inferred from his evidence, that he intended Mr. Trotter to draw upon the Bank for the amount only of the assignments, made on him by the different boards, an account of which is furnished to him daily, and that the balance of such sum till demanded, should alone be lodged by Mr. Trotter, in the hands of his private bankers." And upon this subject the testimony given by the honourable manager, who spoke to the declarations made by lord Melville in the House of Commons, has offered to your lordships an explanation of what sort of profit and emolument it was that lord Melville understood Mr. Trotter to derive from the removal of the money. I refer your lordships to the evidence of Mr. Whitbread upon this subject, which your lordships will find in page 105 to 108, wherein a variety of questions were put to Mr. Whitbread upon this subject, for the purpose of drawing an explanation of the sort of profit that lord Melville ever supposed Mr. Trotter to derive. I will not fatigue your lordships with going through all the series of questions and answers, but your lordships will find them ultimately terminating in this question and answer; "whether upon recollecting yourself upon this subject, you mean to state that the noble defendant admitted that he knew, or permitted any emolument to be derived to Mr. Trotter, from the public money, save and except what resulted from its deposit at a private banker's, for official convenience?" "The noble defendant stated, that he had allowed the money to be placed at a private banker's for official convenience, and when there he had allowed or permitted, or not prevented Mr. Trotter from making a private emolument of it, and that emolument arising from the interest he was to make of it from Mr. Coutts's." And on the next question being asked, "Whether the noble defendant admitted his consent or knowledge of any other benefit to Mr. Trotter from it?" He says, "The noble lord never said he had restricted Mr. Trotter from making advantage in any way, to the best of my recollection and belief." "The question is not whether he restricted him, but whether he said he knew of his having any other advantage; excepting the advantage before stated." "He did not say he even knew it, but only supposed it; he did not admit that he knew of any other.*"

Now, my lords, I submit that taking this explanation of the declaration of lord Melville, coupled with the evidence of Mr. Trotter, the result is fairly this, that the permission to deposit money at Coutts's, was given at the instance and by the advice of the paymaster in the regular course of official duty; that it was expressly confined to naval services, and that it was given bona fide for the purpose of carrying on the public service; thoroughly persuaded, as lord Melville in his examination swears he was (which examination your lordships must take altogether) that it would facilitate the public convenience, that the money should be lodged at Coutts's bank, to be distributed in the mode proposed. Mr. Trotter confirms lord Melville in all this statement. As to Mr. Trotter's profit, the meaning of lord Melville as he explained it, and as is evident from the context is this, lord Melville never meant that Mr. Trotter's profit was the object or purpose for which the money was removed to Coutts's bank; but being there, lord Melville imagined that from the deposit Mr. Trotter might derive a profit, agreeably to what has been proved to be the course of the Banks in Scotland, to allow a small per-centage upon deposits left at those banks, while they continue there. Mr. Trotter had a brother in Mr. Coutts's house, and lord Melville supposed that from money being there deposited, to be ready for the public service, for the honest purpose that I have stated, Mr. Trotter might derive a benefit similar to that allowed in Scotland. Now, I beg leave to ask, whether if this had been the true state of the case, there would have been any thing criminal, any thing contrary to law, any thing corrupt or improper in the conduct of lord Melville? I submit to your lordships there is not; recollecting always that I certainly do not mean to contend, as the honourable and learned manager supposed, that the form of the draft legalizes the draft, that drawing nominally for money for the current service, but really and intentionally drawing alio intuitu for purposes of private profit, would not be an evasion of the act; undoubtedly, I contend for no such proposition; the form of the draft cannot alter the case, or give legality to the act, if in substance the money was drawn for a private purpose. But I deny that either in form or in substance lord Melville ever authorised Mr. Trotter to draw upon the Bank, for any but a legal honest purpose, for public naval services; his written authority so speaks, his verbal authority so speaks, the evidence of Mr. Trotter so speaks, his own evidence speaks the same, all the evidence proves the same, and there is not the smallest tittle of evidence to the contrary. Mr. Trotter has been examined over and over again; he positively swears that at no one period did lord Melville ever authorise him to draw for money from the Bank, for any other purpose than the public service of the kingdom; that he never knew that he did so, and that lord Melville never was acquainted with any one of the illicit and improper uses to which, under a legal and proper authority, he (Mr. Trotter) contrary to his duty, without the knowledge of lord Melville, applied it.

My lords, I beg leave to refer your lordships to a passage in the evidence omitted before, [which was stated by the honourable and learned manager, and which affords additional proof that the guilty use Mr. Trotter made of the public money, was not by virtue of the parol permission, but the written authority. The honourable and learned manager stated, that it appears by the evidence, that at one time a balance of 209,000*l.* was transferred from the Bank, of which only 47,000*l.* was at Mr. Coutts's; all the difference therefore between 47,000*l.* and 209,000*l.* was money not at Coutts's; that in February, when there was not one shilling in Coutts's bank, and Mr. Trotter was their debtor, the outstanding balance used by Mr. Trotter, and which he had drawn from the Bank direct, under the general written authority, was 216,000*l*. It is therefore quite clear that it was under the power of attorney Mr. Trotter principally acted, in the illicit use of the public money—that power with which every paymaster always had been, and still is armed. If it be too great and dangerous a power, that may be a proper subject of future regulation; but in giving that power lord Melville acted only according to the established course of the office, and Mr. Trotter's misconduct consisted in the abuse of it.

My lords, upon this head, of the permission given to draw money from the Bank, I hope I have relieved the conduct of lord Melville from all idea of corruption, and have shown that lord Melville had no intention that the money should go out of Coutts's bank, for any other than naval services; that his idea was, whatever benefit was to be derived by Trotter from it was the direct contrary of what Trotter in fact received, namely, that it was to be the result of the money lying dead in Coutts's bank, and only a premium to be given for its temporary deposit, and that it was to be drawn from thence for the public service, as occasion required. It is to be remembered, that the paymaster was no way restricted by any act of parliament, warrant, patent, or in any way whatever, from deriving such a benefit. If, consistently with the public interest, nay, if in a mode that facilitated and advanced the public interest, a casual, contingent, and collateral benefit, not operating to influence the removal of the money, but resulting from it in the course of an honest, legal, proper, convenient exercise of official duty, if I say there did result such a profit to a deserving officer, who was not restricted from receiving it, and who was very inadequately paid for the laborious and responsible situation he filled—I submit to your lordships, that to allow of such a benefit which is the utmost extent of imputation on this subject, resulting from all the evidence before your lordships, is not only stripped of all criminality, of all corruption, but likewise of every thing that can fasten any species of misconduct on lord Melville.

I shall conclude with observing, that if to allow of such a benefit could be deemed criminal, it could not affect the present question, because this is not the charge against lord Melville. He is charged with having been privy to, and approving of and participating in Mr. Trotter's use of the public money, which the examination of lord Melville not only does not prove, but establishes the most decisive negative to, as it shows lord Melville never to have been acquainted with the real uses made by Mr. Trotter, but to have supposed a profit, which it is proved he never made.

My lords, the transactions next relied upon in proof of corruption are the purchases of stock; of India stock, 13 or 14,500*l*. of the Loyalty, of 2,000*l*. India, and of 7,000*l*. three per Cents reduced.

I take, first, with your lordships' permission, the purchase of the larger sum of India stock, which was first brought forward by the honourable and learned manager. This was a transaction which took place, I mean the purchases were made, in 1789, 1790, and 1793; and this is now selected as the most prominent, the largest in amount, and the principal proof, upon which corruption is to be fastened on lord Melville. My lords, I will examine this transaction as it now stands, upon the prosecutor's own evidence, and I trust it will appear to your lordships' satisfaction, not only that there is not in this transaction the smallest appearance of corruption, but that it affords the most pregnant and decisive proof, that lord Melville was not the man he has been described to be; and that the charge imputed to him of a systematic plan of corruption with Mr. Trotter is wholly destitute of foundation.

The account of this transaction was opened distinctly by the honourable manager in the commencement of this proceeding, precisely in the same terms as Mr. Trotter afterwards proved it; at the same time that the honourable manager stated that your lordships were to believe every word that Mr. Trotter said, he was apprised of the account intended to be given of it, because he stated it in the terms in which the witness afterwards related it upon oath, in every part precisely tallying with the opening: save and except one expression which I unfortunately caught from the speech of the honourable manager, and which it was observed by the honourable and learned manager that I had slipped into the cross-examination of Mr. Trotter; I mean the expression "indignant rejection."—That which it was supposed I had put into the mouth of the witness, was in truth put into my mouth first by the honourable manager who opened the charge.

The account given by this witness of the transaction, your lordships will find in page 122 of the printed evidence in his examination in chief. The account is this: "I will state the transaction as far as my memory will carry me, which was in consequence of a conversation I had with his lordship, in which he stated his opinion of the value of East India stock, from the probable rise that would take place ultimately in that stock; and I observed to his lordship, that if he was impressed with so good an opinion of that stock, that I thought, in consideration of his own interest, he ought to invest a sum of money in that stock. His lordship's observations seemed to throw it aside, by saying that he had no money to invest in stock. I had mentioned to his lordship, that there were considerable balances lying at all times in my hands that were not called for, and in all probability would not be called for, from circumstances that I need not perhaps relate at this time; but it was money lying unclaimed in my hands, which it would not be necessary to advance to the public until it was claimed, and there was no prospect of that claim taking place soon; and I advised his lordship to give me leave to lay out so much of that money as would buy about 13,000*l.* or 14,000*l.* East India stock, but which his lordship refused in the most pointed and decided manner, inasmuch that I was afraid I had incurred his lordship's displeasure by proposing it: But it occurred to me at the same moment, that it would be possible to borrow a sum of money upon the security of that stock, and I proposed to his lordship that I should endeavour to do so, and that I should lay out that money in the purchase of East India stock, to which his lordship readily assented. I mentioned that I then lived with a relation of my own, who was a man of considerable importance in the city, and that he would be enabled to raise the sum of money for me. In short, I made it an easy matter to his lordship. But when I applied to Mr. Lind, the gentleman to whom I alluded, I found that I was deceived, and that it was not an easy matter to raise money upon that security; but I was unwilling to disappoint his lordship in what I had so sanguinely told him I could effect, and I never acquainted his lordship with the difficulty that had arisen; but I assisted Mr. Lind by advancing money from the public money, which I had the management of. I never had occasion afterwards to mention the circumstance to lord Melville until April in the last year, and he was perfectly unacquainted with my having made use of the public money in that transaction; and I charged his lordship a regular interest for the whole of the money which I advanced in that transaction, from the first day it was advanced until the final settlement of our accounts." Then he is asked:—

"Did lord Melville never inquire the name of the lender of that money?"—"I do not recollect that his lordship ever did. I had stated in such positive turns that Mr. Lind could do it, that I never found it necessary to mention the circumstance again to lord Melville, but took it for granted that he had thought I had concluded the transaction in the manner that I had supposed it could be effected."* My lords, this is the narrative given by their own witnesses of this transaction in detail as it passed.

Now, my lords, I beg to ask, am I to take this to be a real transaction or a fictitious one? that is to say, was all this color, pretext, sham? Or does this narrative represent the transaction such as it really was? Which was it? If you say it is sham, it is pretence; your own witness is a perjured man, and yet you have said, we are to believe every word he says, opening this evidence in detail exactly as he has proved it. I think, therefore, it will not be denied, that I am to take this transaction to be a real one, to be as described by the prosecutors' own witness precisely in the terms he has used. Now, taking it to be so, I ask your lordships—and entreat for a few moments your lordships attention—if this transaction does not furnish the most decisive negative to the charge of corruption, the most decisive negative to the charge of privity, which is made against the defendant, and connivance in the use, by Mr. Trotter, of the public money, that ever was afforded to any charge in any court of justice in the world? And this from a witness adduced by the prosecutor, under all the circumstances I have before stated.

My lords, in the first place, when does this transaction take place? In 1789, three years after the systematic plan of corruption had been going on between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter; during all which time lord Melville had been authorizing him, according to the averment of his accuser, for three years together, to make an unlimited use of the public money for their mutual benefit. Then, how do we account for this commencement of the business, that this Mr. Trotter, in a private conversation between him and lord Melville alone, where there was no necessity to put on appearances—no third person hearing what was passing—these two partners in iniquity, two persons who were daily going on in corrupt dealings with the public money, and had been going on so for three years together,—how do you account for this conversation? He begins talking upon the subject of East India stock; lord Melville upon this occasion, as he had uniformly in public in his place in parliament, and to every body in private, had announced his sanguine opinion of the future rise of India stock, and the growing prosperity of India affairs, in which his lordship, perhaps too sanguinely, expressed an opinion (he will allow me to say), that in process of time India would administer relief to England, instead of requiring it from England. An observation has been made upon the impropriety of this private opinion, delivered, it was said, by the president of the board of control, as if he had been taking advantage of some secret intelligence derived from that character to assist a speculation in India stock. On the contrary, it appears to have been nothing but what he had repeatedly and publicly declared in his place in parliament, and to all the world;—an opinion of the growing prosperity of the company's affairs, not a temporary, accidental, or immediate rise, but that which was expected to take place in future time from the future prosperity of the company. Upon his expressing this opinion, with whom originates the idea of purchasing stock? Mr. Trotter was asked this repeatedly: he answers, "I observed to his lordship, that if he was impressed with so good an opinion of that stock, that I thought in consideration of his own interest he ought to invest a sum of money in that stock."

Now, my lords, mark what is the first answer given by this corrupt treasurer, who has the command of the public money, 100,000*l.* balance then lying as is proved at the Bank, and under his own control and management, for which he had only to intimate a wish to become immediately possessed of the whole. He is supposed to have been at this time familiarized by habit, by inclination, by three years' practice, to the course of drawing upon that fund to administer to his own interest. What is the answer given?—an answer too in private, to that very person the agent, who had been the manager of all this corruption for three years together. What is his answer? "Go and take that money from the Bank—take it as you have done for three years together, and lay it out for me; there is the fund?" My lords, should we not have expected that to have been his answer? Instead of which we find his lordship's observation seemed to throw it aside, by saying that he had no money to invest in this stock. No money to invest in it!—Why did not his agent exclaim, "Why, my lord, what is the matter now? For three years together you have never had any of these doubts. Here is the fund you have been always using.—You have no money? Why here is 100,000*l.* of money you may have whenever you please. How can you have forgotten yourself so much, as to suppose there is not money enough at the Bank?" Yet, some how or other, even when it is suggested to him, the noble defendant had forgotten all he had been doing for three years, and that, too, with the very person with whom he had been conducting all this business. Mr. Trotter proceeds: "I had mentioned to his lordship that there were considerable balances lying at all times in my hands that were not called for, and in all probability would not be called for, from circumstances that I need not perhaps relate at this time; but it was money lying unclaimed in my hands, which it would not be necessary to advance to the public until it was claimed, and there was no prospect of that claim taking place soon." You mentioned to him—what is that new information to him? You mentioned to him—why, he knew it three years before—what are you mentioning to him? By way of novel information, you tell him what he had been acting upon for three years together; this you tell him as a secret in private. He next says, "I advised his lordship to give me leave to lay out so much of that money as would buy about 13,000*l.* or 14,000*l.* East India stock." You advised him to give you leave—why, you were one of the partners—why did you not go on as usual and do it?—what leave was necessary? It had already been given over and over, under the general power and authority you had three years before—what did you want a new leave for? But what is his lordship's answer to this? Oh, to be sure, go on as before, we have been jointly making good use of the public money month after month, balance after balance—go on as you have done, to be sure—buy me, without delay, this stock? What, my lords, is the answer given by his lordship?—"but which his lordship refused in the most pointed and decided manner, inasmuch that I was afraid I had incurred his lordship's displeasure by proposing it."

Now, my lords, how is this reconcilable to the theory on which the impeachment is built? Why reject it? Why in this instance reject it? The first time a suggestion is brought forward, of that which he is all along supposed to have countenanced, adopted, and encouraged, for three years together, how does it happen that in this very instance—the first suggestion proved to have been made to him—he refused it in the most pointed and decided manner? still further this paymaster, this partner and accomplice in all his criminality and corruption, and who had (as is supposed) with his authority, from time to time, laid out thousands and thousands of the public money in every kind of speculation for their mutual benefit, says, I was afraid I had incurred his lordship's displeasure by proposing it. Why his displeasure? How is that to be reconciled with a constant previous privity and approbation of the very thing proposed? Why was displeasure to be incurred by what he was always encouraging, approving, and commanding? How is this to be reconciled with the charges in the impeachment? But what is next proposed? why, this same Mr. Trotter, knowing perfectly well (not a stranger who was not privy to) all that had preceded for three years, this same agent, proposes a substitute—in private with lord Melville alone—proposes to borrow money from a private individual to supply the treasurer of the navy, who had 100,000*l.* lying at command, over which, according to his usual course of business, he had the full control and power; why, should he on this occasion borrow money of a private individual? And yet this, Mr. Trotter says, he proposed and lord Melville acceded to. I mentioned that I had a relation, and so on; in short, I made it an easy matter to him. Then he describes his application to Mr. Lind, and the measures finally taken for raising the money.

My lords, opposed to this account given upon oath, by the prosecutors' own witness, what is the course taken by the honourable and learned manager who sums it up? His summing up of his own evidence, is an attempt to contradict it throughout. He adduces very ingenious observations upon the improbability of the transaction, as proved by Mr. Trotter. He states it to be a transaction, that he says, nobody above the degree of an idiot would have been engaged in; that upon the face of it, it is one, that could not possibly have gone down with any body; and he compares it to the case of a person offering a bribe to a judge, and afterwards, dropping the condition, and presenting the money. These are very ingenious observations, but, unfortunately directly in the teeth of the testimony upon oath of his own witness. We have the observation of an honourable and learned manager, who speaks, it is true, with great authority, but not upon oath, opposed to the positive testimony of his own witness, who the other manager in opening the case, told us was to be believed in every word he says. What a singular contradiction is there here between the two honourable managers! the one, who opens the case, tells you to believe every word of this witness's narration, the other sums up and makes observations to induce your lordships not to believe one word of it. For if it be as the honourable and learned manager supposes, all sham, contrivance, and pretence, then the whole account given by Mr. Trotter is false; then we are not to believe a word that he says. Now which of the two managers am I to believe? The one who tells me I am to believe every word, or the one who tells me I am not to believe one word spoken by this witness? And yet in this dilemma are your lordships placed. Such is the state of the transaction selected as the first instance of lord Melville's corrupt confederacy with Mr. Trotter, upon which your lordships are to ground your judgment of condemnation against all probability, against all the surrounding circumstances which have been stated, presenting a general negative to the charge. Your lordships are besides to decide in favour of the accusation against the positive evidence of their own witness, the only witness, we have been told, who knows any thing upon the subject, disproving in toto every syllable and every suggestion in it. Your lordships are to lay all aside merely upon the suggestions, the theoretical and ingenious arguments of the honourable and learned manager.

But, my lords, it does not stop there. And now I beg leave, my lords, to adopt the expression of the honourable and learned manager, and to ask whether any person above the degree of an idiot would have done, what, according to the evidence, lord Melville is stated to have done in this transaction, supposing it one of the corrupt nature it is charged to have been.

My lords, I could have wished very much that the honourable and learned manager would have stated what his hypothesis is concerning it. We have heard the account given by the witness; what is your belief about it? Do you believe that money was lent to lord Melville to the amount of 23,000*l.* to enable him to purchase the stock? Your witness has sworn it. Do you believe it? Do you believe that, after it was lent, interest upon it was paid to the amount of 1,150*l.* a year from the first advancement of the money down to the termination of the settlement in the year 1800? Do you believe that? Your own witness has sworn it, and proved that the interest was regularly debited to lord Melville as upon a private loan, and that lord Melville from year to year paid out of his own private pocket 1,150*l.* interest for the loan of this money. Do you believe that 3,000*l.* of the capital of 23,000*l.* originally lent was repaid by lord Melville? Your witness has sworn that of the 23,000*l.*, 3,000*l.* was repaid upon the loan, and 1,150*l.* annually paid for the interest of this advance, viz. 1,000*l.* a year after the payment of the 3,000*l.*, and 1,150*l.* before. In the account, which was given in evidence, containing the summary of supposed profit, calculated by the solicitor for the prosecution, in which he charges the defendant with 22,000*l.* profit on this transaction, credit is given to lord Melville for money paid to Mr. Trotter for interest due to Mr. Lind, the supposed lender of the money. The total of interest paid by lord Melville on this loan, according to the testimony given by Mr. Trotter, amounts to 11,500*l.*, besides the 3,000*l.* capital, making together 14,500*l.*, the sum lord Melville paid out of his own pocket at least upon the supposed reality of this transaction.

Now, I beg leave to ask any body, whether, if lord Melville was the corrupt man stated, and had been in this instance borrowing his own money, that is the public money over which he had the command, would any man above the degree of an idiot have paid 14,500*l.* out of his own pocket upon a contrary supposition? Nay, my lords, it does not stop there, for, at a subsequent period, lord Melville actually repaid the whole capital to, as he supposed, the person who had originally lent the money to him. It is positively sworn by Mr. Trotter that he never disclosed to lord Melville that Mr. Lind was not the lender of the money, till after the publication of the tenth report; and that in the year 1800, when lord Melville settled the concern, he actually repaid 20,000*l.* of the capital, in addition to the 14,500*l.* before stated; that is to say, 34,500*l.* has lord Melville paid upon the belief of the reality of this transaction, which your lordships are now desired to believe was all a fiction, all a sham, without the least evidence to warrant such a conjecture, and directly contrary to all the evidence given by the prosecutor himself upon the subject.

But, my lords, upon what theory—upon what principle is it that your lordships are to do away all this testimony, and in a criminal case? Upon the ground of a supposed improbability that lord Melville should have believed that money could be raised in the way proposed, viz. upon the security of the stock; and the honourable and learned manager stated that nobody above the degree of an idiot could have been imposed upon by such an account of the transaction; nay that a common advertizing money-lender would be laughed at and scouted for such a proposal; yet, says he, here is a noble person conversant with business all his life, represented to have been imposed upon, and made to believe and act upon such a transaction as this.

My lords, the noble defendant has given the best proof that he believed it to be true, by paying the money which could only be due upon that supposition. You may theorize and speculate as you please upon what he did, and what he did not believe; but that is a more solid proof of belief than any thing your ingenious arguments can adduce against the reality of the transaction. But what becomes of all this theory, that nobody but a driveller would have supposed it practicable to raise money in this way? Is Mark Sprot quite such a driveller? Is he upon money matters quite such an ignoramus? I think your lordships have had a sufficient specimen of the caution with which he looks into the securities upon which he advances his money. Now this improbable transaction happens unfortunately for the observation to be a transaction exactly of a similar nature to one in which Mark Sprot is proved to have engaged. It appears that in the year 1800 he lent money upon stock alone, without any bond or security of any kind whatever; in that very mode, in which we are told nobody above the degree of an idiot would have supposed money could be obtained; and this to the amount of 50,000*l*. Now what becomes of speculation, theory, and ingenious reasoning against fact? Here is accidentally produced an instance of a gentleman conversant in money transactions, who has done the very thing that you are to suppose no man living, above the degree of an idiot, would have done.

But, my lords, with respect to this transaction does the history of it fairly afford any proof in the world, except the proof with what extreme carelessness upon money matters lord Melville acted? This transaction is pursued to its final termination. Travelling through the account of the stock and in whose name it stood, a question was put how was lord Melville to have been able to have realized any claim upon the stock, supposing it ultimately should turn out to be a beneficial concern, inasmuch as it did not stand in his name, and he had no voucher or paper to show it to belong to him. Now what is the fair inference from that circumstance? Is it not a proof in what a negligent and careless manner lord Melville conducted his money concerns, and surrendered them to the care and management of Mr. Trotter? My lords, undoubtedly if lord Melville had turned his mind to this subject; if he had been employing the public money in the purchase of stock for himself, to be sure he would have taken care not to pay interest upon it; to be sure he would have taken care to see that the stock stood in his own name, in order that it might appear to be his; or, if it stood in some other name, he would have taken care to have procured from that other person a declaration of trust, acknowledging that it belonged to him, and not to that other person. lord Melville never inquired any more about it: "I never told him," says Mr. Trotter, "whose name it was in; it stood in Mr. Lind's name for a considerable time."

I would here again ask the honourable and learned manager what is his hypothesis on this subject? Do you believe lord Melville on this occasion sacrificed his duty and his honour for the sake of this stock; and then became so indifferent about it that he never inquired in whose name it stood; never looked after it at all? Is that the natural conduct which would have been observed upon your hypothesis? or is not more reconcileable with mine, who say lord Melville was a person totally withdrawn from all attention to money concerns; and in this instance has shown it by not having reserved to himself any power of following this stock, and making it his own, if it had happened that Mr. Trotter died, and his books were not forthcoming to prove the nature of the transaction? Undoubtedly lord Melville's name never appeared as the owner of any part of the stock, and his representatives could have had no means by which they could have substantiated his right to the stock, and shown it to be his own.

This transaction therefore, my lords, which is put in the front, which is brought forward as the largest in amount, and the most important instance of lord Melville's corruption—as the basis upon which your lordships are to build your judgments, and to pronounce the noble defendant a wicked and corrupt man,—stands now contradicted by the testimony of their own witness upon oath in all its parts; stands contradicted by the evidence resulting from the res gesta, and by the plainest and clearest proof. It is shown to be quite impossible, that three years after the commencement of this illicit traffic, had it existed, lord Melville should have held such a conversation with that very person with whom he is supposed to have been carrying on these corrupt practices at that time;—that he should consent to pay interest from year to year in 1789, 1790, 1793, and down to 1800, with the knowledge that it was the public money, and yet from year to year be treating it otherwise, and acting upon a contrary hypothesis. Surely, then, my lords, there must now be an end of suspicion hanging over the character of the noble defendant, when such a transaction is brought forward as the foundation of that suspicion; when we see such to be the effect of prejudice upon honourable minds, that they can be so blinded as to put this instance foremost as a proof of guilt, which, when fairly and correctly examined in all its parts, leads very impartial rational mind, attentively considering it, to a conclusion directly the reverse. If all the other instances were more disputable, if they were not open to the same decisive refutation, this one instance—I thank them for putting it forward—is worth a thousand, to fix at that time, and throughout the whole period covered by it, the negative of the charges against lord Melville; that during the whole of this time, lord Melville could not by possibility, consistent with the account which is proved of this transaction, have had any knowledge, belief, or suspicion, that the money employed in it was public money, or that public money could legally or properly be applied to such a purpose.

My lords, the next transaction relied upon, as proof of the charge is the loyalty stock. This was a transaction in the year 1797. Your lordships will, in the first place advert to that date, which is eleven years posterior to the commencement of this corrupt confederacy between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter. Your lordships will also remember, that Mr. Trotter has proved upon his cross-examination (which I think the honourable and learned manager was pleased to state, had been conducted in so popular a manner) that the proposition he made in the year 1789, to lord Melville, for the purchase of East India stock out of the public money, which I have last discussed, was the only instance, in which he had ever made such a proposition to lord Melville. He was asked, was it then the only instance in your life, in which you ever proposed to lord Melville, to lay out the public money in the purchase of stock? this instance in which he rejected it (as you have stated) in the most pointed and decisive manner? and wherein for having made it, you feared you had incurred his lordship's displeasure? In answer to that, he positively swears it was; and yet your lordships are desired to say, that he uniformly throughout a period of fourteen years authorized Mr. Trotter to lay out the public money in the public stocks and on private security, and that the present is another instance of his having done so.

In the year 1797, your lordships will all remember,—it is matter of public notoriety,—what was the state of the public affairs. Your lordships will all remember, that it was a period perhaps of the greatest depression, that ever took place in this country: the public stocks were I think as low as forty-seven: there was a mutiny at the Nore, in the navy; the Bank had stopped their usual payments: it was a period when it was considered to be proper for public men to come forward, and assist the public credit in every possible mode that could raise the sinking and depressed spirits of the nation.

Will your lordships permit me to ask, whether this was a period, which a person desirous of enriching himself by purchase of stock, should have selected as the one most favourable for such a plan? one too who was in a situation to be most cognizant of the state of affairs? Eleven years had passed in which lord Melville never once had purchased stock, with the public money, in any of the periods most favourable to speculation, yet he is now supposed to have commenced his stock-jobbing at this period. How favourably with a view to any pecuniary benefit to result from it, your lordships are told by the evidence, by which it appears that this stock, after it was purchased, fell as it was clearly foreseen would be the result, from ninety to seventy two, and was at a discount of eighteen per cent. This is but a very bad beginning of stock-jobbing speculations; you have managed badly to have been eleven years, and not to do better than this. Here is your first purchase, and eighteen per cent. loss upon it.

But, my lords, can we suggest no motive that should have induced a public man, at this time, to offer his name as a subscriber, to the amount of 10,000*l.* to the Loyalty loan, without having any pecuniary object in view? I need not resort to proof, for what is matter of perfect notoriety, that that illustrious statesman William Pitt, deceased, who has been so frequently alluded to, did, at the same moment, subscribe the same sum of 10,000*l.*—one certainly who was not very largely furnished with the means of possessing himself of funds to that amount. In truth your lordships in looking over a list of those who subscribed at that time, will perceive that public men in great situations, as well those who could conveniently raise the money, as those who could not, did, as was expected of them, come forward to aid the public credit with their names and subscriptions. Can any body doubt that this was the sole origin and motive for lord Melville's subscription? that it was not with the view to any benefit, but with the same view with which others in similar situations came forward, at a considerable loss to themselves?

Mr. Trotter has proved that in the origin of this transaction, it was not an act of his; that he gave no directions for, nor had any concern in the purchase of the stock, that he had even no knowledge of the purchase; so that this instance,—the solitary one, in which lord Melville is supposed to have made use of the public money to purchase stock,—is an instance to which the stock is clearly purchased without any communication with Mr. Trotter, who was the necessary agent to furnish the public money, if it had been intended to resort to that fund, and with whom all these corrupt dealings are charged to have been carried on. Does not this negative the charge? Does not this separate this transaction from the course of dealing between Mr. Trotter and lord Melville, and show that it was not of the corrupt nature supposed? It originated in another quarter, and the history belonging to it evidently refers it to another motive and another origin.

My lords, the stock being bought, and the first instalment paid, the course observed at that time by those who wished for a time to give currency and credit to this subscription, was to sell out their stock. The first instalment of lord Melville's subscription was paid, but the depression of the stock, to the amount I have stated of eighteen per cent, together with the inattention of lord Melville to the subject prevented the immediate sale of the stock. Hence arose a necessity of paying instalments from time to time, during the year of 1797, as they became due.

Mr. Trotter has sworn, that without the knowledge of lord Melville, without the least communication to him, he advanced these instalments from time to time, as they became due. It is quite clear therefore that in its origin and progress, as far as I have stated, this purchase had nothing belonging to it, that has the least appearance of a corrupt transaction.

My lords, there is one piece of evidence before your lordships, which appears to me decisively to strip this case of every suspicion that might belong to it, of its being a corrupt transaction. My lords, it is proved that the last payment made upon the loyalty stock, was upon the 27th of September, 1797. Now, my lords, was it intended on the part of lord Melville, to continue to hold this stock for his private benefit, to make a profit and emolument of it?

My lords, by a document which is in evidence, but which happens just now to be mislaid, dated the 28th of September, the very day after the last payment, lord Melville authorized his banker, Mr. Coutts, to dispose of this loyalty stock entirely, to sell out the whole immediately, together with other stock for the purpose of repaying Mr. Trotter the whole of the money advanced upon it. The instrument that I allude to is this: it is dated Somerset-place, the 28th of September, 1797, and addressed to Messieurs Thomas Coutts, and company.

"Messieurs Thomas Coutts, and company,

"I have executed powers of attorney in your favour, to enable you to receive the dividends, and likewise for the sale of consolidated 3 per cents., reduced 3 per cents., and 5 per cents. 1797, standing in my name at the Bank; also for my India stock. And I desire that the dividends you will from time to time receive on these funds may be placed to the credit of Alexander Trotter, esquire's account; and that you will take any directions he may at any time give respecting the sale of all or any part of these stocks, and apply the produce in any manner he may direct: for which this is your authority."

Now the coincidence of the date following immediately the last payment is surely satisfactory to show that lord Melville considered this to be a private debt of his own, due to Mr. Trotter; that he supplied Mr. Trotter with the means of indemnifying himself for the whole amount of whatever had been advanced on this account.

My lords, I do not mean to omit noticing that these advances are stated by Mr. Trotter to have been carried to the Chest account, which was brought to and signed by lord Melville, and in which he is debited to the public for the amount of them; from whence an inference has been drawn that lord Melville had knowledge that that public money had been furnished for the purpose of this stock. Now, my lords, I do not mean to say that lord Melville's signature to the account is not a circumstance in the case which fairly, to a certain degree, operates against us; but I submit to your lordships, it is capable of explanation, and that upon a candid consideration of all the circumstances, no inference will arise unfavourable to the honour and integrity of the noble defendant. The chest account has been erroneously supposed to be a public account. It was not so. It was merely a private account, under a particular denomination, but no more a public account than the account current was, only that it had a different title.

Where the weight of evidence is so strong against corruption, and against any intentional use of the public money by lord Melville; your lordships I am persuaded, will not suffer small circumstances to weigh on the other side; especially, if they are such as may be reconciled to a contrary hypothesis. There is no proof whatever before your lordships, that the items of that chest account, I mean the items in question, were ever read or observed by lord Melville, that they were ever pointed out to lord Melville, that any thing ever happened to call his notice or attention to any one of them. On the contrary, Mr. Trotter says, that lord Melville never could be brought to attend at all to his private affairs, though the contrary was the case with respect to such as were public; that he constantly signed the accounts brought to him, immediately, without examination; that he (Trotter) never did in his lordships presence, point out or call his attention to any one item contained in this account. And is it too much to expect of your lordships to believe that at a period like that of the year 1797, a public man, unpractised in accounts, and totally averse to them, with his mind occupied as it then was, in parliament and out of parliament, with the various important duties that belonged to the stations he then filled—considering too the entire confidence he reposed in Mr. Trotter personally—should have signed this account without reading the items, and should have never afterwards adverted to the account, as the fact unquestionably was, or have ever looked at an item of it? Lord Melville never could have been brought to believe that any man,—and least of all, one in whom he had so much confidence, would have done an act so contrary to the proper duty of an agent, as, after having advanced the money on his private account, and after he was possessed of private funds from lord Melville to the full amount, to cover him by way of security for the repayment of that money, to transfer these advances to the chest account, for the sole purpose of his own security, not only without any authority from lord Melville, but contrary to the strong and decided disapprobation previously expressed by his lordship on the only occasion in which such an use of the public money had ever been proposed to him. I submit to your lordships that the whole history of the business is incompatible with original corruption, and that the progress of it is equally so; that lord Melville, after the provision made for the sale of the stock, and the repayment of all advances on account of it, had dismissed it from his mind, without ever adverting afterwards to the subject; as your lordships remember was proved to be the case with the India stock last considered, which, though unquestionably proved to have been purchased for himself, lord Melville never made any inquiries after. He never believed, or suspected, that any money supplied for the purchase, had ever come from the public purse; there is no direct proof that he ever did know it, notwithstanding the inference derived from the signature to the chest account. I submit that the weight of evidence on the other side, and the circumstances before mentioned are abundantly sufficient to induce every candid mind to believe it infinitely more probable, that the signature and the unsettled state of this business, till the final settlement in 1800, arose from that inattention and negligence which so peculiarly characterized lord Melville's conduct, in respect to all his pecuniary affairs, rather than to a mercenary or corrupt intention, which was so repugnant to his known character at all times, and so unlikely to have prevailed at this particular period.

Surely, my lords, it is not to be believed that lord Melville would, in this instance alone, have availed himself of the public money, which he rejected in every other; that he would in this instance alone have transgressed his duty, for the sake of profit, to which it was so little favourable; that he should sacrifice all his honour, character, and credit, in this one instance, and yield to a temptation, which in no other had ever in any part of his life appeared to have the least influence over him.

My lords, the next item of charge requires a much shorter consideration. It respects a small sum of 2,000*l.*, East India stock, relative to which the evidence given on the part of the prosecution by Mr. Trotter has proved only, that he had no recollection whatever of the nature of the transaction; that he bought the stock for lord Melville at the time stated, is perfectly true, but that this sum was bought with public money, with the knowledge of the defendant, or in consequence of any directions that he gave, or that there were not ample means supplied by lord Melville's private income for this purchase, there is not adduced the smallest tittle of evidence to prove; and therefore I shall not weary your lordships with travelling particularly through the evidence that respects this small item; more especially as I presume your lordships will rather be disposed to advert to the larger and more important articles, in order to determine the guilt or innocence of the noble defendant.

With respect to the items of remittances to the houses in Scotland, of 2,000*l.* at one time; 1,000*l.* at another, and 3,000*l.* at another, I forbear to trouble your lordships with any observations. The witness examined respecting them has declared, that he has no distinct recollection as to the manner of these remittances, or the sources from which they were made: he says they constituted a part of his account current at a time when he was receiving and paying large sums for lord Melville. And I am sure your lordships will never, in the absence of all proof upon the subject, presume guilt, and take for granted that they were remittances furnished out of the public money, by the direction of lord Melville, and not from any of the legitimate sources of lord Melville's private fortune. I would only just refer your lordships to page 133 of the printed evidence, where upon the subject of these remittances, Mr. Trotter was asked, "Have you any reason to doubt but that the payments made upon that subject, were repaid out of the private funds of lord Melville?" The answer is, "I have no reason to doubt it, as there were frequent payments subsequent to that, and they went in reduction of the general account in which those sums were included."* Then in the absence of all proof, on the part of the prosecution, that these remittances were made from corrupt sources, the charge must have fallen to the ground from the total negative of evidence to support it;—but it does not rest here, for the prosecutor's own witness upon cross-examination, has expressly disproved it, by stating that he verily believed the supplies for the remittances to have come from the private and legitimate sources of income belonging to lord Melville.

There was another transaction given in evidence, but not relied upon by the honourable and learned manager, I mean the loan of 4,000*l.*, upon bond without interest, by Mr. Trotter to lord Melville; I did not observe that this was stated to constitute an item of charge against us, by the honourable and learned manager, who summed up the case with so much particularity, for the declared purpose of drawing our attention to what we were to address the defence. Neither is it included in the account in which they charge us with the total of illicit profits. It would be enough to say of this transaction, that it cannot possibly be stated higher than a private loan, from one individual to another, and a private security given to cover it. The circumstance of the bond being without interest, the witness says, he never mentioned to lord Melville. It was a temporary accommodation, and repaid out of the account current in a short space of time. The sources from which Mr. Trotter was enabled to supply that loan, he has fairly stated to be a fund to the use of which the paymaster was always by the course of office considered as entitled, viz. the money in his hands for the payment of exchequer fees, which has always constituted a separate fund distinct from that issued for navy services. There is therefore nothing in this transaction of corruption, on the part of the defendant, of misuse of public money, or any criminality whatever. It is a fair loan by one individual to another, of money which there was nothing to prevent being lent to any body. A private security was given for it, and the money was repaid in a short space of time out of the account current.

My lords, the only remaining article upon this subject of money transactions is the 7,000*l.* 3 per cents reduced, respecting which the evidence was extremely short; and I shall have occasion to trouble your lordships but a very few moments. The fact of the purchase of this stock by Mr. Trotter was proved on the part of the prosecution, in Mr. Trotter's examination in chief; and nothing more respecting it.

Now, my lords, in Mr. Trotter's cross-examination, the sole object on this, as on other subjects, was to supply by another question what was left short in the examination in chief. In the examination in chief the honourable managers procure a statement of one part of the transaction, in the cross-examination we obtained a statement of the remainder. This is all the merit of that popular cross-examination; but, my lords, very apt it is to produce a popular effect, when the whole of the fact comes out, and when it tends to disprove the inference that might have been drawn from a partial statement. My lords, the fact of the purchase was proved on the part of the prosecution; but your lordships will have the goodness to advert to page 131 of the printed evidence, in which the whole transaction is stated. Mr. Trotter is asked, "You stated that you directed stock, to the amount of 7,000*l.* 3 per cents to be purchased for lord Melville, was that purchase made by any direction from lord Melville; he answers, "It was made without any directions from his lordship." So much with respect to the purchase of this stock. Now for the means: "How came that purchase to be made without any direction from lord Melville?" "I made it in the general management of lord Melville's affairs; I believe a sum of money had come into my hand at that time for his lordship, and I thought it was proper to invest it in some manner to produce an interest to his lordship." "Am I to understand that funds had come into your hands, which before that time had been carrying a productive interest to lord Melville?" "I believe they had, either previously or a few days afterwards; one of the payments was, I think, upon a bill which might not have been due upon the very day I made the purchase, but I believe the bill had come into my hands previous to my making the purchase."* Now, here, my lords, is the simple account of this supposed corrupt transaction, related in part only in the examination in chief, but the whole disclosed in the cross-examination, and every possible suspicion completely negatived. The 4,000*l.* belonging to lord Melville Mr. Trotter had received, which carried an interest before in a productive fund, and this coming into his hands, as the manager of lord Melville's concerns, he thought it but due to him, but without his knowledge, to lay out that same sum of money (lord Melville's own money) in the purchase of 3 per cent reduced stock. How does this, in any respect, prove what is charged, that this was an instance of lord Melville's purchasing stock with the public money? It is unnecessary to observe how completely this imputation is falsified.

My lords, I have now travelled through all the items that have been brought forward of personal corruption in money matters, one by one. If there had ever been any other, I am sure your lordships will believe you would have heard of it. It is quite impossible that any art could have eluded the industry that has been used against the defendant. After all the transactions that have been investigated—all the books of account at Coutts's, and every other banker's in Scotland and England—all the private correspondence with them for twenty-four years back—all the sources of information that for months and months have been sifted and examined,—had there been one solitary instance to be found of stock purchased, or of any money transactions of any kind, in any quarter of the kingdom, in which lord Melville was engaged, undoubtedly the industry, the laudable and proper industry exerted in the prosecution, would have discovered it and brought it before your lordships. Why, my lords, how then, on these grounds, can any fair mind fasten upon the noble defendant the foul imputation of having been throughout a period of fourteen years, cognisant of and concurring in all the nefarious and corrupt transactions of Mr. Trotter? Your lordships are now to pronounce upon these articles, whether you have it proved before you, satisfactorily proved by clear, solid, and demonstrative evidence, that lord Melville from the beginning in 1786, to 1800, was the man he is represented to have been; and that in concurrence with Mr. Trotter, he connived at, authorized, and permitted the public money, to the amount of a hundred-and-twenty millions going through his hands, to be laid out from time to time for benefit, profit, and emolument.

It is decisive against the truth of this charge, that the prosecutor has not been able to adduce in support of it more than these few instances in all this long period—rari nantes in gurgite vasto—these few instances, in which it has been possible to attach any thing even of suspicion against the noble defendant; still more, when each of these appears to be capable of clear explanation when attentively examined, and to afford inferences directly the reverse. Your lordships would reluctantly give way to the belief, that a public man, of lord Melville's rank and character, would have been guilty of the turpitude and the folly of risking every thing in transactions of a corrupt and degrading nature; particularly when he appears at the same time to have discovered in other transactions, a fair, honourable, and generous mind, acting towards the public in a way directly the reverse of sordid corruption, in a voluntary surrender to the amount of between thirty and forty thousand pounds of regular and legitimate salary, which he might have received without the least imputation upon his character or his honour. Your lordships would reluctantly have believed the charge, had it been supported by any thing short of the clearest proof. Your lordships are now relieved, by finding that the charge is established by no proof whatever, but directly negated by the evidence adduced to support it.

I beg your lordships' pardon a thousand times for trespassing so long upon your attention; but there is one subject more which constituted the last topic urged against the defendant as a proof of corruption; I mean the release and the destruction of the books of account, the subject of the sixth article of impeachment.

And, my lords, this is urged against the noble defendant in two distinct ways: In the first place, as constituting of itself a high crime and misdemeanor; and, in the next, as furnishing evidence of guilt—of the corrupt conduct of the defendant upon the principles that raise the strongest suspicions against the conduct of any one, who is found to have fraudulently destroyed those papers or documents in his custody, which would have afforded the means of discovering what the nature of his conduct had been.

My lords, in one word I will dispose of the first part of the charge, viz. that which treats the destruction of the papers and books of account as a distinct crime and misdemeanor. I deny, if the fact had been true in the utmost extent in which it is stated,—if the papers and books had been destroyed by lord Melville, and destroyed for the purpose of preventing the discovery of his corrupt dealings,—that it would have become any crime whatever. I deny it to be any offence, known to the law of England, for any individual charged with a crime, to destroy the evidence in his own possession that might operate to his conviction. In the instance put by the honourable and learned manager, of clothes destroyed to conceal a murder; that destruction by the prisoner himself, unexplained, would undoubtedly operate in evidence against him upon his trial, provided enough was known respecting the state of the clothes; but the destruction taken substantively and by itself, would constitute no crime. The offence, therefore, in the present case, if there be any, must be upon the ground of the nature of the papers and books destroyed, viz. of their being public vouchers and accounts, which the public had a right to possess—documents of a public nature, which a public accountant could not legally destroy: That is the way, I presume, in which it is meant to be charged as a crime and misdemeanor.

VOL. XXIX.

In answer to which, I have only to state that this proceeds upon a mistake in fact. The books and vouchers destroyed were not papers of this description; the evidence proves they were not. All the vouchers—all the papers—all the books destroyed either by lord Melville or Mr. Trotter were wholly private and not public: the private documents relative to accounts between themselves, standing in the relation to each other of principal and agent. They belonged to men indeed who had filled public situations, but they do not therefore become public documents; otherwise all the private books of account, all the private letters and papers of every public man would therefore become the property of the public, or the public would have a right to the inspection of them. Such were the vouchers and papers, and such the books; they had nothing of the character of public documents belonging to them, much less so than Mr. Douglas's books, which your lordships rejected upon the very principle of their not being public documents, but merely private. There is not any one circumstance to show that there has been destroyed any one single document of the nature specified. In order to show that there had been, there should have been some evidence given to prove what the nature of the documents was. Your lordships cannot ascertain this by conjecture, or presume they were public documents, if there be no evidence to show it: And there is not a tittle of evidence to prove, that any one public document of any description was destroyed by either party, either by lord Melville or Mr. Trotter. In the absence of all proof, therefore, there must be a total end of this part of the charge.

It only remains to consider, how far this destruction of books and papers, and the release afford, any evidence of presumption of corruption against the noble defendant. I certainly cannot wonder, that so much stress should be laid upon this part of the case; considering, that when there had been a total failure of all positive evidence on the part of the prosecution; when, at the close of their case, the honourable managers found all the positive testimony to break from under them, and to prove directly the reverse of the charges; when all Mr. Trotter's evidence had totally disproved the imputation of corruption, and shown every act of this nature to have been exclusively his own, without any participation or knowledge on the part of lord Melville, then it is natural to have recourse to presumptions. Now, the utmost effect of presumptions in any case can avail nothing, if there be positive proof to the contrary. Presumptions can never be set up against positive evidence? What inference do the managers desire your lordships to draw from the destruction of these unknown papers? Are you to infer, for instance, from that destruction, that the 13,000*l.* East India stock was bought with the public money with the knowledge of lord Melville, when the positive proof given by the prosecutor has established the contrary? Are you to guess at the unknown contents of an unknown paper, because it is lost and destroyed? Can you form any presumption applicable to any particular part of the case? Or how is it to encounter the positive testimony of Mr. Trotter?

With respect to the instances mentioned to your lordships by the honourable and learned manager, in support of his doctrine of presumptions, they apply principally to civil cases. In a criminal case the rule of presumptions does not, I conceive, prevail to the extent stated by the honourable and learned manager. I should rather think a learned judge would be a little cautious in giving exactly such directions as were suggested in a capital case; that, solely from the fact of the destruction of the clothes, without any proof that those clothes were in the state they were suspected to be, however strong the evidence on other parts of the case might be, the judge would venture to state to the jury that they were at liberty to presume the clothes to have been bloody. If there was any proof that they were in that condition, their destruction might strengthen the evidence against the prisoner; but the destruction alone could not lead any tribunal to jump to so rash a conclusion. It is not, thank God, the custom to administer criminal justice in this country upon such principles. But what would be said with respect to these presumptions in such a case, if there came into the box a witness, produced by the prosecutor, who declared upon his oath that the prisoner at the bar was not the man who destroyed those clothes;—"I destroyed them for my own purpose—I destroyed them for reasons which have nothing to do with the guilt or innocence of the defendant—it was I that did it, and he has nothing to do with it:"—What would you say then to any presumption attempted to be drawn from such a circumstance? What would you say to such a presumption, if the destruction of the clothes was accounted for in a way consistent with perfect innocence? If it was proved that these were old worn-out clothes, which were no longer wanted, and that, antecedent to any imputation or charge against the prisoner, they had been, according to his ordinary and usual course, destroyed? What would you think of any inference then being drawn from the destruction of the clothes to the disadvantage of the prisoner? And yet this is the true nature of the case before your lordships. With respect to the destruction of these papers and vouchers, all this evidence of presumption, which is raised to the disadvantage of the noble defendant, and which is to fasten upon him all this infamy and guilt, rests principally upon a letter, which, with your lordships' permission, I will read, and you will then see what fair inference or presumption it affords of the corrupt conduct imputed to him.

My lords, it is a letter dated the 30th of June, 1804; it is in answer to a requisition from the commissioners of naval inquiry to lord Melville, desiring to be furnished with the results of various accounts during his treasurership—accounts of twenty years, I think, preceding the date of this letter.

"Gentlemen; I have received your requisition of date the 26th instant. It is impossible for me to furnish you with the account you ask. It is more than four years since I left the office of treasurer of the navy, and at the period of doing so, having accounted for every sum imprested into my hands, I transferred the whole existing balance to the account of my successor." Your lordships will have the goodness to advert to this; there was a transfer of all the public account to his successor; for by the act of parliament all the account of the treasurer going out of office is to be handed over to his successor immediately; his accounts are made up to that time, and every document is left in the office, and all his accounts terminate with the time of his quitting the office: "From that time I never considered any one paper or voucher that remained in my hands as of the smallest use to myself, or any other person; and, consequently, being often in the practice, since I retired to Scotland, of employing occasionally some time in assorting my papers, and destroying those that were useless, I am satisfied there does not exist any one material by which I could make up such an account as you specify." This is the part of the letter relied upon, to prove against lord Melville a corrupt, fraudulent, and wilful destruction of the papers—a natural statement of what I presume would be the conduct of any person, who had quitted a situation for more than four years, without the least idea or suspicion of any anterior account he should ever be called upon to give; who had settled all his accounts, as it is proved he did, in the year 1800, with his private agent, Mr. Trotter, and all his accounts with the public. Is there any thing to excite suspicion, that under such circumstances, he should naturally, fairly, and in the ordinary course of his usual habits, occupy his leisure in the country, in disburthening himself of papers which he did not see to be of any probable future use?

It is proved by evidence on the part of the prosecutor, given by Mr. Trotter, that it always had been the habit of lord Melville, from time to time, to destroy useless papers, long and long before any idea of any accusation being brought against him. I desire, therefore, to ask, whether under these circumstances any fair inference can be drawn to the disadvantage of lord Melville, or any belief that he was destroying those vouchers for any wicked or corrupt purpose?

My lords, with respect to the dilemma that the honourable and learned manager thought he had reduced us to, by asking whether the papers or vouchers had been destroyed before or posterior to the release in 1803; I cannot say that I feel the difficulty. Unquestionably it appears before your lordships, that the vouchers and papers in question were destroyed long before the release. It appears that they related to the subject of a private account between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, which was settled in 1800; and in consequence of that settlement, lord Melville (soon after going into Scotland) destroyed the vouchers and papers for which he had no longer any use. It appears by the release, and by the evidence given by Mr. Trotter respecting it, that these documents and papers had all upon that occasion been destroyed, and that the whole account prior to 1800 had been settled. This is the account which is spoken of in the release. The only account which is now unsettled is one that commenced in the year 1800, and has been continued since, and this the witness expressly proves to be an account in the possession of the honourable managers. I am not sure whether they have produced it. I do not recollect whether they have or not.—It was produced I understand, but it has not been put upon the minutes. I have no doubt it will be put on them; I am therefore at liberty to observe upon it. That account, which is proved to have been the only existing account at the time of the release, was commenced posterior to 1800, and consequently all accounts up to 1800 had been long before settled between Mr. Trotter and lord Melville; and upon that occasion, or soon afterwards, it was that lord Melville, according to his usual custom, when he retired into the country, from whence I believe he most reluctantly ever came back, during the period of his leisure employed himself in the destruction of papers, for which he foresaw he should no longer have any occasion. Now, from these circumstances which I have simply related, I am sure your lordships honourable minds cannot draw any inference to the disadvantage of the defendant.

With respect to the release, I shall trouble your lordships with only a single word or two. Upon this instrument much reliance has been shown, and much stress laid, to press into the case against the noble defendant every circumstance, however trifling or accidental, that could prejudice his case.

Now, my lords, was there ever a case in which presumptions were raised against a defendant with less foundation than the present? Was the release the act of lord Melville? Was it his contrivance? My lords, here again Mr. Trotter, the prosecutor's own witness, comes forward, and completely exonerates the noble defendant. He expressly proves that the idea of the release originated entirely with himself; that at the time he thought of it he was in London; that long before the time, when its remarkable coincidence of date fixes upon it the principal ground of suspicion, he had proposed to lord Melville that a release should be given between them; that it was postponed for execution for some time, but it was revived in 1803, upon his own renewed suggestion, for purposes of his own—for purposes he was then meditating undoubtedly—I mean the subsequent destruction of his books. Mr. Trotter has never concealed that intent. It was for the purpose of concealing his own transactions, which were of a nature that he knew would not bear to be inquired into, that he (Trotter) armed himself with a release, to be executed by lord Melville then in Scotland. He swears, that upon that occasion he consulted a most honourable and respectable solicitor, Mr. Spottiswoode, a man of business, and a man of credit; and that the clause in question, respecting the destruction of vouchers, which has furnished so much observation, was a clause he believes suggested by that respectable solicitor, inserted with so little attention on his part, that he did not recollect its being there till it was recently pointed out to him. That a release so drawn without the knowledge of lord Melville, without his lordship's having seen the draft, without a correction of his in any part of it, was sent for execution to lord Melville in Scotland; and because this release happens to contain a clause whereby the parties to it declare that they have mutually delivered up for destruction, or propose so to do, their respective vouchers, it is to be presumed that lord Melville was conscious that the existence of these vouchers would prove something against him. Therefore, forsooth, he put this declaration upon record, registered it in a paper that was to be enrolled in the courts of Scotland:—For the purpose of concealing his guilt, he takes the best means of disclosing it.

These are the inferences to be drawn from this release. Lord Melville it to be supposed cognisant of every word in it, and to have had some purpose, what it was I profess myself totally unable to conjecture, or how it could affect the case whether that clause was inserted or not. The circumstance of each party being at a distance from the other, I presume suggested to that learned person who was consulted so to frame the release. But, supposing the parties had been together, and had mutually interchanged their respective vouchers, and had put them in the fire, as is common upon settling accounts, would any inference to the disadvantage of either party have been drawn from thence? And what more is done by this clause in the release, by which each party agrees to put an end to vouchers which might give rise to a claim by the representative of one in case of death against the representative of the other?

I am sure I ought to beg your lordships pardon, for trespassing upon your lordships time upon a subject of this nature; or, supposing it necessary, after the evidence which has been given, to liberate the noble defendant from any possible imputation respecting it. Upon the subject of lord Melville's general inattention to his private affairs, and to his accounts in particular, which I have had occasion frequently to mention, I will not detain your lordships by repeating the evidence; but I will with all deference request your lordships to refer to the pages of the printed evidence, 130, 133, 134, 151, 155, 156, 157, 159, 162, and 164, as fully and strongly establishing this point.

My lords, I have now closed my observations on the charges and the evidence adduced on the part of the prosecution. I certainly do not propose on the part of the noble defendant, to offer to your lordships much, if any evidence. If it should be thought that any of the circumstances I have stated, not already proved, should seem more correctly to call for evidence, particularly that circumstance of the relinquishment of salary, it will occupy but a moment of your lordships time. Upon the general subject of the charge, it is not my intention on the part of the noble defendant to trouble your lordships with any evidence. I have heard it said, that if that should be the case, your lordships must convict the noble defendant; because, said the honourable and learned manager, upon the evidence as it stands, unless it can be answered by opposing testimony, the charge is made out against him.

I am sure the honourable and learned manager, when he made this observation, did not recollect what,—in respect to the transactions which he had truly stated, to constitute the main and principal part of the charge against the noble defendant, those that most affected his honour and his character,—had been opened by his brother manager in the outset of this proceeding, viz. that the case afforded no possibility of any further evidence; that the transactions involved in it could alone be known to lord Melville and Mr. Trotter; and the managers having exhibited the account given by lord Melville, and having produced the witness Mr. Trotter, have exhausted all the evidence that the honourable manager stated the nature of the subject admitted. To say, therefore, that without further evidence we are to be convicted, is, with respect to this (the principal) part of the charge, to hold out a certainty of conviction, from which we can by no possibility be redeemed.

But, my lords, I conceive with great deference that a defendant never can be called upon or expected to adduce any evidence; nor should I, on his behalf, think myself warranted in wasting your lordship's time by the production of it, if I were prepared with ever so much written and parol evidence, when the testimony on the part of the prosecution had already proved the case of the defendant. It is quite enough for me to say, standing as counsel for a defendant in a court of criminal judicature, the prosecutor's evidence does not prove his charge: I have gone farther, by showing that his evidence directly disproves it. The principal testimony upon which the prosecution rested, the testimony of Mr. Trotter, has throughout cut up by the roots the whole prosecution, by negating all that was the foundation of it; the charge of confederacy and corruption, all is directly, positively, falsified by the principal witness, upon whom every thing rested, and to bring whom before your lordships, for the purpose of producing a conviction by his evidence, has been so great and favourite an object on the part of the prosecution, accomplished by such extraordinary means. I hope it will not therefore be said, that the defendant is destitute of proof, and that he rests his case upon argument only without evidence. No; he stands upon the best evidence, produced from the most unsuspected quarter. It is upon the evidence adduced by the accuser, under every possible advantage on his part that I have uniformly relied, as proving the noble defendant's case, and disproving that of the prosecutor.

Perhaps it may be said we might have recourse to general evidence, of a nature sometimes upon occasions like this adduced before this great tribunal. But, my lords, my lord Melville's conduct and character have long been before the public; it cannot be a secret to your lordships; and I am unwilling, where the evidence upon the fact is so clear, to protract the trial by descending to this species of evidence, or adducing the long and distinguished train of witnesses, who are ready to come forward and bear testimony to the character and conduct of the noble defendant in every department of the state which he filled, and to the high and unsullied honour and integrity, as well as vigour and energy, for which he was uniformly distinguished.

I cannot help feeling it to have been a little hardly said of the defendant, by the honourable and learned manager, that his private affairs prospered, while the public affairs committed to his trust, were uniformly ruinous and neglected. Is that a fair account of the defendant? Have his private affairs prospered, and have the public affairs committed to his trust fallen into decay? I will not pursue the subject. I will leave it to your lordships' honourable minds, to decide whether that is a fair account of the result of the noble defendant's long services to the public. I will only beg leave to observe, that even in the department of the Treasurer's office, your lordships have heard that, all that has been imputed to the defendant of negligence, though not now in charge, might, with almost equal justice, be imputed to the two most honourable and respectable persons, who succeeded lord Melville in that office—lord Harrowby, and Mr. Bragge Bathurst.

For two years together, after lord Melville quitted the office, Mr. Trotter remained the paymaster, and continued the same practice of drawing from the Bank of England to a private banker's, and made the same private use of the public money. It surely therefore does not necessarily infer guilt—does not necessarily infer privity and corruption, that such transactions might be carried on by a subordinate, to whom all the detail of the business was by the course of the office uniformly left. Would it be matter of just blame in other high situations, for instance that of auditor* where all the business is usually done by deputy, that the principal does not himself vigilantly superintend all that passes in the office? If the usual course of the office has been to leave it to the subordinate, and it does not appear that the principal has done less than his predecessors, ought it to be placed to the disadvantage of any that he has not done more? Ought this to be done in the case of one who was performing great and laborious services in other stations, without salary; devoting his time and talents at the same period, to the advantage and use of the public? But, my lords, can it fairly be said that the public concerns committed to lord Melville's trust, were neglected? Has any injury of any sort whatever been felt by the public? I do not mean to palliate, much less to defend the conduct of Mr. Trotter; but recollect they were his acts that are criminated, and not the defendant's, that there never was any circumstance naturally tending to attract the attention of the noble defendant; no interruption of public business, no delay, no loss, have ever happened to call for his interposition, to watch, inspect, and superintend; and it is proved by Mr. Bragge Bathurst, that he only interfered when referred to, but left all the detail of payments and receipts, to his paymaster. Surely then it will not be said lord Melville was culpable in doing the same, and in not interfering when his attention was not called to the subject. But can it be fairly said of the defendant, that he has neglected or abdicated his duty even in this department? when it appears in evidence, and indeed it was honourably and fairly, in a very candid and manly way admitted by the honourable manager who opened the charge, that so far from lord Melville having neglected the great and principal duties of his situation as treasurer of the Navy, that in the midst of all his other occupations, still he bestowed the most vigorous and effective attention to the interests of the Navy, not indeed that he perused the details of official accounts, but that the higher parts of his duty were uniformly and successfully pursued with unremitting vigor. My lords, a just tribute has been paid to the merits of the noble defendant on this head, in language infinitely better than I can use, by the honourable manager; "I wish (he observed) to say every thing in illustration of good deeds," "to give them all the credit and all the praise which is their due."—"Therefore it is with satisfaction I say, that during the time Mr. Dundas was treasurer of the Navy, several most beneficial regulations took place in that office. That several acts of parliament were passed for the protection and defence of the unprotected and defenceless; I mean the widows and orphans of the brave seamen of this country, and for the allotment of wages to the wives and families of those who were fighting its battles, above all, that enactments were made through the instrumentality of the defendant; which have saved a number of lives from public execution." The act of parliament to which the honourable manager particularly alluded, was, that which has prevented the forgery of seamen's wills. "For that, and other acts, undoubtedly the noble lord demands the thanks of his country, and the gratitude of that meritorious class of men." These were the words of the honourable manager who opened the accusation, and yet, my lords, we are told by the honourable and learned manager, who summed it up, that his private affairs flourished and the public withered, under the care of my lord Melville.

My lords, I shall trouble your lordships with but a word or two more; the honourable manager who opened this case, truly told your lordships, that the defendant was tried by a tribunal which he himself had preferred. It should be recollected, that he had little option upon this subject, after he had behind his back been prejudged, and calumniated in every part of the metropolis and its vicinities, and before the public officers by whom the jury must have been convened for his trial, had it taken place in any other court. My lords, he preferred this proceeding because he thought that every one would be satisfied, that if the corruption and guilt imputed to him, had existed in any part of his life, it could not escape the vigilance, the industry, and the power that in this proceeding would be employed against him: he preferred it because he was sure that here he should have justice—that here he might justly appeal to that high honour which pervades every noble breast, and which the constitution has substituted in the place of the obligation imposed in inferior tribunals, and which would effectually secure him against any individual appearing to give judgment upon the subject, who would be liable to challenge as a common jurymen.

* Lord Grenville, at the time of this trial held the office of auditor of the Exchequer together with that of first lord of the Treasury.

Upon the several questions of law which the charge includes, I have, my lords, endeavoured to submit the arguments that have occurred to me in the course of this case, and I have endeavoured to show that in none of the propositions of law, upon which the arguments are built, was the prosecutor well founded.

Upon the questions of fact, and particularly the main fact upon which all depends, of personal corruption, and corrupt confederacy with Mr. Trotter, I trust it has appeared to your lordships, not only that this case is not left in balance (in which event I am sure your lordships will feel that every intelligent tribunal would suffer the scales to turn in favour of innocence), but that fairly considered the great preponderance of evidence, I might almost say the whole of it, upon the main and principal parts of the charge, is altogether on behalf of the defendant. For all that is not in charge against the defendant, for whatever there may appear to have been of negligence or imprudence, or any other imputation, I should hope, my lords, that the bitterest enemy he has, would be satisfied, that he has already suffered an abundant measure of punishment, to which no further aggravation could be wished for, if it were competent or regular for any tribunal to inflict it.

My lords, your lordships are about to discharge a solemn and important duty, the highest and most responsible that can be exercised by man, himself about to stand before another tribunal, on a more momentous and awful inquiry and review.

Your lordships are to exercise this function in this august tribunal, the highest in the world, in the eye and in the presence of this great nation, and of the representatives of every other. Your lordships are to exercise it in the case of a defendant of exalted rank, and who, my lords, in the evening of his life, after a period of more than forty years, employed in the public service, has now all that is left to him depending upon the judgment which your lordships are to pronounce. To that judgment he looks forward with all the confidence that conscious innocence and a reliance upon your lordships' wisdom, justice, and impartiality, can produce.

I will trouble your lordships no further than to offer my humble thanks, for the great attention with which I have been honoured, and to request your lordships will accept my humble apology, for having so long trespassed upon your indulgence.

THIRTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, May 15, 1806.

The lords and others came from the chamber of parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen who are of counsel for lord Melville, you may now proceed in the defence, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, we now propose to call Mr. John Litchfield. The object of this evidence is only to the point I stated to your lordships, to prove the amount of salary to which lord Melville was entitled as secretary of state, and the actual amount of what he received.

Then Mr. John Litchfield was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—What is your situation?

Mr. Litchfield.—I am one of the clerks in the Privy Council office.

Mr. Plumer.—What is the book that now lies before you?

Mr. Litchfield.—A volume of the Council Registers.

Mr. Plumer.—Turn to the order of council of the 27th February, 1795.—My lords, I understand it to be of some length, I wish only to have that part read, which fixes the amount of the salary of secretary of state.

Then the following extract from the Register, page 165, was read:

“At the Court at St. James's, the 27th February, 1795.

“The lords of the committee having fully considered the said report of your majesty's said principal secretaries of state, are of opinion, it may be advisable for your majesty to confirm such of the regulations respecting the said offices proposed by the commissioners appointed by the before-mentioned act, passed in the twenty-fifth year of your majesty's reign, as appear to be approved of by the said report of your majesty's said principal secretaries of state; and likewise, the further regulations and the scheme for the arrangement of their respective offices, (copies whereof are hereunto annexed), proposed by your majesty's said principal secretaries of state; and to direct the same to be adopted and carried into execution, except so far as relates to the proposition suggested by the report of the said commissioners, and concurred in by your majesty's said principal secretaries of state, in the case of a vacancy of one of the under secretaries of state, upon which point the lords of the committee will take leave to offer their opinion in the proper place.

“And the lords of the committee do agree further to report as their opinion to your majesty, that with respect to the salaries of the principal secretaries of state, such salaries should be 6,000*l.* per annum, clear of all deductions, and in lieu of all former salaries and fees, and that this arrangement should be considered as taking effect from the 12th of January, 1792, with regard to the right honourable lord Grenville and the right honourable Henry Dundas : and with regard to his grace the duke of Portland, from the date of his grace's appointment to be one of your majesty's principal secretaries of state."

Mr. Plumer.—Your lordships will be pleased to observe that that entitled the noble defendant to receive a salary of 6,000*l.* a year, commencing the 12th of January, 1792. There is an additional entry we wish to have read ; the passage before read stated what was fit to be done, this is his majesty's confirmation of it.

Then the following extract was read from the same Register, page 68 :

" His majesty, taking the said report into consideration, was pleased, with the advice of his privy council, to confirm such of the regulations respecting the offices of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, proposed by the commissioners appointed by the said act, passed in the twenty-fifth year of his majesty's reign as appear to be approved of by his majesty's said principal secretaries of state ; and his majesty is likewise pleased, with the advice aforesaid, to approve and confirm the further regulations proposed by his majesty's said principal secretaries of state, with the exceptions above stated in the said report of the lords of the committee of privy council, and to order, as it is hereby ordered, that the same be adopted and carried into execution ; and the right honourable the lords commissioners of his majesty's Treasury, and his majesty's principal secretaries of state, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain."

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—We wish now to call William Pollock, esq.

Then William Pollock, esq., was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows :

Mr. Plumer.—Are you the chief clerk of the secretary of state in the home department ?

Mr. Pollock.—I am.

Mr. Plumer.—How long have you been in that situation ?

Mr. Pollock.—Forty-nine years.

Mr. Plumer.—Did it fall within your department and duty, as the chief clerk, to pay the salaries that were due to the secretaries of state for the home department ?

Mr. Pollock.—Constantly.

Mr. Plumer.—From the 8th of June, 1791, to the 12th of January, 1792, did you pay any salary to Mr. Dundas ?

Mr. Pollock.—I did not.

Mr. Plumer.—From that time to the 10th of July, 1794, did you pay him any salary ?

Mr. Pollock.—I did not.

Mr. Plumer.—If any salary had been demanded by my lord Melville during that period of time, would it have been in your department to have paid it, and must you have known it ?

Mr. Pollock.—I should think so.

Mr. Plumer.—During that interval have you accounted to lord Melville for any fees ?

Mr. Pollock.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—To what period have you so accounted ?

Mr. Pollock.—To the 11th of July, 1794, when his lordship removed to the war department.

Mr. Plumer.—Was he entitled, down to the period of the order in council, to the salary exclusive of the fees ?

Mr. Pollock.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—What is the amount of that salary to which he would have been entitled during that period, prior to the order of council, from the month of June, 1791, to the period of the order of council ?

Mr. Pollock.—Upon the nearest calculation I could make it would produce 2,715*l.* 2*s.* 10½*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—From that period to the time of lord Melville's going to the war department ?

Mr. Pollock.—14,958*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—State the amount of fees which had been received prior to the order of council, which are to be deducted from the sum you have given ?

Mr. Pollock.—The amount of fees received by his lordship to the 12th of January, 1792, is 832*l.* 8*s.* 5½*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—Are those fees which arose prior to the order of council ?

Mr. Pollock.—Prior to the 12th of January, 1792.

Mr. Plumer.—That order in council had no effect whatever upon the right to receive these fees.

Mr. Pollock.—None.

Mr. Plumer.—Take the amount of fees subsequent to the order of council, and which are to be deducted from the sum before given.

Mr. Pollock.—The sum total of the fees was 12,958*l.* 4*s.* 4½*d.* The expences of the office in that interim deducted therefrom being 3,932*l.* 16*s.* 6¾*d.*, left 9,025*l.* 7*s.* 9¾*d.* clear to his lordship.

Mr. Plumer.—Was that the nett amount of fees subsequent to the order of council ?

Mr. Pollock.—Yes it was.

Mr. Plumer.—What is the total amount of the money relinquished to the public in the account you have been giving ?

Mr. Pollock.—5,933*l.* 10*s.* 3¼*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—Is that sum the amount of what was given up to the public subsequent to the order of council ?

Mr. Pollock.—I think so.

Mr. Plumer.—I think you said that the amount relinquished before the order of council was 2,715*l.* 2*s.* 10½*d.* Is that so ?

Mr. Pollock.—It is so.

Mr. Plumer.—What is the total amount of those two sums given up in this department as secretary of state for the home department?

Mr. Pollock.—The two sums added make 8,648*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*

Mr. Plumer.—Has the whole of that sum 8,648*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* been saved to the public by this relinquishment.

Mr. Pollock.—It has.

Then William Pollock, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—During the time that lord Melville received any fee or emolument whatever, was it paid to him through you?

Mr. Pollock.—His lordship frequently gave me orders for payment, and received money of me.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was it in the routine of your business to receive such salaries and fees for lord Melville in the secretary of state's department?

Mr. Pollock.—It was.

Mr. Whitbread.—To whom did you pay what money you did pay on his account?

Mr. Pollock.—Sometimes to his lordship's banker, at other times to his order, at other times by verbal orders.

Mr. Whitbread.—Can you swear that the calculations you have made of the sums relinquished by lord Melville are accurate.

Mr. Pollock.—I may be subject to error, but they are as accurate as I could make them.

A Lord.—Have I understood you rightly in saying the order of council bore date the 27th of February, 1795?

Mr. Pollock.—Yes.

A Lord.—And that the fees were to be relinquished from the 12th of January, 1792?

Mr. Pollock.—It is so directed in that order of council; that, with respect to the secretaries of state, they should have that allowance of 6,000*l.* a year, clear of all deductions and in lieu of fees, and that with respect to Mr. Dundas (now lord Melville) it should have a retrospect from the 12th of January, 1792.

A Lord.—Am I to understand you that lord Melville received 6,000*l.* a year from the 12th of January, 1792?

Mr. Pollock.—No, his lordship received short of that money; 5,933*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, I wish now to call James Chapman, esq.

Then James Chapman, esq., was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Are you the chief clerk in the secretary of state's office for the war department?

Mr. Chapman.—I am.

Mr. Plumer.—Were you so in the month of March, 1795?

Mr. Chapman.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—Were you the person through whom the salary due to the secretary of state in that department would have been paid.

Mr. Chapman.—Yes.

Mr. Plumer.—How much, in point of fact, of salary did you pay to lord Melville as secretary of state for the war department?

Mr. Chapman.—I do not know the total amount that I paid; I paid lord Melville his salary at the rate of 2,000*l.* a year, from January, 1795, to June, 1800, and at the rate of 4,000*l.* a year, from the 1st of June, 1800, to the time lord Melville resigned the seals, in March, I believe, 1801.

Mr. Plumer.—What was the amount of difference between what lord Melville was entitled to receive and what he actually did receive?

Mr. Chapman.—My lord Melville relinquished from July, 1794, to the time he resigned the seals upwards of 26,000*l.*

Mr. Plumer.—Are you now speaking of the war department only?

Mr. Chapman.—Of the war department only.

Mr. Plumer.—This has nothing to do then with any relinquishment in the office of secretary of state for the home department?

Mr. Chapman.—No.

Then James Chapman, esq., was cross-examined as follows:

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you the channel through which all lord Melville's salary such as he did receive passed?

Mr. Chapman.—Yes, in the war department.

Mr. Whitbread.—Did you account with lord Melville for that salary?

Mr. Chapman.—Yes.

Mr. Whitbread.—Was there any part of the additional salary, stated by you to have been relinquished by lord Melville, ever tendered to his lordship?

Mr. Chapman.—It was withheld in consequence of lord Melville's direction to me not to pay it to his account.

Mr. Whitbread.—When did you receive those directions?

Mr. Chapman.—I presume when the first quarter's salary was due, when I asked lord Melville whether I should pay it or what I should do.

Mr. Whitbread.—Do you know of any reason why that salary was not received by lord Melville, or not paid to him in the same manner as it was paid to other secretaries of state?

Mr. Chapman.—I believe because lord Melville conceived himself receiving 4,000*l.* a year as treasurer of the navy; he therefore received 2,000*l.* a year as secretary of state, making in the whole the salary of 6,000*l.* a year, which was the salary allotted to the secretary of state.

Mr. Whitbread.—Had lord Melville for both offices, the treasurership of the navy and the other office, received 6,000*l.* a year?

Mr. Chapman.—I can only speak to my own department from that he received only 2,000*l*.

Mr. Whitbread.—What salary did lord Grenville receive from the same office?

Mr. Chapman.—I do not know.

Mr. Whitbread.—Were you not chief clerk when lord Grenville was secretary of state.

Mr. Chapman.—I am in the war department.

Then James Chapman, esq., was re-examined as follows:

Mr. Plumer.—Might lord Melville, if he had been so disposed, besides his salary as treasurer of the navy, have received the full 6,000*l*., as secretary of state for the war department?

Mr. Chapman.—I conceive undoubtedly so.

Mr. Plumer.—Had you authority, and would you have paid it if it had been demanded?

Mr. Chapman.—Certainly.

Mr. Plumer.—Was there any reason for your non-payment of the money but the voluntary relinquishment by lord Melville which you have stated?

Mr. Chapman.—None other.

[The witness was directed to withdraw.]

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, this is a matter of figures. I would only beg to call your lordships' attention to those two sums that have been proved by these witnesses, to the amount of 8,648*l*. 13*s*. 2*d*. in the home department, and to the amount of 26,081*l*. 7*s*. 5*d*. in the war department; added together, they make the sum of 34,730*l*. 0*s*. 7*d*. relinquished by lord Melville, and saved to the public.

Mr. Adam.—My lords;—The time has now arrived, when I am to approach your lordships in the discharge of this most awful and most important duty. It is a duty which, from various circumstances and events in my life, and various recollections, is peculiarly awful to me; and it is rendered still more so by the emphatic eloquence, and the powerful argument which has preceded what I am to advance to your lordships.—My lords, I trust that I shall have coolness and composure to collect my thoughts, and to state them with accuracy; and the best return I can make for the favourable attention of your lordships is, not to delay you with any thing but what is completely to the point.

My lords, I shall first take the statute into consideration; not because it lies directly in order in point of time, but because it is important to discuss the law as an abstract proposition unconnected with the fact, and because I wish that the discussion of the statute should not interfere with the narrative of facts, and the argument upon that narrative which forms the great ground of defence.

But before I state the observations which I shall submit to your attention upon the construction of the statute of the 25th Geo. 3rd.; let me intreat your lordships to recollect and to bear in your minds through all the various ramifications of this important case, that the noble and eminent person whose fate is now to be decided by your lordships is, at this moment, and has been from the day he left the office of treasurer of the navy, in the situation I am about to state.

VOL. XXIX.

He does not owe one farthing to the public; he has paid up every sixpence that has been imprested into his hands; and not only has he done so, but your lordships will never fail to recollect that no branch of that duty, which he discharged as treasurer of the navy, has at any time met with any impediment;—that the public has suffered no loss;—that the persons who were entitled to payment, never had their payment postponed, for one single moment, even to the amount of a farthing. My lords, this is a most important feature in the case, and it is well not only that it should be impressed upon the minds of this high tribunal, but that the fact should likewise be known by a watchful and anxious, although, as I trust I shall show your lordships, a misled public, to the remotest corner of this united empire.

The act of parliament which I have to state to your lordships, was the work of the noble defendant, and he is now accused of having been the breaker of his own law. My lords, it is important that before your lordships find him guilty of being, as the managers contend, the breaker of his own law, your lordships should thoroughly understand what that law imports.—And I will venture to say, that unless there is a determination to have recourse to matter which cannot be legally forced into the construction of an act of parliament—matter which no court of law could listen to as a rule for construing a statute—he cannot be held to be the breaker of this law. If this act of parliament is to be construed by that which lies within the statute (the words being clear and distinct), and not by extrinsic matter, or by the supposed history of the law, the reports of the commissioners of accounts, and the resolutions of the House of Commons, there has been no violation of the statute, and your lordships, I am confident, will decide (notwithstanding the threats held out to us of being brought to shame upon this point), that the law is distinctly what we represent it to be; namely, that there was no obligation upon the noble lord, as treasurer of the navy, to withhold from drawing out, when the time of service arrived and was signified to the treasurer of the navy (under the proper assignment, from the proper board), the money placed in the Bank, by virtue of the act of parliament.

This act of parliament, as it respects this particular subject, consists of two parts; and these two parts are distinct in their nature; the first part of the act of parliament is to secure the payment of the money to the Bank, in its issue from the Exchequer; the second part of the act of parliament is, to permit that money, for the purposes of the public service, to be drawn from the Bank of England.

Now, my lords, here are two considerations; the first is the regulation (if I may use the expression) or the contrivance of the channel by which the money, in its transit to the Bank, shall find its way safely to the account of the treasurer of the navy, in the Bank. The other branch is, that it shall be at the call of the treasurer of the navy, or of his properly appointed deputy, the paymaster, for the purposes of the public service.

Now, my lords, let us see how the legislature, upon the motion of the noble defendant, set about accomplishing these objects.

If your lordships will look to the first clause of the statute, you will find the most anxious regulations for the purpose of placing the money in the Bank.

In the first place the treasurer, merely as treasurer, is to apply by letter to the proper office, for the order to require an issue of money; namely, to one of the three departments of the naval service, of which your lordships have heard so much, the Navy, Pay, or Victualling branches. This was meant as a check on the treasurer, in order that no more money should be drawn for from the Exchequer, than the public service required; for you will always recollect, that the grievance proposed to be cured, was the public money being called for before it was wanted, and its being kept after the time when it ought to have been paid.

Next, the treasurer's memorial is to contain a prayer, that the money shall be paid to the treasurer's account in the Bank; thus the treasurer is put under check as to the amount.

The Treasury is the next object of consideration, in the act. That board is required to call on the Exchequer to pay to the Bank; and the Exchequer, being the next instrument, is called upon by the clause of the act to pay the money into the Bank direct. It will render this somewhat more perspicuous, if I state the provisions in this section.

"The treasurer of his majesty's navy for the time being shall, in all his memorials, pray that such sum as he requires shall be issued to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, on his account, and shall transmit with each memorial a copy of the letter or letters from the commissioners of the navy, victualling, and sick and hurt boards, directing him to apply for such sum or sums; in which letter or letters the said commissioners shall, and they are hereby required and directed to specify for what particular service or services the said money is wanted, and shall also state the balances then in the hands of the treasurer of the navy, under each head of service respectively; and the commissioners of his majesty's Treasury for the time being, by their letter, from time to time, shall direct the auditor of the Exchequer to issue to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England."

Your lordships observe, therefore, that in both these instances it is provided that the instruments who are to set the money in motion in its transit outwards to the Bank, are to send it directly to the Bank, on account of the treasurer of the navy; and the Governor and Company of the Bank of England are to open an account, to be entitled, the Account of the Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy.

When the money has got to the Bank safely, in this manner, for public purposes, it is a most material part of the history of this office (and one which is in evidence before your lordships) that, antecedently to the passing this law (with such exceptions as might be made for the purpose of small payments), an account had always been opened at the Bank by the treasurer for the time being, and payments had always been made there. This existing official regulation was adopted by the legislature, and enacted in the statute under consideration. By this measure an important object was attained, as the personal account of the treasurer was thus converted into an official account, so that the treasurer of the navy, who was formerly no more than a personal accountant, standing in the situation of a banker with whom money was deposited, and therefore considered to be by law entitled to the use of the money while it remained with him; was now to place it in the Bank in his official character. But still, according to the opinion given by an eminent person, whose voice has often filled this hall, Mr. Burke, it was not sent to the Bank, there to fructify for the Bank, but it was sent thither as a matter of official regulation.

Mr. Burke said, of a statute similar to that now under discussion, "that nothing was farther from his intention, than that the money should be carried to the Bank, there to remain without fructifying; that, if it was to fructify, he never intended that the Bank, or any other body or description of men, should benefit by it, but that the public should reap the fruits; for in his opinion, if the public did not reap them, there was no person so fit to reap them as the persons at the head of the offices, for which the money had been originally issued." These words of Mr. Burke afford an additional proof of the sense of the legislature at that time—they were pronounced on a similar occasion, and at a most important date. That eminent person had, in consequence of the resolutions in 1782, moved in that year for a bill for the better payment of the army; that bill which passed the legislature in 1782 was found when it passed not to be consistent with official regulation, and he was forced to bring in an amending bill; which he did in February, 1783, and upon that occasion he used the memorable words which I have just quoted. It is clear, then, that he who was promoting an act for regulating the office of paymaster of the army, was of opinion, that the money was not meant to be placed in the Bank, there to fructify for the benefit of the Bank. It is clear that there is the closest analogy between the act he promoted, and that now in question. It is equally clear, that there was no principle in his mind, nor any in the mind of the public, at that time, that rendered it an illegal, far less an immoral act, for the money to fructify for the benefit of the person who held the office. I am entitled, therefore, to say, that the resolutions of 1782, had not the same meaning put upon them by the eminent person to whom I am alluding, by the legislature which, at his instance, passed the statute for the army, or by the public at large, as that which is now contended for by the prosecutors.

Your lordships will not suppose that in maintaining this argument, I mean to admit for one single moment, that one single fraction of the money which came to lord Melville's hands has fructified for the benefit of the noble defendant; I am arguing the act upon the abstract case (as I have stated already), the circumstances of the case shall be afterwards detailed to your lordships.

Having thus shown your lordships the sense in which the question was considered as to profit, in order to establish what was meant by the legislature, viz., that the object was not to prevent gain to the individual, and to transfer that profit to the Bank, but that it was to render the personal account official—that it was to prevent an ex-treasurer from continuing to act in those services which had commenced while he was in office, and which, by former practice, continued with him and his executors, until the services commenced by him were ended, creating large accounts by persons out of office;—I now recur to the statute again, and having discussed the first section, I beg your attention to the third.

I pass over the second section which relates mostly to Exchequer fees. Those of your lordships who are accustomed to the courts below, will not be surprised that I anxiously call your lordships' attention to the particular position of this clause in the act; but first, let us see what the clause says, it runs thus,—“And be it farther enacted, that from and after the first day of July, 1785, no money for the service of the navy shall be issued from his majesty's Exchequer, to the treasurer of the Navy, or shall be placed, or directed to be placed in his hands or possession; but the same shall be issued and directed to be paid to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, to be placed to the accounts above mentioned.”

Now, your lordships will observe, that here are negative words; that those negative words are applicable to the Exchequer, and that they tie down the issue to be to the Bank of England; but you will observe that this relates to the transit outwards. Now, as to the position of the clause in the act, your lordships will observe, that the act has not, as far as I have yet gone, begun to treat of the money after it has got to the Bank; it has not yet begun to direct what is to become of the money after it has got to the Bank; it is merely directing how that safe channel of communication, that duct (if I may be allowed the expression) which is to lead the money from the Exchequer to the Bank, is to pass it securely to this newly-established official account. This is not only the import of this clause of the act in the place in which it stands, but it is the conclusion to be derived from the express words of the act itself. For after negating the power of the Exchequer to issue to the treasurer, and having in the preceding clause imposed a power to issue to the Bank; it goes on to state,—“But the same shall be issued and directed to be paid to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and to be placed to the accounts above mentioned;” that is to the account opened by the treasurer of the navy—that is to the account referred to in the preceding page. Your lordships will observe, that the terms used are clear; and as to their position, a great and learned person (lord Kenyon) often made use of the phrase, in construing statutes and deeds, “noscitur a sociis,” meaning, that in construing an act of parliament, or any other written instrument, its meaning is to be discovered by the company it keeps, the place in which it stands. This clause, then, is placed in that part of the act which relates to the transit from the Exchequer to the Bank, and must be construed with reference to that part of the regulation, and not with reference to its passage out of the Bank. But the words used are so clear and so distinct, the expressions are so manifestly free from doubt, that if it had stood the last, instead of the third section in the act, it must have received precisely the same construction.

My lords, I hope I shall not be supposed to be too minute in this discussion; this matter cannot be rendered too clear; for, as I conceive, persons in high authority have doubted about it. Even persons learned in the law have (in the character of commissioners of naval inquiry) given a construction to this act, which, I will venture to say, it would not have received in the courts of Westminster-hall.

My lords, we come now to the second branch of the act of parliament, the branch of the act which relates to the situation of the money in the Bank, after it has got there in safety—after it is put to the official account. This account was first opened in the name of the treasurer of the navy, in July, 1785, and afterwards in 1786, under the title of the Act of Parliament New Account.

My lords, in all the transactions of life, in all regulations that are necessary for the conduct of human affairs, trust and confidence in those who are to conduct them must be supposed to exist. In framing an act of parliament, or any regulation of public or private utility, this principle of trust in the person who is to execute must prevail. When the money is to be sent from the Exchequer to the Bank, under all the guards and fences of the ancient and the improved constitution of the office, it is not sent to lie there idle, but it must be brought from thence to supply the service for which it is destined.

Your lordships have seen by what duct or canal it has been taken from the Exchequer; what fences are established to limit its amount; what means and words are used, in order to secure its safe passage outwards.—It is the act of the different boards to state in a letter the sum of money required. The treasurer is then to memorialize the Exchequer, for that sum to be paid to the Bank. The Treasury is next to direct the Exchequer to pay it to the Bank. The officers or persons who administer to the issue of the money, are to take care that it shall go to the Bank; but when you come to that part of the act which relates to the drawing it out, there is no special distinct restriction on those who are to administer its payment, for the services for which it is destined. In this stage you put trust in the person whose office it is to pay. Trust is become requisite, otherwise the business must stand still. Accordingly, your lordships will see in what manner that part of the act is framed, being calculated to confer that trust, which the nature of the business rendered essential.

It is enacted that the “treasurer of his majesty’s navy, for the time being, by himself, or by the person or persons in his office, duly authorized by the said treasurer.”—Now, your lordships will recollect what the course of office has in all times been, and that the paymaster has been regularly the person duly authorized; that the treasurer has uniformly, as soon as he has appointed him, given him the necessary powers; and that upon this principle lord Melville in his first and in his second treasurership conferred that power on Mr. Douglas in the first instance, and on Mr. Trotter in the second.—The treasurer then, or the person authorized, “shall draw upon the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, for all navy services whatever, and shall specify in each, and every draft, the head of service for which the same is drawn; without which, it shall not be a voucher, unless it specifies the head of service for which it is drawn, and has been actually paid by the said Governor and Company of the Bank of England.”

Now, my lords, observe how this part of the regulation is managed. The treasurer of the navy is to draw; his appointee, his paymaster, under the authority given to him, is to draw;—what does it say? “That he shall draw;” who is to draw? The treasurer of the navy, or the person duly authorized. In what terms is he to draw? Under the head of specified service.

From whence is he to derive the specified service? According to the ancient usage of the office, he is to get it from the different departments of which your lordships have heard so much, Navy, Pay, and Victualling. But is there a single word said, that when he draws that money out of the Bank, the money is not to be taken to a different place? Is there one single word from which it can be implied that it is to go to the chest of the sub-accountant in the navy branch? Is there one word said that it is to go to the chest of the sub-accountant in the victualling branch? Is there one word said, that it is to go to the chest of the sub-accountant in the pay branch? No, not one word; but this responsible officer, known in the course of office, existing as long as the office has been known to exist, appointed with full power by the treasurer of the navy, is to draw it out. For what purpose? In order that the payment may, according to sound discretion, pass to the sub-accountants in such manner as their services may require.

I submit to your lordships, therefore, that in this part of the act, there is not the same guard and fence as in the former part; no; there is nothing like it, but, on the contrary, there is given a special and distinct power to draw, without naming any particular place to which the money so drawn is to be carried. This power is given to the treasurer, and to the person whom he shall appoint, without restriction as to the place of custody. The act then goes on with a negative clause in the fifth section: “provided always, that the monies to be issued unto the governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty’s navy, shall not be paid out of the Bank, unless for navy services, and in pursuance of drafts to be drawn on the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and signed by the treasurer of his majesty’s navy, or the person authorized as aforesaid, in which draft shall be specified the heads of service to which the sums therein mentioned are to be applied.” Now your lordships will observe, that here, there is a clause saying, that it is not to be paid, except to those heads of service. How are they to know those heads of service? Is there any part in this act that points them out, as there is in the act which has lately passed, respecting the treasurer of the Ordnance? Is there any part of this act which points out, that, when money is drawn from the Bank, it is to be carried to a particular place? No;—but what the act points out is, that it is to be drawn for a particular service, and that it is to be paid to a particular service. But with regard to the intermediate situation of the money—whether it is to be in the chest of the paymaster—whether it is to be in the chest of the sub-accountant—whether it is to be in the chest of a banker, of the one or of the other; or whether it is to be at another account in the Bank (according to the doctrine of write-off, given in evidence by Mr. Tierney) is not stated in the statute. My lords, that is left entirely to the discretion of the office, and it is so left for the wisest and the best purposes; because it would be utterly impossible to carry on the duties of this office, according to the nature of those duties, either with regard to the large payments, or with regard to the minute payments, without leaving it in that state, and subject to that discretion.

The nature of the payments your lordships have heard. They descend to the minuteness of a shilling, there are many under twenty shillings, there are very many of them under five pounds. There is an absolute necessity for all such payments being in money; and there are, besides that, various large payments, for which the demands are made in bills. Those bills are assigned and payable at any time when the payees shall present them. It is necessary that the money should be ready to answer all those demands, of whatever amount, small or great. It must be ready and secure, but it need not be ready or secure in any particular place. As to that, the law has said nothing, but has left it to the discretion of the officer, who may direct to what coffer it shall go. But whether it goes to the coffer of the paymaster, or the coffers of the sub-accountants, or whether it goes to the account of the paymaster in the house of Coutts (a house whose credit is above all possibility of doubt) or to the account of sub-accountants in the Bank, is precisely the same thing. It is not its being under the slates of the Bank in Threadneedle-street, or under the roof of Mr. Coutts in the Strand, that makes any difference with regard to the deposit. When the money is once placed to the account of a person, other than the treasurer, and that person obtains a command over it, the deposit is changed; and although, therefore, the regulation of write-off may be a regulation that may answer some purposes of convenience, it does not seem at all to take away the risk, or answer any purpose of safety, which is the ground of all this extraordinary complaint. I trust, therefore, that it will appear to your lordships, that the risk to which the public money is exposed, arises precisely in the same way, by transfer to the account of a sub-accountant, with this difference only, that it is at risk in the hands of the subordinates instead of the principal.

My lords, what is the nature of the navy office? There is a treasurer at the head of it, always a person of consideration in the state, who has that office bestowed upon him in order that he may be enabled, not to discharge any particular minute duties with regard to that office, but that he may be responsible generally. He holds the office either as a reward for former services, or that he may be enabled to discharge other duties. There is a paymaster, the next in order to the treasurer, a person of considerable respect; like Mr. Douglas, related to an ancient family, or well known, and well connected, like Mr.

Trotter. After the paymaster, come very respectable persons in their several departments, the different sub-accountants; but will any body say, that in the eye of the law, or in the eye of reason, there is more ground for placing confidence in those sub-accountants than in the paymaster of the navy? When the constant course has been that the paymaster drew before the passing of the act, and is to draw since the passing of the act, can it be said that it would have been a wise thing, that it would have been safer or better to have put the money, immediately, into the hands of those sub-accountants? Would it not have been said, on the contrary, if the treasurer had made an order to trust them with the money, if there had been any loss from the failure of any one of those sub-accountants (and such loss did arise from the failure of one of them, who made an intermediate use of the money), that the treasurer was deeply and seriously responsible? It certainly would, and for this plain reason, because in doing so, he had deserted the usual course of his office. Whereas he would have been justified in trusting his paymaster, as he followed the ancient and accustomed course of the office. I am sure if this matter had been the subject of previous consideration, it would not have been said, a priori, it shall be paid to Mr. Swaffield, or to any other sub-accountant, and not to Mr. Trotter, the paymaster regularly named, the man recommended by Mr. Pitt, related to Mr. Coutts, and allied to, and patronised by many considerable families. Could it have been said, you shall not trust him, but shall trust a person in comparatively an inferior situation? My lords, I have a right to say, the act is to be construed upon this ground; we are not to construe acts of parliament by events that happen afterwards, they are to be construed by the words—by that which they clearly mean, and not by any unfortunate length to which Mr. Trotter may have been tempted to go, by which he has brought about that which is now the subject of your lordships' investigation, but which I trust, in the end, will be the subject of your lordships' judgment of acquittal. I humbly submit to your lordships, therefore, that this is the clear meaning of the law, and that it is impossible to call in aid the 11th section, in order to disturb this meaning which I give to the law.

In the first place your lordships will observe that the 11th section relates to a perfectly different subject; that every other part of the act relates to payments in London, and supposes persons to come to London to receive their payments, but that that part of the act relates to payments at the out-ports. The particular mode by which those payments are made, puts the parties there in a different degree of responsibility from that in which they are in London. The sub-accountants in London need never have any money in their hand still the actual moment of payment comes; it may remain in the treasurer's hands, or the paymaster's ready to be handed over to them. The convenience of the service permits this, and therefore, in the other part of the act, which relates to the accounting, your lordships will see, by applying your minds to that part of the act, that they are regulated according to the nature of their duties. But how is it with regard to payments at the out-ports? The sub-accountants there must be trusted with money to a certain amount; they must have a certain given sum, and when the treasurer is to go out, and to account upon going out, he is entitled to take credit not only for what they pay in London, but he is entitled to take credit for what is in their hands in the out-ports. It was necessary, therefore, that there should be a particular clause relative to the out-ports to render this clear. This is that clause. Is it competent then, upon any principle of sound construction, by which an act of parliament is to be expounded, to say, that a clause, meant for a perfectly different object, which lays down no general regulations, which establishes no system or mode of action generally, is to be considered as a guide for construing another part of the act, where such a rule is laid down? You cannot on sound principles, apply a clause, in an act which has no reference to the general matter, in order to construe the meaning of the general matter, where there has been the utmost caution used to regulate the general matter, and to make it clear and distinct. This being the case, my lords, it seems to me that there remains but one single point more to trouble your lordships with upon the statute; and that is, that it may be said then cui bono, where is the benefit of this statute, if it is not to keep the money in the Bank.

Before I state my argument on this head, I would wish to call your lordships attention to the act to which I referred respecting the Ordnance, by which your lordships will see that the regulations there made, are of a nature which shows that the legislature thought that regulations similar to those in question were not sufficient, and did not warrant the construction that is put upon them by the managers. It is there enacted, "That the treasurer of the ordnance for the time being, by himself or his deputy, shall, from and after the passing of this act, make payment on all imprests and debentures ordered for payment by the board of ordnance (except such as shall be issued for the pay and allowances to the officers and persons employed in the service of the board of ordnance, subject to any deductions for duties or otherwise) by drafts on the Bank of England, according to a form of draft hereafter to be agreed upon between the lords commissioners of the Treasury and the Governor and Directors of the Bank of England; and stating therein whether the same are for the payment of imprests or debentures, or both, as the case may be; provided always that the said treasurer or his deputy shall not have power and authority to draw on the said Bank of England for the payment of the total amount of the imprests and debentures which shall at any time be ordered for payment by the board of ordnance but for the amount of such imprests and debentures only as shall be actually presented for payment to the said treasurer." And then it provides in the next clause, "that it shall and may be lawful for the said board of ordnance from time to time to authorize and empower the said treasurer, or his deputy, to draw on the Bank of England for such sums as the said board shall deem proper for the payment of salaries and allowances subject to deductions for duties or otherwise, as aforesaid, to the officers of the said board, and persons employed under their direction or authority, and for such sums as shall be necessary for payments on his petty account; and the said treasurer, or his deputy, is hereby directed to draw distinct and separate drafts for each of the said services, and to keep a separate account thereof, and to state to the board of ordnance in his applications for leave." So that by this act, applicable to a similar subject, the legislature has required these particular regulations as to payments made from the Bank, otherwise such restrictions upon those payments could not have been inferred.

My lords, I now proceed to state to your lordships what occurs respecting the benefit derived to the public from the act regulating the office of treasurer of the navy. It is said by the honourable managers, that there is no benefit and advantage to be derived from it, but on their construction of the law. My answer to this in the first instance is, that the law, according to their construction, would lay an embargo upon the mode of executing the payment of the money, in an office constituted like the office of treasurer of the navy. The nature of it is this: that the sub-accountants are to be the persons who are ultimately to hand the money to the payees. Now, either those sub-accountants are to have the money in the first instance, or they are not. If they are to have the money in the first instance, there should be a clause in the act of parliament varying the course of office and requiring it to be paid to them; but there is no such clause, therefore the treasurer is to keep the custody of the money in such situation as he thinks fit; and there is no imperative order to keep it in the Bank. If the sub-accountants are not to have the custody of the money, then I submit it is in its proper custody by being in the custody of the paymaster, because he is the regular appointee, and because it is done for the purpose of giving facility to payments. The multitude of small payments that come to the office, require that the sub-treasurers should be provided with money from time to time; and they require at the same time, that this should be done by actual money. Then it becomes absolutely necessary, that in order to have this actual money, the money should be out of the Bank; and the money being to be out of the Bank, the question is precisely this: Where is the money to be? For in the nature of things it is impossible that the safety of Bank custody should be attached to it. It must be money, to which no individual can have access, in order to effect that security; but, to make it useful, to enable the payments for the service to be made, some individual must have access to it; and then it comes to this precise question, Whether you will give that access to the paymaster, whom the constitution of the office considers as fit to have access to the money, or to subordinates who are not so fit to have access to it. I therefore submit to your lordships, that the write-offs are only another mode of putting the money into the power of the sub-accountants. But by putting it within their power, there is no longer any safety derived from its remaining at the Bank; because, by the transaction of writing it off, it has become the money of the individual, and no longer the money of the office. Except therefore that the stability of the Bank of England may be supposed greater than the stability of a banking-house, there is no reason for keeping it there; and nobody will dispute that the stability of the banking-house where Mr. Trotter placed it, is equal to that of the Bank of England itself.

I was about to state to your lordships next, the uses which have arisen from this act, and to state that they are, in my opinion, of the most important nature, notwithstanding they do not embrace the object contended for by the managers. Your lordships have heard that the widow and the orphan of the sailor have been the subjects of the protection of the noble lord. Your lordships have heard that he has taken infinite pains to make regulations which should check the worst of all crimes, the crime of falsifying instruments to the injury of the poor. My lords without the regulations which this act contains, it would not have been possible for those measures of the noble lord to have been carried into execution with effect, for if you had cramped and fettered the payments in such a way as to require each particular sixpence to be doled out at the Bank to the individual, all those meritorious acts of Parliament would have been ineffectual. The allotment of a seaman's wages to his wife. The payment of a child after the death of his father in the battles of his country. The payment to any individual who may have a claim upon the treasurer of the navy of a small amount, would have been of but little benefit indeed, if they had been obliged to take their piece of paper from the office at Somerset-house, for the sum of one shilling, or five shillings, or twenty shillings, or even up to five pounds, and then have to carry it through all the offices of the Bank of England before they arrived at the place of payment. My lords, our construction secured, therefore, the money to be had in such a way as to enable those payments to be made on the spot, and in a place where it should be convenient for such persons to receive it; where they were known and sure to be attended to. But this was not the only object of the act of parliament. It was not only necessary to leave the money passing out from the Bank free and at the control and discretion of the paymaster in that respect, but this act had other objects, and those most material to the welfare of the country, and which it has carried most completely into effect. It had for its object, to prevent premature calls by the treasurer on the Treasury, by warranting no payment unless a letter from one of the boards certified the existence of the call, and accompanied the memorial of the treasurer to the Treasury. It was passed for the purpose of ascertaining balances while the services were performing. It was to secure to the public an official account instead of a personal account. It was through that medium to confine the account of the treasurer of the navy to one account, instead of being distributed into five or six, according to the number of ex-treasurers who have open accounts. It was to prevent the office of ex-treasurer from continuing an existing office. It was to make a treasurer, when he went out of office, hand over all the money (as the noble lord did every penny of it) to his successor, in order that the accounts might be all carried on by one set of clerks, under one master, in one set of books, and not according to the irregularity that was practised before that time, to have as many books open as there were ex-treasurer's accounts outstanding. It was to secure a yearly audit of the account, by calling upon the treasurer to make up his accounts each year, and have them audited at the end of the year, instead (to the disgrace of this country and the administration of the Exchequer) of having accounts in the Exchequer, as was the case with those of lord Ranelagh, in the year 1782, a treasurer who went out of his treasurership in the reign of king William. These are the benefits of the act, and they were perfectly consistent with the objects the noble lord had in view, when he brought it in, for the purposes described in the third report of the commissioners of accounts, which exhibits this as the foundation of the regulations.

My lords, I have now concluded my observations on the statute, which I fear have extended to a greater length than may have been agreeable to your lordships, but in a matter of such magnitude and importance, it is highly necessary that the sound construction of the law should be understood; for upon that, according to my conception of this cause, the question turns.

The impression which the facts have made upon my mind, from long and attentive investigation of them; an impression completely confirmed by the powerful and able manner in which they have been stated to your lordships by my learned friend, lead me to the conclusion, that every part of the facts, and every motive and intention of the noble defendant will be made too clear to make it possible to rest a doubt upon them; and I trust that your lordships will agree with me in the conclusion which I come to, that you must acquit the noble defendant both upon the fact and upon the law.

My lords, I would wish to take this part of the case in the order of date as much as possible; but it is impossible for me to approach it, without first considering the manner in which this case has been treated by the honourable and learned manager who summed up the evidence for the prosecution. My lords, I know the talents, and I know the experience of that learned person, and I cannot help thinking that he has applied all the ingenuity of his most fertile mind, in order to give your lordships a wrong impression of this case; and, give me leave to say, an impression, as I conceive, totally inconsistent with those genuine principles of administrative criminal justice, which I am sure will prevail this in high tribunal, as it does in every inferior tribunal of the kingdom.

After the opening speech, the witnesses were brought, and the evidence was laid before your lordships; and it seems to me a most remarkable feature in this case, that the solicitor-general, in addressing you for the purpose of observing upon that evidence, by the tenor and plan of his address, endeavoured to satisfy your lordships that you were to draw presumptions contrary to the evidence adduced by himself and the other managers. Or, in other words, that a great criminal prosecutor in the highest court of criminal justice in the country, instead of resting upon the facts proved, and giving credit to the witnesses who have been brought to prove those facts, attempts to evade the facts as they are proved by the prosecutor, and to state presumptions not only distinct from the facts proved, but contrary to them, and at variance with them.

My lords; I shall have occasion to explain this principle as I go along, and to satisfy your lordships, I trust, that it is not according to any course of proceeding, and is inconsistent with general justice, that when your lordships have clear and distinct evidence, given to you upon oath, sanctioned by the credit which is given to the witnesses by those who call them, that they should destroy the effect of that testimony by having recourse to presumptive evidence to refute the proof.

To enforce by presumption and inference, the evidence given, I understand; but to refute it is against all rule; and I trust the case between us will appear to be this, that we shall confirm the testimony of their witnesses by presumptive evidence, which will render the case conclusive for the defendant, whilst they cannot undermine the evidence of their own witnesses by contradictory presumptions. But even if they could do so, consistently with the principles of justice, still I contend that their inferences do not warrant their conclusions.

In the proceedings against the bishop of Rochester, my lord Cowper said, "The wisdom and goodness of our law appear in nothing more remarkably, than in the perspicuity, certainty, and clearness of the evidence it requires to fix a crime upon any man, whereby his life, his liberty, or his property may be concerned: herein we glory and pride ourselves, and are justly the envy of all our neighbour nations. Our law, in such cases, requires evidence so clear and convincing, that every by-stander, the instant he hears it, must be fully satisfied of the truth of it; it admits of no surmises, innuendos, forced consequences, or harsh constructions, nor any thing else to be offered as evidence, but what is real and substantial, according to the rules of natural justice and equity."*

My lords, I am sure this doctrine will be applied by your lordships in your consideration of this case, and that you will not permit any strained constructions to break in upon the clear meaning and intendment of the evidence. I have already stated that the noble defendant has not one shilling of the public money in his possession:—that he has paid over every sixpence that he has ever received:—that he never delayed any service:—that the public have never suffered by him, either as to the activity of the service or the security of the money: and it must always be remembered that the object of this prosecution is to make out that the noble lord has, against conscience and against law, availed himself of the public money in his hands, or in the hands of his deputy, for the purpose of making gain to himself.

My lords, I believe I state the question between the honourable managers and the noble defendant distinctly and fairly, when I say, that he is not here to be tried for any petty delinquency—that he is not impeached for an accidental mistake—that he is not here to be caught by any incautious conduct, at any particular time,—but that he is here upon his trial, on the prosecution of all the Commons of England, as a statesman, having held a high office, in which he has misdeigned himself, by having systematically, illegally, and corruptly made use of the money of the state for his own private lucre and gain. Whether avariciously, for the purpose of hoarding it, whether for the purpose of spending it ostentatiously, or whether for the purpose of maintaining or promoting his ambitious views, is not the consideration.

The question in this case, my lords, as in all crimes, is the motive of the heart—"Actor non est reus nisi mens sit rea." The man is not guilty if his heart is not guilty, and it is for the prosecutors to establish the corrupt mind. Whereas, if I show the noble lord, on the other hand, to have displayed uniformly, not only at the recent period as to which your lordships have had evidence to-day, by which he appears at once to have rejected 34,000*l.* of public money, which he might have retained; but that in his early days, when he was toiling in a laborious profession, and ascending, by degrees, from the labour of that profession to the great heights to which he rose in political life—if I can show you, I say, that he uniformly disregarded money, as has indeed been distinctly admitted by the honourable manager who opened this case—if he has been not only untainted with avarice, but distinguished for liberality—if such has been invariably the character of the noble lord, it will require very strong proof indeed, to unsettle the presumptions of innocence to be drawn from such a character. It is not by searching in the garret of the window of the dead paymaster, Mr. Douglas, or by bringing old Bank-notes from the dead Bank-note office of the Bank of England, that such presumptions are to be defeated. It is not by detailing particular stock transactions. It is not by the accidental overdrawing of accounts, where the parties never charged interest against each other, and where it was an open account from its beginning in 1786, to its close in the year 1800, that such a presumption in favour of innocence is to be repelled. It is not by such evidence, against such clear distinct admitted habits of liberality in all money transactions, that the noble lord is to be convicted of corruptly and systematically attempting to pilfer from the public those miserable sums of money with which he is charged, to the evidence of which I have thus generally referred, and which I now proceed to examine in detail.

And first as to that part of the case which relates to Mr. Douglas's paymastership, which consisted of all the first treasurership of the noble lord, and the first part of his last treasurership. That case, according to the manner in which it has been laid before your lordships, goes to three points: it relates to the question upon 10,000*l.*; I mean the first 10,000*l.* The question with respect to the two Bank-notes of 1,000*l.* each relates to it, and it respects the money which went from Mure and Atkinson's to Payne's, and from Payne's to the Bank. I will take it in that order, only wishing to observe, that when I am taking under consideration the 10,000*l.* in the first instance, I mean likewise to consider the 10,000*l.* which is in proof before your lordships, as having been taken somewhere about the year 1792, and which is part of that money which stood at the Chest account. I do this, my lords, because the argument is the same upon both, and because it would be coming back again to the argument which I shall be under the necessity of addressing to your lordships now, if I were to defer it to its proper chronological stage in the cause.

With regard to the first 10,000*l.* the charge is made in two ways. It is first taken by itself, and it is alleged, that he is criminal with respect to this 10,000*l.* because, being a public accountant, he did contumaciously declare in the House of Commons, that he would not tell what he had done with it; and next, it is charged that he took the money to use it for himself.

With regard to the first of these charges, I have already stated that it is in proof before your lordships, that the 10,000*l.* is not in the noble lord's pocket: he is not a defaulter for that 10,000*l.* The noble lord, long before the time when he made the declaration which is supposed in itself to constitute a distinct crime, had paid that money to the public. If I understand the nature of this allegation, it is, that a public accountant refusing to declare to the House of Commons, how he has used any part of the public money, is guilty of a misdemeanor. But this does not apply to the noble lord: he was not a public accountant at the time he refused to make the disclosure; he had paid over all his money; and, with regard to the question, how this money was employed in the intermediate time, that belongs to the other branch of the charge; namely, the inference that he made money by it for his own private advantage. Not being able to understand this part of the charge of contumacy farther than I have stated, or what is the nature of the crime of taking the 10,000*l.* and having refused to disclose the intermediate use of it, I here leave it.

With regard to the other branch of this charge, I shall take the liberty of making a few observations in addition to those which have been made by my learned friend, Mr. Plumer.

Your lordships have heard much of the Chest account, and have heard that there were placed to this Chest account certain sums of money given to the noble lord by what have been called requisitions. Those requisitions were answered immediately, without Mr. Trotter making any inquiry as to the application of the money. The first 10,000*l.* constituted a part of that account; so did the second sum of 10,000*l.* taken in 1792; and the sum of 40,000*l.* taken in 1796. The two lastmentioned sums are understood to have been applied to public purposes. Lord Melville, in what has been called his confession, says, the first 10,000*l.* was likewise applied to public purposes; and with this evidence your lordships are called to make an inference contrary to the uniform tenour of the noble lord's life—contrary to his character and conduct—You are called upon to conclude that it was applied to purposes of private emolument instead of public purposes.

Your lordships will recollect, that, in order to aid the evidence in this respect, recourse has been had to the noble lord's declarations before the commissioners of naval inquiry; and it has been stated by the solicitor-general, that the noble lord very boldly avowed, in the face of the House of Commons (in a manner the honourable manager censured severely), that he had taken the money; but, when before the commissioners of naval inquiry, the noble lord had sheltered himself under the act of parliament. Now, I wish your lordships to examine the particulars of that evidence, and, in this stage of the cause, to correct the misrepresentation which has been made by the honourable and learned manager, respecting the character and conduct of the noble lord, on those two different occasions.

The noble lord was placed in a very singular situation, when he was examined by the commissioners. The sum of forty thousand pounds, received in 1796, the sum of ten thousand pounds, received in 1792, and the sum of ten thousand pounds, received in Mr. Douglas's time, were all taken for public services. But the service to which the 40,000*l.* had been applied, had not then been disclosed. The noble lord was of opinion, that their uses ought not to be disclosed, and that it was as injurious to the public service to disclose the application of the 40,000*l.* as any of the sums the use of which has not yet been disclosed.—My lords, there was another circumstance which the noble lord had learned; but he had learned it at a period very long subsequent to the time when the thing had been originally done. He had learnt that Mr. Trotter had kept the public money at Mr. Coutts's in a mixed account. But he was not told it until after he had received his first letter to attend the commissioners of naval inquiry in 1804. Mr. Trotter having acted, in some respects, as lord Melville's man of business, from whom lord Melville received money, and to whom his lordship's salary and other monies were paid, his lordship learned that, for a great number of years, the private monies of Trotter, the private monies of the noble lord himself, and the public monies of the country, were all mixed and put together, in one account, in the name of Mr. Trotter. Owing to this circumstance, communicated at the time, and in the manner which I have just stated, the noble defendant found himself in a predicament which rendered it impossible for him to come forward with a positive declaration that he had received no benefit from the public money. Because, having learned for the first time, that he had received his payments out of the mixed account, he might have been paid when the balance was against him, and so receive benefit without being conscious of it. So that, when asked whether he authorized Mr. Trotter to apply the public money to his use, the noble lord gave a distinct answer, by stating, that he never had given any such authority. But when he was asked, whether he had received any profit from the public money, he declined answering the question, protecting himself under the clause in the act; and why should he not take advantage of the clause of the act of parliament, without any implication of guilt arising from his doing so? Having been informed, for the first time, after a practice had prevailed for ten years, of using this mixed account for the purpose of making all payments for the noble lord, for the purpose of receiving all money for the noble lord, for the purpose of receiving all private, as well as public money; when he at last knew that he had been served out of that account—could he, could any person that had any regard for character, with the knowledge of such a fact, just communicated, have done otherwise?

Thus circumstanced, it had become impossible for him, not from any act of his own, but from the concealed act of another person, to be able to say with certainty, that, in the course of the payments which had been made to him, he had not, unconscious of it, received some benefit. Certainly he could not declare that he had received none, and it could not be expected that he should admit having received any, when he was ignorant of the cause by which it might have been received.

I trust, therefore, that your lordships must feel satisfied, that the noble lord, thus cruelly situated (from no fault of his, but owing to the delinquency of Mr. Trotter), exercised a sound and honourable discretion, and that it would not have been sound, or honourable, for the noble lord, whatever the conscious innocence of his own mind might have been, with regard to the perception of profit, to have rashly ventured upon the oath which was tendered to him, when a clause in the act afforded protection of which the noble lord might honourably, and conscientiously avail himself.

Such is the character of the noble lord's confession, such the character of his concealment. A conscientious feeling, and a sense of public duty, in the two different instances that I have stated, led him to decline answering, and that led to his misfortune. But his declining to answer would not have led to the misfortune of lord Melville, if the fear of personal responsibility, civil and criminal, had not led to concealment on the part of Mr. Trotter. If that gentleman had not been apprehensive of being charged criminally; if he had not been alarmed for the effects of a civil suit, the Commons of Great Britain, and the public at large, would, at an early period, have seen this matter in a very different light. But it has been reserved for your lordships, after this cruel state of intermediate suffering by the noble defendant, to have the whole of that secret, which was locked up in Mr. Trotter's breast, disclosed in your presence, and with it the motives of the noble lord unfolded and explained; by which the purity of his intentions, the uncorruptness of his mind, his disregard of money, will be evinced and established.

My lords, the use of the 40,000*l.* placed at the Chest-account in 1796, was disclosed in the year 1805, and a bill of indemnity passed on the subject. Now, it requires no great stretch of imagination to suppose, that this disclosure might have been made in the year 1796, or 1797. I will suppose that that disclosure had then been made. I ask your lordships what must have been the answer of that great and eminent statesman, Mr. Pitt (whose eulogium has been pronounced, and whose purity has been vouched for by the honourable manager, who opened this charge), if he (Mr. Pitt) had been called upon for a declaration as to the application of the 40,000*l.* at the period to which I have alluded. Must not that honourable and exalted statesman have demurred? must not he have said to the House of Commons, you have trusted and confided in me for more than twelve long years: you have been accustomed to believe that I have administered the affairs of the country with integrity. You have been accustomed to think that I am fit to be intrusted with secret service money to an immense amount. I took from the coffer of the state, that which I have again restored to its proper place. I am not a corrupt man. I made no improper use of it. I have restored it entire; and, in the mean time, it has done an extraordinary public service. The fulness of time may or may not come, when I shall have it in my power to disclose that service. If it does come, I will present a clean bosom to you. If it does not come, I must still ask for that trust and confidence which you have always reposed in me. Would not such a representation have been satisfactory to the House of Commons? Would that answer have been considered as ground for an impeachment? Would that mode of treating the application of the 40,000*l.* in 1796, have made the country say that Mr. Pitt was to be put upon his trial for corruption? My lords, how was it in the year 1796? The declaration of the fact, with regard to the application of that 40,000*l.* would have been the ruin of the country, and the destruction of individuals concerned in the transaction. The coffers of the country would have been exposed in their barrenness, in the midst of a difficult, disastrous, and ruinous war; and the individuals to whom the 40,000*l.* was advanced, would have been thrown by repayment into the jaws of bankruptcy. The time came when the circumstances of the country altered, when the individuals to whom the money was advanced had actually failed,—Messieurs Boyd and Benfield, to whom the money had been lent to enable them to fulfil important public engagements,—and Mr. Pitt was of opinion that it might be disclosed with safety to the country, and could no longer be injurious to individuals. My lords, it is disclosed; it was an application of that sort which might be disclosed; but the application might have been of a different nature; it might have been such an application as the state required in 1792. There might have been midnight meetings, threatening the state. It might have been applied to obtain secrets to enable the ministers to secure the safety of the country, the ignorance of which might have involved it in ruin. My lords, in that case, the application could not have been disclosed.

My lords, the case which I state is not hypothetical; it is a case respecting the application of public money, where, if the question had been asked, and the disclosure refused, in 1796, there must have been, from the general conduct of the minister, a presumption of innocence. I ask, then, what is the difference of the case in question and that which I suppose? "Mutato nomine de illo fabula narratur." Who was Mr. Pitt? The minister of the time, the friend of lord Melville, his bosom friend in private, his public friend politically. Attached to each other, following the same system in politics—thinking, as it were, with the same mind—pursuing the same objects—possessing alike the confidence of the country, sitting daily together in the House of Commons, in mutual and constant communication on public affairs, trusted alike by the representatives of the people, and by the king.

My lord Melville has applied 10,000*l.* at one time, and 10,000*l.* at another, for secret service, and has regularly restored the money to its proper place. This was not like the secret service money of the secretary of state, where the law makes the oath of that officer a voucher, and supposes it fitly applied. The money employed in this case being replaced, it required no voucher. To the public there has been no pecuniary loss or inconvenience, and the particular services which it was meant to promote, were performed in full time. Under these circumstances, your lordships are called on to refuse your confidence to lord Melville's declaration, and to find him guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor. Lord Melville, who was the private and the political friend of Mr. Pitt the minister in whom King, Lords and Commons confided. You are required to convict lord Melville, in a case in which Mr. Pitt would not even have been accused, and yet it is impossible to distinguish them but by their names, for their political acts and public principles were the same throughout; they equally participated in the application of the money. In another situation, I might question the wisdom of those acts, or the soundness of those principles. But they were wise in the opinion of the country, and of the legislature; they were applauded for eighteen years together. Shall it then be said, that the mere circumstance of a statesman having said in the House of Commons, that he would not disclose the application of secret service money, is to be considered as a crime in itself, and to be held to afford an inference of corruption, not only in despite of the conclusions to be drawn respecting the analogy it bears to the 40,000*l.* but in despite of the life, character, and conduct of the noble defendant? My lords, I say that the presumption attempted by the managers, is violent, strained, and unnatural; whereas, the presumption I contend for, falls in with all the facts and circumstances of the case, with the collateral and analogous matter, and with the character of the accused.

So, my lords, it stands, even upon the dry question of inference; but, my lords, we are not here, according to lord Cowper, to infer criminality. We are not, in the language of lord Bacon, to decide by strains of wit or art. No, my lords, we are here assembled in the first criminal court in the country, to do justice according to the proof. Recollect, my lords, you are here in the trial of one of your peers, in a criminal case, and that in a criminal case the prosecutors cannot infer the use of money; on the contrary, they are bound to trace its use. If, then, they are bound to show that money has been made use of, are your lordships to infer guilt contrary to the presumptions arising from concomitant and acknowledged facts?

But it may be said, that here have been two Bank-notes traced, and these two notes have shown that the noble lord had an early dealing with the money belonging to the treasurer of the navy; and having that early dealing proves that he was prone to use the money of the office for gain. Now, my lords, let us see what inference is to be derived from this part of the case; because, I can assure your lordships that, if I understand this case at all, it is one in which I do not think it by any means the interest of the noble defendant to omit the discussion of any part of it. There is no part that we are anxious to keep from the light; we wish to discuss it, and, as my learned friend said in his address to your lordships, to sift it to the bran.

There were two Bank-notes which were received by Mr. Douglas at the Exchequer, under particular circumstances, so well known from the evidence, that I need not recite them, part of 50,000*l.* issued from the Exchequer, and part of 93,000*l.* issued from thence. Out of those sums, two Bank notes of 1,000*l.* each, part of those receipts, have been produced, the transaction having passed twenty-four years antecedently to the time at which your lordships are sitting, to try the criminality of that fact. These two notes were paid, one to Drummond's banking-house, the other to Moffatt's, and the proof is, that they were paid to lord Melville's account in both; and I do not mean to dispute that the 600*l.* which stands to his credit, under the word "received," came from one of those two Bank-notes, and that the 1,000*l.* Bank-note that went to Moffatt's to take up Newbigging's bill, likewise was one of those two Bank-notes.

The conclusion, which your lordships are called upon to draw in this part of the case is that because these Bank-notes are found at the respective bankers, one at the distance of seven days, and the other at the distance of fifteen days, from the time when Mr. Douglas took them from the Exchequer; and because they are the same Bank-notes that were received at the Exchequer; that, therefore, the noble lord having received those notes must have received them as the money of the navy, and not as his own money. Now, does it follow, that because the noble lord received a Bank-note which had been received at the Exchequer by the paymaster of the navy, which was afterwards paid to him, that that is navy money? Oh! my lords, we are in a cruel situation, in this case, in many respects. I have stated already, that the presumptions contended for in one part of the case, are directly contrary to the proof given on the part of the prosecutor: and here we have documentary evidence, without a single witness to the res gesta: and, then, we are told by the honourable and learned manager, who summed up this case, that we should have an opportunity of giving evidence to refute the facts which they established, when he knew, from the nature of the case, that it was impossible. He knew that Mr. Douglas was in his grave, that Mr. Trotter was their witness, and that all the other persons connected with lord Melville, and with his books and papers, constituted their testimony, and that we could not have any other evidence to give, than the very short evidence we have given. How, then, could your lordships have the case altered in point of evidence, when Mr. Atkinson is dead—Mr. Henry Drummond is dead—Mr. Douglas is dead? How can the production of mere documentary evidence, without the accompanying transactions, the res gesta, represented by living witnesses, be considered as proof of guilt? Suppose this a civil case, the case of a trustee, and that the trustee was a person immersed in a great deal of business, of a public or a private nature. Suppose his attention constantly called to affairs different from that of the payment of money; suppose him to have received money on account of the person to whom he was trustee, that he had had it paid at his bankers: suppose, that out of the money paid, there were some stray hundred pounds in a situation like those notes which had remained unexamined, to the distance of twenty-four years, when all the parties were dead, who could have accounted for the particular circumstances by which this money came there; would it be borne to come at a distance of twenty-four years, and by tracing a Bank-note from one place to another, and finding it paid to the account of this trustee, that, after the lapse of twenty-four years, when all the persons were dead, who could have explained the circumstances; when no account could be given of the transaction, that the mere payment of the Bank-note should be considered to be a presumption of fraud and breach of trust? My lords, the safety of man is at an end, if that be the law of this country.

At the time when these transactions took place, the noble lord enjoyed the situation of lord advocate of Scotland, with a considerable salary, having extensive practice at the bar of Scotland. He was, at that time, keeper of the signet, treasurer of the navy, and had real property in Scotland, from which your lordships have seen, by the evidence, that remittances were made. In short, he had funds at that time to the amount of eight, nine, or ten thousand pounds a-year. Shall it be considered to be an inference of guilt, in such a case, that 600*l.* was placed to his credit, as part of a Bank-note, which issued from the Exchequer in a navy payment, in one instance, and 1,000*l.* in another? are those notes to be considered as navy money, when he had other abundant sources, from which such sums might have been derived? when the payment might have been made innocently in those very notes; this, too, at the distance of twenty-four years from the transaction, when all, who could have thrown light upon the matter, are long since dead. It is farther to be observed, that Mr. Douglas is proved to have managed lord Melville's private affairs, and to have received his private monies, and whether, when he paid those to his banker, he paid with one note or another, was a matter of indifference. Under such circumstances, it would be contrary to the humane regulations of the law of this country—contrary to probability, and to the rules which govern men in judging of human actions, to draw a conclusion of guilt from the mere circumstance of those Bank-notes being received in navy payments at the Exchequer.

My lords, I come now to the case of Mr. Atkinson, and with that I shall conclude this first branch of the cause. Your lordships have certainly a proof of navy money having been at Mr. Atkinson's, the Bank-notes having been traced to Payne and Smith's, and afterwards to the Bank, in payment to the treasurer's account. But I ask, does that amount to any thing more than this, that this sum of money was deposited in Mr. Atkinson's hand, and that it was paid from Mr. Atkinson, through the medium of Payne and Smith, back again to the treasurer's account at the Bank. Your lordships will recollect, that this was at a period of time before the act of the 25th of the king had passed, and that there was no regulation, at that time, with regard to the place of deposit. That the only matter for consideration (with a discussion of which I do not trouble your lordships, after what my friend has said) is that which relates to the alleged violation of the warrant. Where is there any evidence of any money having been made, any interest got, or any profit acquired by the noble lord having made his deposit at Mure and Atkinson's? It appears from the evidence, that Mure and Atkinson were at that time persons in the highest credit, and the noble lord had a perfect right at that time to make his deposit where he pleased. I say he has that right now, after the sums are assigned; he has that right now, according to the course of office; but at that time there was no impediment to it, at any period from its issue to its application.

My lords, before I conclude what I consider to be the first æra of this prosecution, permit me to observe, that the periods of time at which those payments were made, were periods of the ex-treasurership. I mean the payments from Mr. Atkinson back to the Bank. It is unnecessary for me to stop to argue that Mr. Dundas, as ex-treasurer, was no longer under the obligations which were imposed on him when he was actually treasurer, yet there is not a scintilla of evidence to show that even at that time he ever made a single sixpence of the public money in his hands. This, therefore, affords an additional presumption that he is not guilty of the crime laid to his charge; on the contrary, your lordships know that he delivered over a balance of 56,000*l.* to the Bank, in 1783, at once—every thing except that 10,000*l.* which he has always declared was out on public service, but which he has since paid.

My lords, I come now, as I stated to your lordships, to the second æra of the case; namely, Mr. Trotter's appointment, and the administration of the paymastership under Mr. Trotter: and this is a part of the case which I approach certainly with a considerable degree of anxiety. Not an anxiety founded upon the difficulty which I feel in dealing with it upon the part of the noble defendant, but the difficulty which I feel of dealing with it as it respects the witness.

My lords, I am quite sure that the general character of that person is precisely what the honourable manager gave him in the opening speech. I have known him long and intimately. I lament his deviation in this particular instance from the general course of his life, and that he should have done any thing which I know must be so contrary to the natural rectitude of his feelings, as to have brought his patron, his protector, and his benefactor into the situation in which he now stands. My lords, I mean no personal offence, and I hope I shall not pronounce a word that will give any personal uneasiness to any individual who hears me; but, my lords, to do justice to this case, I must deal with the evidence fairly as I find it. Soon after Mr. Trotter was appointed to the paymastership of the Navy, the office was transferred from Broadstreet to Somerset-place. The office before had been carried on in the heart of the city, close to the Bank; afterwards it was to be transferred to this end of the town, at a great distance from the Bank, and in this new situation all the business of the payments was to be carried on.

It is a most important part in the consideration of this case, that your lordships should see with perfect distinctness, that the permission which was given by lord Melville to carry on the business at Coutts's was confined to the assigned balances, and that it was meant by him that the money upon those assigned balances should remain at Mr. Coutts's. It was not a permission that Mr. Trotter should take the money any where—that he should take any amount of money any where whether assigned or not. It was not a permission that he should deal with it, in its intermediate time, in any speculations—in discounting private bills—in buying navy or victualling bills—in buying Exchequer bills, or in the purchase of stock. It was lord Melville's intention, and I shall make it demonstrable by observations on the evidence, that it was lord Melville's clear intention that the assigned money placed at Coutts's should remain there, and that he believed, up to the period when he wrote his first letter to the board of naval inquiry, that his orders had been faithfully executed, and that the money had always remained at an official account at Coutts's.

A great deal has been said and insinuated, respecting trust being improperly reposed in Mr. Trotter. I ask in whom is man to place trust, if lord Melville was not to place trust in Mr. Trotter? As I have already stated the system of human action, all the machinery of moral conduct in this world, rests upon trust and confidence being placed somewhere. You must found upon trust and confidence, or you cannot act in human affairs. Here then is Mr. Trotter, recommended by Mr. Pitt, well connected in the country, a respectable person, connected with rich individuals in the business of banking; having a brother who was very prosperous in trade, and who has acquired a great fortune—Mr. Trotter himself well acquainted with the service, having held a situation in it; having, when in that situation, proposed some excellent plans of reform in the office, and it was chiefly owing to that plan of reform that the private recommendations of Mr. Trotter had their effect with lord Melville, who viewed him as a person by whom the business could be well executed; and had no reason to consider him at that time in any other light.

Mr. Trotter, it is to be observed, with all those circumstances to establish him as a person of trust, had, nevertheless, without lord Melville's knowledge, made use of a small sum of the public money, before lord Melville permitted its removal from the Bank to Coutts's, which shows that money-making was commenced by Mr. Trotter before that removal, and did not arise from the application to lord Melville to make the removal to Coutts's bank.

When Mr. Trotter proposed its removal to Coutts's, he addressed lord Melville with a view to an official reform, confining it to an official reform, as the whole evidence from beginning to end shows. But before I observe on the passages of his evidence, I must again ask both the honourable manager who opened, and the learned manager who summed up this case, how they can attempt to set aside the testimony of Mr. Trotter? By what principle can they say, that a witness whom they called, whom they characterised as an honest man, who has poured out his heart, as it were, to this House, is now to be discredited?

Let us see then what Mr. Trotter says with regard to this permission to remove the money from the Bank to Coutts's. In the 129th page of the printed evidence it is said, "you stated that permission was given by lord Melville to draw money from the Bank of England to Coutts's bank; whether the only reason represented by you to lord Melville for that measure, was not to facilitate the official convenience?"—"Entirely so; I always stated so; the convenience that would arise, and the greater security of the money."*

Here your lordships will observe, there is not a single ingredient but official convenience, and your lordships will not forget that Mr. Trotter said, with respect to the making money, that he had power of drawing, and that it was competent to him to do that equally when the money was at the Bank, only that it might have increased his delinquency. What he meant by its increasing his delinquency, I do not know; but the fact is certainly sufficiently proved, both that he did, and that he could make money, by drawing it from the Bank, before its removal to Coutts's, and applying it to his own profit; consequently, removing to Coutts's is established positively to be a matter for official convenience; and, negatively, that it was not with a view to make any money by it, as he did that before the permission: so that the money-making is not a necessary adjunct to the removal to Coutts's; and, therefore, the removal thither not to be attended with an inference of guilt. In page 130, it is stated—"But was there then, or at any subsequent time, any permission given by lord Melville to draw monies from the Bank for any other purpose?"—"Never." No permission was given by lord Melville to draw money from the Bank for any other purpose. In page 129, it is stated—"State, if you can recollect, how you represented that it would facilitate the convenience of the office that that transfer should take place?"—"I represented the inconvenience that would attend the payments from the distance of the Bank, and proposed to his lordship that a banker nearer should be allowed to keep the money in his hands till I found it necessary to issue it to the sub-accountants." And then it goes on—"Did you state also to lord Melville in what manner the money would be more secure?"—"I represented to him the danger of sending in drafts to the Bank every day by messengers who were obliged to bring out the produce of these in cash to supply the daily payments." It then goes on—"was there the least mention to lord Melville at the time application was made for his permission to make the change you have stated, of any private emolument to be derived to any body from it?"—"None whatever; it was never in lord Melville's contemplation, and I do not remember that it was in my own at that time." "Was the permission which was given to draw money from the Bank to be deposited till it was wanted in Coutts's bank, entirely confined to the money that would be wanted for official convenience?"—"I do not know that the conversation extended to so great a length, as to go into that minute part of the subject." "But was there then, or at any subsequent time, any permission given by lord Melville to draw monies from the Bank for any other purpose?"—"Never."

* Vide Page 932.

Now, my lords, without forcing your lordships to hear a recital of all the questions and answers upon this head of the case, I rely upon these, and I say, my lords, that these, together with the fact to which I have referred, of Mr. Trotter's having proved that he did actually use the public money for gain to himself, when it was kept solely at the Bank, form a body of evidence which is incontrovertible, which no insinuation or presumption can do away; which is established upon the oath of a witness who has an interest to swear directly the other way, if truth would permit it; who is still liable to have the order of the House of Commons revived to render him civilly responsible, and who, under all these circumstances, gives his testimony clearly in favour of the defendant, by proving that the change of deposit from the Bank to Coutts's was founded upon a regulation purely official, and not for the purpose of individual profit. It was done to avoid the risk in the transit of the money by the messenger who was to carry it, and secure the official convenience of the payment to the sub-accountants, by the vicinity to Messrs. Coutts's bank. Lord Melville, therefore, could not have in his contemplation any thing but official regulation upon the representation which Mr. Trotter swears he made to him. It could form no part of lord Melville's consideration that this was done for the sake of emolument to Mr. Trotter, still less with a view to emolument for himself. This is so clear, plain, and distinct, that it appears to me to require no amplification to enforce it, and that no argument can make it stronger; it stands upon the simple state of the fact, by a witness who surely there is not the least reason to suppose has, during the whole of his testimony, given any thing but clear, distinct, and honest evidence.

There is the examination of lord Melville likewise, in evidence before your lordships, which was taken before the commissioners of naval inquiry. I must request your lordships to peruse that testimony, because you will see there, what the nature of lord Melville's conception of the regulation was, and that he too had at that time no other conception, but that it was a measure of mere official convenience.

I now come to the question regarding Mr. Trotter having made money to a very considerable amount, to the fact of his having had very large balances in his hand, and to the fact of his having increased those balances in proportion as the nature of the service and the supplies required for a war, enabled him to increase them. That Mr. Trotter increased those balances is a fact, about which there can be no doubt; but my lord Melville contemplating Mr. Trotter's antecedent conduct, founded in representations such as I have stated, is not to be tried by what Mr. Trotter has himself denominated his subsequent delinquency. You are not to take it, that the thing was permitted because it was done; and you will not suppose that a person in lord Melville's situation, placing confidence in the person he had appointed, having every reason to continue that confidence, from finding that the business of the office went on regularly, that the machine never stood still for a moment, that no complaint was made, that all the payments were regular, you are not, I say, to suppose that lord Melville knew the fact, or because Mr. Trotter's situation in life appeared to be improved, that he was therefore to suspect that he used the public money. Lord Melville knew Mr. Trotter to be connected with persons of wealth and consideration, knew him to be a person who had much opportunity of having intercourse with monied men, and one who might have other means of enriching himself than by flying to the public coffer of the country. Lord Melville at that time having his mind constantly engaged in great affairs of state, was not likely to consider Mr. Trotter's advance in life, as any thing but the pure fruit of honest industry. An unsuspecting man like lord Melville never would have dreamt that it arose from any other cause; and I think the most suspicious mind that ever was infused into a human body, finding a person constantly acting well and diligently in his office, reputably connected, and appearing fair and honest to the world, could not have drawn any other conclusion.

When lord Melville quitted the office in the year 1800, lord Harrowby was appointed; in 1802, Mr. Bathurst was appointed; both of whom continued Mr. Trotter in the office of paymaster, and neither of them ever suspected Mr. Trotter to have been guilty of these malversations. I therefore say, that taking it upon the common outside and face of things, there was no reason for suspicion. If there was no reason for suspicion, there could only be trust and confidence.

But it is contended that lord Melville has admitted that he knew and allowed Mr. Trotter to make a profit from the money deposited at Coutts's. — Upon this part of the case, let us consider first, lord Melville's examination by the commissioners of naval inquiry, it is this: “* Did you authorize the paymaster, in or about the year 1786, to draw the money applicable to naval services from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private Banker?” “I cannot precisely fix the time, but I am certain that I did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge any money drawn from the Bank for public purposes in his private banker's hands during the period it was not demanded to the purposes for which it was drawn.” Then lord Melville is asked, “Did you give permission to the paymaster to withdraw the money from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private banker, with a view to his deriving any advantage or emolument therefrom?” “If it is meant to ask me whether I ever gave any direct authority to the paymaster to use the money in the manner above mentioned, I should answer, no—but I have no hesitation in saying, that I believed and understood he did, and never prohibited him from doing so; and I believe it was so understood by others at different times, when the establishment of the Navy-pay-office was under consideration, when certainly no competent provision was made for the person exercising that trust of great extent and responsibility.” That is the manner in which lord Melville states it; now I wish to show how Mr. Whitbread states it: he is asked upon cross-examination, “† Whether he does not distinctly recollect that the averment of lord Melville upon the subject of placing it was, that he had given no other permission but to remove the money from the Bank, to a private bank, for the convenience of appropriating it to the public service?” To which the honourable manager answers, “Certainly one of the reasons given by the noble lord was, that he had allowed the money to be removed to a private banker's for official convenience, but it did not appear to me that that was the only reason.” “Did he give any other reason besides?” To which the honourable manager answers, “Yes, I understood for the emolument of Mr. Trotter, and the noble lord described the manner in which he thought that emolument had accrued, namely, by interest paid by Mr. Coutts to Mr. Trotter for lodging that money.” Now this is the general understanding of Mr. Whitbread, with regard to lord Melville's conception of the profit; but the honourable manager's examination is not confined to positive evidence of what he conceives to have been the nature of the profit, upon which I shall observe presently, but he gives negative evidence, with regard to profit, for in the course of his examination he is asked, “‡ Whether upon recollecting yourself upon this subject, you mean to state that the noble defendant admitted that he knew or permitted any emolument to be derived to Mr. Trotter from the public money, save and except what resulted from its deposit at a private banker's for official convenience?” “The noble defendant stated that he had allowed the money to be placed at a private banker's for official convenience; and when there, he had allowed or permitted, or not prevented Mr. Trotter from making a private emolument of it; and that emolument arising from the interest he was to make of it from Mr. Coutts's.” Then this question is put—“The question is not whether he restricted him, but whether he said he knew of his having any other advantage excepting the advantage before stated?” “He did not say he even knew it, but only supposed it; he did not admit that he knew of any other.”

So that your lordships will observe that Mr. Whitbread in his testimony, giving an account of what lord Melville said, says that the noble lord did not say he knew it, he only supposed it, which is precisely similar to the testimony the noble lord himself gives before the commissioners of naval inquiry. “Whether he did not also state in the same speech, that he never knew that Mr. Trotter had invested any money in Exchequer or Navy bills?” “I believe he said so.” “That he never knew he had put any money upon security of stock?” “I believe he said so.” “That he never knew he had employed any money in discount of private bills?” “I believe he said so.” “That he never knew he had employed any money in the purchase of Bank or India stock?” “I believe he said so.” So that your lordships will observe, that the testimony of Mr. Whitbread in the first place, with regard to the nature of the emolument, establishes it to be by the money lying at Messieurs Coutts's, producing an interest to Mr. Trotter from Messieurs Coutts's, agrees perfectly with the noble lord; and that in his further cross-examination, he negatives the noble lord's knowledge of every other mode of making money. In this too, your lordships will observe, that Mr. Whitbread's account of lord Melville's testimony agrees perfectly with Mr. Trotter's account, so that the account that is given by Mr. Trotter, that lord Melville never knew that the money was taken out of Coutts's by Trotter, and lent for his emolument, is a correct account according to the testimony given by Mr. Whitbread, of what lord Melville declared, and it will not be permitted to the managers for the House of Commons to consider lord Melville's testimony, when given in evidence by them, to be so dealt with, as that they shall accept just such part as they choose, and not take the whole of it. They must take the whole together; it is the nature of all confessions, and all acknowledgments, that the whole must be taken together. If lord Melville's testimony or confession is to be considered as deserving of credit, in that which makes against himself, does it not stand equally pure and uncontaminated in that which makes for him? Is there any reason to say, that lord Melville is not as much the witness of truth (for this is all the while lord Melville's testimony given by Mr. Whitbread, and made evidence by the prosecutors), when he answers to what is in his favour, as when he answers to what is against him? Lord Melville is confirmed by their witness, Mr. Trotter, who has an interest directly the other way, if truth lay that way; and there is no other part of the evidence in this case, written or parol, that tends to disturb it.

* Page 805. † Page 894. ‡ Page 896.

Upon this part of the proof, then, there is a direct negative of lord Melville's knowledge of Mr. Trotter's employment of the public money, by loans or securities for his (Mr. Trotter's) gain: an absolute denial of lord Melville's knowledge of Trotter's employment of the public money in any way for his (lord Melville's) gain: and a declaration by lord Melville in the month of November, 1804, and in the month of June, 1805, to the commissioners of naval inquiry, perfectly consistent with this. Stating what Mr. Whitbread now states from his memory, namely, that he (lord Melville) supposed it was an allowance of interest by Mr. Coutts, and that that was the means, and the only means of emolument to Trotter.

Now, my lords, I will venture to say, that according to every rule which governs human testimony, according to all the probability by which human affairs are regulated, according to all principles which prevail in courts of justice, in their judgment in criminal matters, your lordships cannot infer guilt from the admission by lord Melville, that he supposed that Trotter's gain arose from Messieurs Coutts and Company's allowing interest for the money deposited there.

Observe how the matter stands; sir William Forbes, who has been long in business, as an eminent banker in Edinburgh, tells you the custom of bankers in that country; namely, that upon an account of ever so short a standing, it is the common usage to allow three per cent interest, and if it remains six months, four per cent. Was it unnatural that the noble lord; would it be unnatural that I, or that those who come from that part of the United Kingdom, should suppose, not inquiring very minutely into the mode of banking in this country, that the deposit should be attended with benefit to the party making it? I know that Mr. Coutts never did pay any interest; I know he would think it a degradation to suppose he did; I know a banker of eminence in this country would think it improper, by deviating from the common rule to tempt customers to his house by any thing but a fair belief of his credit; but it is not improbable, that a person conversant with the custom in Scotland, should suppose it had been so.

But suppose, instead of being lodged at Mr.

Coutts's, it had been lodged in the Bank of England, in Mr. Trotter's name, or in the names of the different sub-accountants, and that it had been the usage of the Bank to give interest for money so lodged; and suppose it to have been placed there without any breach of the law, would the supposition by lord Melville, that Trotter received such a benefit, be a crime in lord Melville? If then, instead of this, Mr. Trotter, by a private transaction, had received a small interest from Messieurs Coutts, the money being placed there without breach of law, and for a purpose purely official, would that be criminal in lord Melville, or would it remove or shake in any degree, the pedestal of innocence upon which I trust I have placed this transaction? The transaction is simply this: Mr. Trotter says to Mr. Dundas, there is danger in sending these drafts to the Bank; we cannot trust the messenger with thousands of pounds; there is a great distance between the Bank and the Pay-office; it is inconvenient, and a risk to themselves to go so far; permit me to send the money to Messieurs Coutts's for safe custody; the assigned public money which I have a right to draw. Lord Melville permits it, and then there is a conjecture, or if you will, a belief on the part of lord Melville, that Mr. Coutts may (contrary to the fact), give Mr. Trotter an interest for his deposits. Does that change its feature of a public account? Is it not still an account in the hands of Mr. Trotter? Is it not still an account in the regular course of the office? Is it not still an account in the hands of a legally entrusted paymaster? Is it not as much, and as completely an account at Mr. Coutts's, in the hands of a legally entrusted paymaster, as the money written off by Mr. Tierney to the sub-accountant, Mr. Swaffield, in the Bank of England, is an account to Mr. Swaffield in the Bank of England, and no longer an account of George Tierney, treasurer of the navy? It is not the change of place, as I said before, that alters the deposit, it is the change of person; it is the giving credit to the draft of a new man; and whether that was at the Bank, or at Mr. Coutts's, is not a question which will affect the law.

I have stated to your lordships then, that lord Melville agreed to the deposit at Coutts's, as a mere official regulation—That he knew nothing of Mr. Trotter's profit as he actually made it, but that he was totally ignorant of it—That what he suspected to be his profit, was a profit of a different kind; that is, a profit perfectly consistent with the official regulation, and with the assigned balance remaining at the place of deposit, until the service required it to be paid away—That he had no reason to suppose that it ever was in a different situation, until the month of June, 1804, when lord Melville (after the commissioners of naval inquiry had been instituted, and had commenced their examination of Mr. Trotter), was informed by Mr.

Trotter, to his infinite surprise and astonishment, that it had been so used, and was informed that the account at Coutts's, which he had conceived to be a pay-master's account, that the money which he had conceived to be, as it were, deposited in the strong box of Alexander Trotter, paymaster to the navy, at Mr. Coutts's, and with no other person whatever, turns out to be a mixed account, in which there are blended together, on one side of the account, all Mr. Trotter's receipts for the public, all Mr. Trotter's receipts for himself, all Mr. Trotter's receipts for lord Melville, all Mr. Trotter's receipts for other persons with whom he had money dealings; and on the other side of the account (what the honourable managers no doubt, to their great distress, were bound by their duty to look into), the petty payment of every individual who had a housekeeper's or washerwoman's bill paid by Mr. Trotter in his family, or by lord Melville's upper servant in his. I say this discovery of the mixed account was matter of utter astonishment to lord Melville. He conceived that account to be kept officially. Could he have conceived any thing else? when he found that in sixteen long years, during which a hundred and twenty-five millions of the money of the country had passed through his hands, there had not (notwithstanding this now blamed and calumniated official regulation) been a stop put for one instant to any one payment, however minute, or a single poor seaman, miserable widow, or orphan child sent from the Pay office at Somerset-place, without receiving the money that was due to them. How could suspicion infuse itself into any man's breast, under such circumstances as these? how could suspicion infuse itself into lord Melville's, when he found the whole business of his office going on regularly? and yet it is to be an article of charge against him now, because, perhaps, the strength of the other charges may not prove sufficient, that he has been guilty of official neglect, because he did not regularly inquire into the conduct of the office.

My lords, if we talk of official neglect, there is direct positive proof that there was none. The machine was put in motion by lord Melville, and went on without the smallest interruption to the last, in all inferior matters. With regard to the superior matters, you have it in evidence from Mr. Trotter, that upon every occasion, when extraordinary circumstances occurred, he always found lord Melville's ear open to the public concerns of the office, though extremely inattentive to his private affairs.

My lords, not only so, but with respect to the regulations for the pay of the navy, which have so much to do with the comfort of the sailors and their families, and which is the pure result of humanity, the result of kind consideration, the result of humane attention to those who are in the lower situations of life, and who require all the comforts that can possibly be administered, to make them happy; there you find the noble lord active in the discharge of his duty: and I will venture to say, with the exception of one statute, put upon the statute book by Mr. George Grenville, that no treasurer of the navy, until the noble lord was appointed, ever proposed any legislative regulation, and that there does not occur, from the existence of the Navy-pay-office, to the present time, any treasurer of the navy, except the noble lord, who has made it a part of his duty, by regulating the pay to reward the services of those brave men, to whose unrivalled intrepidity and courage it is owing that I am now enabled to address your lordships in the cause of innocence.

I state to your lordships, that there is not any one person, during the whole history of this important office, that has put upon the statute book laws more fraught with wisdom, or more congenial to humanity. Is such a person then to be supposed guilty of the sordid crime of peculation?

But to return to this mixed account. I wish to state to your lordships, a very short piece of evidence upon that subject; it is comprised in one sentence, but it is a most important sentence, because, certainly it would have given a very different character to this case, if lord Melville could be conceived to have had any knowledge of Mr. Trotter's mixed account. In that case, he would have been in a situation to have, with his own knowledge, participated in the public money, if it should have happened that he knew at any one time when he was supplied with money from that account, that there was less money of his at the credit of that account, than he (lord Melville) drew for. If this had been the case, lord Melville's knowledge of the mixed account would undoubtedly form a feature of suspicion, which would go a great way to fortify some of the inferences contended for by the managers; but the evidence upon that is distinct, and as short as it is distinct. It is in page 137, in these words: "Was the mode in which you kept your account with Mr. Coutts, and the mixture of private and public money entirely your own act, without any knowledge of lord Melville?" "It was an act entirely my own, and lord Melville never had any knowledge whatever of the manner in which I kept my accounts at Mr. Coutts's."

Now, my lords, it is unnecessary, after that positive declaration on the part of Mr. Trotter, which no re-examination has been able to shake, which no inference can by possibility turn aside, to say more. It is in corroboration of lord Melville's declarations of the reason given to the commissioners of naval inquiry, why he would not answer the question put by them, and proves the real truth of the fact. Here you have the witness of truth; you have Mr. Trotter declaring that lord Melville did not know any thing of it while it was going on; and that his lordship never knew any thing of it, until the month of June, 1804, appears by the evidence which the honourable managers have given, containing the account of lord Melville's depositions or answers, before the commissioners of naval inquiry. Therefore, my lords, I think I may state boldly to your lordships, that I have advanced to this point, that with regard to the first treasurership, your lordships will not say that it is possible to infer guilt: and as to the second treasurership, I think your lordships must say, that the regulation which was made by lord Melville, for moving the assigned money to Coutts's, at the instigation of Mr. Trotter, or rather, that regulation which Mr. Trotter could have made himself, which was not done by writing but was done by word, which Mr. Trotter may be said not so much to have asked lord Melville's authority to do, as to have thought it right to communicate to lord Melville when done, was a mere official regulation. That lord Melville was ignorant of the applying that regulation to any express object of personal profit, and that lord Melville was equally ignorant of Mr. Trotter having raised the mixed account, and having mingled together all the different monies, public and private, which passed through his hands.

My lords, in this situation of things, and with these impressions on your minds, I now proceed to examine the different items, which have been the subject of charge by the Commons. I stated to your lordships that I should, in the discussion of the first 10,000*l.*, discuss the second, but I believe in my address to your lordships, being hurried on with the heat and agitation of speaking, I omitted to state some things respecting that second 10,000*l.* I must, therefore, shortly observe, that your lordships will find that there is no evidence whatever, that that 10,000*l.* was drawn directly from the Bank, and applied to secret services; but that on the contrary, that 10,000*l.* was drawn from assigned monies at Mr. Coutts's; that it lay there as assigned money, at the time it was applied to secret services; that it was assigned for naval purposes; that it never has been finally applied to any other purpose, but has been restored to those naval purposes for which it was originally assigned; and that under all the presumptions to be derived from lord Melville's declaration compared with the history of the times (for this 10,000*l.* was applied in the period of 1792 and 1793) it is impossible, with any justice, to conclude that lord Melville used this for his particular profit. On this head, I beg again to refer your lordships to the arguments I have used, as to the analogy to be drawn from the 40,000*l.* the use of which has been disclosed, because its disclosure was no longer dangerous, either to the public or to individuals.

My lords, I come now to state to your lordships very shortly, the circumstances of the loan of 4,000*l.*, which is not alleged as a subject of criminal charge upon the articles, but is rather brought to prove a corrupt mind in lord Melville, by showing that he borrowed 4,000*l.* of Mr. Trotter, shortly after he (Mr. Trotter) came into office, and that Mr. Trotter lent that money without interest. A great deal was said by the honourable and learned manager who summed up, of the meanness of lord Melville for taking this money without interest. It is a singular circumstance, that the honourable manager who opened these charges, should relieve lord Melville from the imputation of avarice, and should state that he sought that money only for the purpose of obtaining power, and that the learned gentleman who summed up, should endeavour to fasten upon him the basest meanness. Those two arguments are perfectly inconsistent: a man who obtains money merely to get power, does not mean to deprive a person near him of profit. Your lordships will see how this part of the case stands upon the evidence, and I think when I shall have made one observation upon the evidence, it puts an end to all inference of corruption on the part of lord Melville, or that he thereby put himself into the power of Mr. Trotter, so as to make it impossible for him to prevent Trotter from using the public money for his profit.

Mr. Trotter came into office upon Mr. Douglas's death; the receipt is in evidence which lord Melville signed to Mr. Douglas's executors for two sums, amounting to 4,500*l.* or thereabouts, stated to be Exchequer fees of the old treasurership; and it is likewise stated in evidence, that the constant usage of the office, with regard to Exchequer fees, is that they stand upon a footing different from the other money, that they have always been considered as the paymaster's money, and that the paymaster has held them for the purpose of making a profit. This is avowed, declared, and understood to be the usage of the office. Then Mr. Trotter has this sum of 4,500*l.* put into his possession by lord Melville, lord Melville having received it from Mr. Douglas. I do not know that there was any necessity for lord Melville's putting it into Mr. Trotter's possession; he might have directed any clerk in the office to pay the Exchequer fees, and then lord Melville would have stood in the situation of the paymaster; but it never entered his mind to make a profit of this himself, instead of his paymaster. I wish to read the words of the evidence on this subject, page 116. "Why did you advance a sum of money to lord Melville without interest?" "I did not feel myself entitled to charge his lordship interest for money which had been put into my hands, under the situation which I have described." "Did you describe to lord Melville the reason why you did not charge interest?" "I did not, nor did I press it upon his lordship's attention so much as to know whether he ever knew that it did bear interest or not."

Your lordships will observe then, that according to the testimony of Mr. Trotter, lord Melville is totally ignorant of this 4,000*l.* being lent to him without interest, and with regard to any impropriety in lord Melville applying to Mr. Trotter (at that time represented to be in poor circumstances), to obtain a loan for him, that seems a singular observation, when in other parts of the case, the managers accuse lord Melville of making Mr. Trotter act as his private agent. If a person wishes to borrow a sum of money, to whom does he apply, but to his man of business? and under these circumstances, was it unnatural that lord Melville should employ Mr. Trotter to get a sum of money for him? Mr. Trotter says, that the situation in which he stood, made it a matter of conscience in him to forego the gain he might otherwise have made; and that with regard to lord Melville, he never brought it to his mind, or observed to him that he had the money without interest; and therefore, surely it is against all rule to say, that you are to presume that lord Melville had a full knowledge that this money was without interest. It was a temporary loan, and your lordships observe, that it is very soon after written off, and no longer appears in the accounts. I humbly submit to your lordships therefore, that up to this period, there is nothing that can fasten a corrupt use of public money upon lord Melville, nothing that can fasten a corrupt connivance at the use of public money, nothing that can fasten a corrupt intention, upon the part of lord Melville, afterwards to profit by public money.

I have now reached the transactions in the years 1787 and 1788, namely, the remittances to Scotland: they stand upon this ground; they were made by Mr. Trotter, and Mr. Trotter declares in his evidence, that they were very soon afterwards repaid. The words of Mr. Trotter's evidence are these, your lordships will find them in page 133. "Have you any reason to doubt, but that the payments made upon that subject, were repaid out of the private funds of lord Melville?" "I have no reason to doubt it, as there were frequent payments subsequent to that, and they went in reduction of the general account, in which those sums were included."*

Thus, my lords, I trust, I have disposed of every part of these transactions up to the year 1789: and now, my lords, we come to that branch of the cause which was rested upon so mainly, and particularly by the honourable and learned manager who summed up this case. I have been saved a great deal of trouble in what I shall address to your lordships upon this part of the case. I shall certainly not repeat, if I can avoid it, any one argument that was used by my learned friend, because by repeating it, I should incur the risk of destroying its effect. But there are observations, which do not seem to me yet to have been made, which are extremely important, and I am sure your lordships will not think that in a case of this sort, I trifle with your lordships time, if I express a strong anxiety to meet this part of the case in the fullest manner.

My lords, the honourable and learned manager who summed up, made his observations particularly upon the part of the case to which I now refer, I mean the purchase of 13,500*l.* of India stock with Lind's loan.

From having the honour of living with the learned manager in the most intimate friendship, and sometimes conflicting with him professionally, I know him to be possessed of the greatest address and ability; and it is evident that he felt that it was necessary to remove the impression made by lord Melville's declaration, that he considered it illegal and most improper for him to use the public money for private emolument. When the proposal was made to lord Melville by Trotter, that he might apply the public balances in the purchase of India stock, Mr. Trotter says, his lordship treated the proposal with indignation, and he added that he supposed he had incurred lord Melville's displeasure by making the proposal. This, when combined with the innocence which I contend I have established to exist down to this period, forms a part of the case so important, and is so fatal to every hope of conviction, that the learned manager felt that all his genius, all his powers of observation, and all his eloquence should be applied to it. Accordingly, my lords, he attempted to make out this head of charge in direct contradiction to the parol testimony adduced by the prosecutors themselves.

My lords, it is not the course of justice in this country, that the positive testimony adduced by a prosecutor should be done away by the inferential reasonings of that prosecutor in opposition to the positive evidence produced by him. Yet I shall show your lordships, both in this case, and in the case which follows, respecting the loyalty loan, that that inferential or presumptive reasoning on which the managers rest their case (be it fit or unfit for them to introduce it), is entirely set aside by the inferences and presumptions on which we rely, confirmed by the testimony of their witness.

My lords, this is one of the great features of the present extraordinary cause; your lordships will bear it in your minds, you will ruminate upon it, you will apply to it the principles which ought to govern all cases of a criminal nature, and I am sure the noble defendant will have the full benefit of that deliberation. You will remember, that presumptions are to be made in favour of innocence, and not of guilt: that a criminal is not like a civil cause: that you are never to presume that any thing has been actually in the knowledge of the party accused, unless it is proved to be in his knowledge: that imputed acquiescence does not govern in matters of crime, but that knowledge must be positively proved.

The honourable and learned manager dressed up this part of the case by introducing the noble defendant to your lordships' notice as a person of an intrepid mind, and of an ardent character—as a person who had long practised in political and in public life. Who had been educated to the bar, and had risen to the highest eminence in that profession which the bar of Scotland would admit. Who had every attribute that could render him great or considerable; that he had all which legal education, great practice, political information could give, and, above all, whatever a great knowledge of the world, and of mankind, could by possibility accomplish. My lords, he did this for the purpose of contrast, that he might next represent the noble and eminent person whom he thus justly described, to be reduced to the most humiliating state in which human nature is to be found, if he could be supposed to be so blind as to be imposed upon by Mr. Trotter's story of Mr. Lind's loan. He therefore contends that your lordships must draw this conclusion, that he knew all along that it was guilty public money which he received, and laid out guiltily in the purchase of India stock; which, as the superintendant of Indian affairs, he must be guilty in holding at all. This, my lords, is a grave charge, it is severely stated, and it must be manfully met. I will venture to say, that in this extraordinary case, where concealment has produced accusation, this, the most laboured, is the least founded of all the charges. Now, that the facts are disclosed to the world; now, that the mouth of the witness is opened, the imputation vanishes. Here I am entitled to take my stand. Here I consider myself as having obtained the fulcrum which Archimedes wished for, by which (I mean no offence, my lords) I can move this judicature at my pleasure, because I can place myself on the clear and unobscured basis of truth. The truth being, that the noble lord was entirely ignorant of the imposition that was practised upon him, respecting the pretended loan from Lind, until the report of the commissioners of naval inquiry was published. If this be so, and I will prove it, all strained presumption, and forced inference must vanish from before us, and the noble lord must be acquitted.

This is the first instance of Mr. Trotter having ventured to propose to the noble lord to use the public uncalled-for balances. When he made the proposal, it was received with the utmost displeasure by lord Melville; and Mr. Trotter never afterwards dared to repeat it. But, says the learned manager, this displeasure must have been merely pretended; how came he not to chace him from his service? This is a most extraordinary conclusion indeed! That a proposal, which being then made for the first time—a proposal which must have shown that all the official regulations had been observed, by proving that the balance of money was lying where it had been directed to be deposited, should have created suspicion, and led to immediate dismissal! Mr. Trotter, in his examination in chief, says, that he (Mr. Trotter) represented that there were balances in his hand, that it must be long before those balances could be required for the public service, and that they could, in the mean time, be used for the particular purpose of buying the India stock. On Mr. Trotter's representing that there were balances in his hands unused, was the noble lord to suppose that Mr. Trotter had withdrawn his balances from Mr. Coutts's—that he had put them out on Navy bills—that he had sent twenty-five thousand pounds to Scotland, there to remain at interest, at his banker's, for his (Mr. Trotter's) benefit? On the contrary, could any conclusion be suggested to lord Melville's mind, but that his official regulations were kept? And because he (Mr. Trotter) had the indelicacy, or the impropriety, to make this proposal, was that a reason for removing an otherwise apparently faithful officer, under whose management it appeared that the regularity of the payments continued unvaried, and who had, for a period of four years, at that time, discharged every duty of his office, without any one wheel of the machine, as I formerly expressed it, standing still, for one moment? To say that a person should discharge a servant, otherwise valuable, for such a thing, is most unreasonable; but to infer, because he was not discharged, that lord Melville was guilty of the crime of using the money, which the evidence proves him to have rejected, is a stretch which I think could not have been attempted even in the most petty criminal jurisdiction in this country.

My lords, I come now to state to your lordships, that which seems to me the real and true nature of this transaction. In the first place, let it never be forgotten, that Mr. Lind is made the apparent holder of this stock; that it is in evidence to your lordships, that in the year 1791, it was transferred to the name of Montague Lind. Now, there is no doubt but the transaction, as Mr. Trotter states it, was this, that a conversation arose respecting the state of India stock, and the probable prosperity of our affairs in India. Not a conversation when he was with lord Melville upon official business, but when he was with him upon a visit at Wimbledon. The future prosperity of India was, at this time, the constant and favourite subject of lord Melville's conversation in private; and in his speeches in parliament, he had repeatedly said, that India would so rise in prosperity, that India would assist England, instead of England being obliged to assist India. This was his constant theme. In his conversation with Mr. Trotter, he had said, that he was sure that India stock would rise in value; on which Mr. Trotter says, would it not be advisable, then, for you to possess some? To which lord Melville said he had no means of purchasing. Then Mr. Trotter makes the proposal, which was received with indignation. And Mr. Trotter adds, that he conceived he had incurred lord Melville's displeasure by having proposed to use the dormant balances for that purpose. Mr. Trotter afterwards proposed that he should borrow money for the purpose; and he afterwards led lord Melville to believe that he had done so. But the learned manager asks if it is possible, that, upon personal security merely, any body could suppose that the money could be borrowed? And argues, that on this improbability, guilt is to be presumed. I own it astonished me very much, when I heard that argument from the learned manager, because, in the first place, it is leaving out a considerable portion of the fact of the case; and, in the next place, it is totally forgetting the history of the times.

Your lordships will observe, what the nature of this transaction is; that this is a purchase of 13,500*l.* or, if the honourable managers will, of 14,500*l.* of India stock; that it requires 23,000*l.* to make the purchase; that the purchase is made at different times, of 6,000*l.* 6,000*l.* then 2,500*l.*; or, on the other supposition of 13,500*l.* stock, of a last payment of 1,500*l.* This money Mr. Trotter represented to lord Melville to be advanced by Mr. Lind; but, in point of fact, it turns out that Mr. Trotter advanced it from public money in his hands, but, concealing the fact, imposing upon lord Melville the belief of the loan by Lind. Your lordships will see by the evidence, that soon after that period, three thousand of the twenty-three thousand is paid, and that one thousand pounds stock is transferred from Mr. Lind to lord Melville. Now, I beg your lordships will attend to that fact. The managers make use of it for the purpose of showing that it was 14,500*l.* of stock that was bought, not 13,500*l.*; and they conclude, that, therefore, the interest of the money was less than the dividends, and, consequently, that there was a profit of 10*l.* a year to lord Melville. An observation of so little importance, that it is hardly worth stopping to state it. But the true use to be made of that fact is this, that lord Melville wished to increase his qualification as a proprietor—That Mr. Trotter had directions to purchase 1,000*l.* stock for that purpose; but Mr. Trotter, instead of making a new purchase, had a thousand pounds stock transferred from Mr. Lind to lord Melville, that it might appear to lord Melville, by the transfer from Mr. Lind, that Lind held India stock for lord Melville, and that his lordship's qualification was part of the stock purchased on his account with Lind's money.

It appears too, that just before this transaction of transferring the 1,000*l.* India stock, the whole stock, (whether 13,500*l.* or 14,500*l.*) which was originally purchased in the name of Philip Antrobus, was transferred to the name of Lind, so as to keep up the appearance to lord Melville, if he should ever make any inquiry into the subject, that this stock which Mr. Trotter pretended to buy with Lind's money (but actually bought with public money) was actually in Mr. Lind's name. So that the natural conclusion, therefore, by lord Melville, would have been, that it was purchased with money borrowed from Lind. Thus, the imposition on lord Melville was complete. Now, with regard to the probability of getting such a loan upon the stock, and upon personal security, it is to be observed, that 3,000*l.* was paid, which reduced the loan to 20,000*l.* on a stock worth 23,000*l.* and that it was then a rising stock. Here, then, is more stock than money; therefore, there is enough to make good the loan, in case there should be a fall in the stock. In addition to this, lord Melville's personal security was bound in this transaction, though he did not give a written acknowledgment, just as his son's personal security was in the transactions with Mr. Sprot. Above all, my lords, attend to this, that this transaction was in 1789—that it was at a time when the noble lord was in the plenitude of power—when there were many persons who would have been most ready to have served him with that, or more,—that it was at a time of profound peace—when the interest of money was four, or at most, four and a half per cent; and when there was no person, except one as negligent as the noble lord, who would have thought of entering into a transaction at five per cent for any permanent time. All who know the history of the times, and the state of loans of money at that period, know what I say to be true. If, therefore, we are to have recourse to probabilities, I ask, if it is probable, nay, if it is possible, that the noble lord, if affected with the love of gain, if desirous to make a profit of the public money, would have paid over, in the name of Mr. Lind, the purchase-money, to procure the stock, and would, every year, have paid interest at the rate of five per cent to another person, for money which he himself advanced, paying at a higher rate than the market interest of money, at the time, and thus cut off from his profit all the difference between the interest of his money and the profits arising from the dividends of the stock. To have done so would have, indeed, entitled him to be considered as that description of human being to which the learned manager compared him; if he could be supposed to have borrowed money, under the circumstances here described, at an interest of one per cent, or one half, above the market price, when he had nothing to do but to go to the Bank, and take it for nothing, he would have deserved to be considered a driveller. But no such fact existed, and it only shows the strong desire to stretch probabilities, and to raise inferences beyond any thing that was ever attempted in a court of justice before.

But, my lords, this is not all. What is the nature of the transaction? Is this a stock-jobbing transaction—a speculation in the funds—a transaction that lord Melville, president of the board of control, treasurer of the navy, one of his majesty's privy council, an eminent member of parliament, the friend and co-adjutor of Mr. Pitt in all the public affairs of this great empire—is this the sort of act on which to convict lord Melville of high crimes and misdemeanors? Is he, upon such evidence, and by such inferences, to be considered as guilty of speculating in the funds, over which he had a control? My lords, this is not a purchase of stock, for the purpose of selling again; it is not a purchase for the purpose of making advantage by the turn of the market; but I am entitled to state this transaction (if lord Melville had thought it eligible to enter into it) to be exactly similar to the purchase of an estate. If he had thought that he could have commanded the money requisite for the purpose of purchasing a considerable estate, which he thought might increase materially in its value, in consequence of the natural improvement of the country arising from natural causes, and superintending care, he had a perfect right to have done so, and had as good a right as any man in the kingdom, to lay out his own money, or borrowed money, in the transaction. In the same manner, with that opinion of the funds of the East-India Company, he was no more to be excluded from purchasing in those funds, than he was to be excluded from purchasing an estate, or from purchasing in the general funds of the kingdom. Nay, more, if it suited lord Melville's convenience to vest a sum of money, permanently to remain in India stock, like the purchase of an estate, which he was to keep, and not to go to market with, like an estate-jobber, lord Melville did a right act towards the public, by showing thereby his opinion of the affairs of India, upon which so great a part of the prosperity of the affairs of this country hinged. I say, therefore, in its foundation it is an honest transaction; in its character it is a rational transaction; that in its concoction lord Melville was totally ignorant of what passed behind the scenes. There it is all Mr. Trotter and Mr. Lind, and lord Melville knew nothing of it, as Mr. Trotter has sworn, till after the report of the naval commissioners, in 1805, sixteen years after the period of the purchase.

My lords, I have stated that this transaction began in time of peace, when money was at low interest. Mr. Trotter took this money from the public balances, without the knowledge of lord Melville; applied it to the purchase of stock for lord Melville; made lord Melville believe it was Mr. Lind's; he had Mr. Lind's transfer of 10,000*l.* of that stock to lord Melville; he had 13,000*l.* transferred to Mr. Lind's name; and he made lord Melville pay interest regularly for it. Therefore the effect was this, that he (Mr. Trotter) in times of peace, when he could not lend 23,000*l.* taken from the public chest at the rate of five per cent did make five per cent of it, by charging it to lord Melville. If we are to have recourse to inferences, to deal in presumptions, is it rational to presume that lord Melville knew this? or more rational to presume that Mr. Trotter concealed it from him for a double purpose? First, for the purpose of showing that he was anxiously desirous of serving his patron and his protector, by appearing to obtain the loan for him; and next, for the purpose of obtaining to himself a better interest for public money, than he at that period of time could make any where else.

There is but one other matter, with which it is necessary for me to detain your lordships in this part of the case. It was observed, by the learned manager, that as soon as lord Melville received this boon from Mr. Trotter by Lind's loan, all restraint was removed, and Mr. Trotter was left to use the public money to any extent. That is, when this great thing is done for lord Melville, by which he is to gain 10*l.* a-year, according to our supposition, and afterwards to gain a little more—by which he is to have the public money lent to himself, and to pay five per cent for it, when, if he had good security to give, he might have got it at four per cent from any other person, Mr. Trotter is supposed to have done lord Melville so infinite a favour in his communications to him, that he may be allowed to carry his delinquencies, as to the use of the public money, to any extent; accordingly, a state of the balances used by Trotter, is produced. In 1788, 61,600*l.*; May 31st, 1790, 64,800*l.*; 31st March, 1792, 102,388*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*; 31st October, 1793, 115,000*l.* You then have the 30th of April, 1794, 161,245*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*; 23th February, 1795, 209,875*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*; in 1795 again (30th April), 310,325*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.*

Now, my lords, I must again advert to the history of the times; it is impossible to try a great state cause without doing so. Your lordships cannot fail to recollect, that when the small balances existed, it was a time of profound peace. There are other balances in evidence before your lordships, in 1788, when there was a rupture with Spain, when the consequence of that was an increased navy; when, in consequence of that increased navy, more money was issued to the treasurer, the balances in Mr. Trotter's hands immediately increased. Yet this preceded the pretended loan from Mr. Lind, on which lord Melville regularly paid five per cent to Mr. Trotter. After the threat of war with Spain was over, and the expenses were again reduced, peace continued until 1793. Here, then, were three years for the increase of balances, after the supposed favour procured by Mr. Trotter for lord Melville, by Lind's pretended loan. But Mr. Trotter's balances fell down to the peace average; because, the navy fund did not admit of Trotter taking more, not because lord Melville encouraged him to take more. Mr. Trotter's balances, therefore, do not depend on any thing but the navy money being sufficient to admit of their being large. For, when the war breaks out in 1793, Mr. Trotter increases his own balances, for his own private emolument. He could not have done it before, if he would have done it. The increased services of the navy required increased supplies; which made larger floating balances, and afforded Mr. Trotter the power of drawing out larger sums from the Bank. I submit, therefore, that the fact of having permitted Trotter, after 1789, to increase his balances, cannot, by possibility, be laid to lord Melville's charge, in the manner in which the learned manager stated it.

My lords, between the period of the purchase of India stock, in 1789, and the transaction of the Loyalty loan in 1797, it does not seem to me, that there is any thing upon which the honourable managers have observed, or given evidence, that has the least tendency to throw a reflection of corruption on lord Melville; so that your lordships will observe, that from the 10th of January 1786 to 1789, Mr. Trotter had never dared to mention to lord Melville, that he (lord Melville) might use the public money: and from 1789 to 1800, when he went out of office, there never had been the least mention of it. So that again eight years elapse, during which time, there is not any transaction, to which it is possible to attach any thing like the pretence of evidence, that lord Melville has been corrupt.

Now, my lords, with respect to the Loyalty loan, the very name of the fund sufficiently designates its nature: My lords, it was a contribution, patronised by all persons in power—a contribution for the purpose of elevating the spirits and the stocks of the country. At the same time, it was a contribution made upon the most notorious knowledge of the circumstances of parties; that they were subscribing, as it were, for the encouragement of a public measure; but that they did not, therefore, pledge themselves that they were monied men to the extent of their subscription. Can any thing be more indicative of this characteristic of that fund, than Mr. Pitt standing at the head of the subscribers for 10,000*l.*? To whom your lordships, with the other House of Parliament, in the course of this year, have done the great and munificent act, felt to be due to a great statesman, of paying his debts. This shows, that it was utterly impossible that Mr. Pitt was to pay the actual money for his loyalty subscription; and it was notoriously so understood at the time. Your lordships will see there are other ministers, and other persons of consideration, subscribing largely; and that the three persons, considered as at the head of administration at that time, lord Grenville, Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Dundas, subscribe 10,000*l.* each. Now, this is one feature of the Loyalty loan—a feature which negatives gain—a feature which raises a presumption directly against profit, and raises this presumption, that it was meant to pay the first dividend, and then to get rid of the stock. I firmly believe, if this matter could be inquired into by evidence, that the transaction, with respect to the purchase of Loyalty, would be found to be what I have described it. But, my lords, Mr. Henry Drummond is dead. Here, again, we are deprived of a witness.

My lords, the first payment of this stock is repaid by Mr. Trotter; but it is in evidence, that he did not pay it in the first instance—it is in evidence, that he knew nothing about it. This is proved expressly by Mr. Trotter:—“To whom were the directions given for the purchase of 10,000*l.* of the Loyalty loan, in 1797?” “I gave no directions respecting that, to the best of my recollection.”* And then he goes on to speak more positively, that he gave no directions about it. “I understood you to state, that you did not originally give directions, nor are cognizant by whom the direction was given for the purchase of the subscription of the 10,000*l.* Loyalty loan?”—“I am unacquainted who gave directions respecting that Loyalty loan; at least, I have no recollection of that, and I do not find that it passed through me, or by my orders.”† This establishes therefore that Mr. Trotter did not do it. I have first, then, shown your lordships, that it was a stock of subscription, but not a stock of gain; and now I have shown your lordships, that Mr. Trotter, the supposed minister to lord Melville's profit, is not the person employed in the purchase of this stock. So, that he who is always to be looked on as the actor, when any scene of profit takes place, is absent here, and negatives any concern with it. The instalments were paid by Coutts, and repaid by Mr. Trotter, who repaid it out of the mixed account; into which, without lord Melville's knowledge, his money went from whatever quarter it came. Being repaid out of the mixed account, upon which no balance is struck, it is carried to the account current, on which no balance is struck till 1800; and lord Melville hears nothing of it till that period, except one thing, which is most important, viz. that he executes a power of attorney to Mr. Trotter's banker, to sell the stock to Mr. Trotter's order, and for his benefit; and that this order is not confined to the particular stock in question, but extends to all the other stocks possessed by lord Melville—stock, which it is said, he obtained criminally (viz. 7,000*l.* Reduced) but which I will show has no feature of crime; and other stock, which lord Melville had from his son at the time he settled his estate in Scotland upon him, a fact which the managers have not any where observed upon. Thus, all his stock, of every description, is at this time put in Mr. Trotter's power, to use for his (Mr. Trotter's) own re-imbursement. Will any body say, after this, that Mr. Trotter was not well secured, by being thus vested with an authority, by which he had it in his power to go to market, and sell the Loyalty loan of 10,000*l.*? and if he sold it at a loss he had other stock to sell, till he was completely reimbursed. Was there any reason on earth, why lord Melville (if, instead of the most inattentive, he had been the most attentive man to his private affairs) should not have laid his head upon his pillow, and slept in perfect confidence, that all was settled by this transaction?

On the 27th September, the last payment was made on the loyalty; on the 28th, the power to sell all the stock was executed. From that moment, he had a right to dismiss from his mind all consideration of that stock, as the stock of the person to whom the power was granted, and no longer the stock of himself, who granted the power.

My lords, this is the situation with regard to this loyalty stock, but the case does not rest here. I have an observation on the evidence still to state, which I trust, will give you a clue, not only to unravel the loyalty loan, but many other parts of this most extraordinary case. Mr. Trotter states, that ample security was transferred to him; he is the master and controller of stock, of the value of 20,000*l.* for the advance of 10,000*l.* on the loyalty. My lords, instead of contenting himself with that security, from a motive which he states (an anxiety and attention to his own interest) he transfers the loyalty advance to the Chest account. He is asked, "What was your reason for transferring the loyalty loan money from the account current, to the Chest account?"—"It was from an anxiety, an attention to my own interest. Lord Melville, was indebted to me, as a private individual, only upon the account current, and I considered him indebted, as I said before, to government, for the balance upon the Chest account."—"Did you state to lord Melville, that you wished, or intended to transfer this loyalty loan money, from the account current to the Chest account?"—"I do not recollect, that I positively stated it to his lordship, but I delivered accounts which bore it upon the face of them."—"Did lord Melville approve of the transfer of the loyalty loan to the Chest account?"—"He neither approved nor disapproved of it. He took the accounts without any consideration."† And it is in evidence likewise, that Mr. Trotter never called his attention to the item.

Now, my lords, let us see a little what this Chest account is. I say, that this Chest account is a memorandum for a particular purpose—it is a memorandum for money of a certain description. The 10,000*l.* was carried to it in Mr. Douglas's time by Mr. Trotter—the 10,000*l.* in 1792, and the 40,000*l.* in 1796, the sum altogether of 60,000*l.* Lord Melville knew, perfectly well, that it was the proper place for this memorandum to be made, because he knew that that was requisition money—money for public purposes, and carried, in the first instance, directly to the Chest account, and never passed through any other account. But the loyalty loan is made to pass from the account current to the Chest account. So that by the avowed act of Mr. Trotter, from his anxiety for his own affairs, without any communication to lord Melville, this 10,000*l.* loyalty is rendered public money, and the witness must be taken to say, that lord Melville did not know it; and I shall show presently, it is impossible lord Melville could know it. Mr. Trotter says positively, lord Melville never examined his accounts; he speaks to his lordship's carelessness in his private affairs, and I shall show your lordships ex evidentiâ rei, from the facts and circumstances of the case, that Mr. Trotter must be taken to be speaking truth in this, even if he could be supposed to speak truth in nothing else. Mr. Trotter I have stated to have been secured in a sum of money equal to 20,000*l.* when the loyalty loan was paid up. Mr. Trotter of his own act, notwithstanding that security, transfers the 10,000*l.* loyalty to the Chest account. What was this Chest account? Suppose the instant afterwards, Mr. Trotter and lord Melville had both died, or suppose Mr. Trotter had died and left no vestige behind him, or traces of what the nature of their transaction was, and the Chest account had appeared; would not lord Melville have stood in the situation, of having given complete security for the advance of the loyalty, and yet, notwithstanding, remained responsible to the public, for the whole amount of these advances upon the Chest account? For the Chest account is a memorandum which lord Melville could not controvert, because the 40,000*l.* was put to it, and the two sums of 10,000*l.* each were put to it, so that if the loyalty had remained there, he must have paid it. Then, my lords, is there not evidence from the very transaction itself, that what Mr. Trotter says, with regard to lord Melville's attention to the public affairs, and his inattention to his own, must be true? Where is that person in the degraded state of human nature, referred to by the solicitor general, who having had this item pointed out to him in the Chest account, would not have said, "What! Mr. Trotter, do you mean to charge me in this double capacity? Is your anxiety about your own interest so great, that you are not contented with having this power to sell the loyalty loan for your own benefit and reimbursement, but you must make me and my representatives liable to the public in 10,000*l.*? and, what is more, liable to be questioned in the high court of parliament by impeachment of all the Commons of the united kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, to answer to charges, which if you do not answer, I cannot answer; and which you may leave unanswered, to save yourself from criminal and civil responsibility, and this may involve me in a most unjust conviction, or unjust payment?"

Is not this the true feature of the transaction? will not you lordships believe now, that lord Melville was an indolent man about his own private concerns? It detracts nothing from the noble lord's character, or from the dignity of his mind that he is so. Who are they who have not their defects? But this not only proves his inattention to, and ignorance of his own affairs, but it proves more: it proves that he was particularly inattentive to the Chest account, that he was particularly inattentive to the items in the Chest account. Nay, it proves to demonstration, as much as if angels had come from heaven to swear it, that that item, to lord Melville's knowledge, never was in the Chest account; and your lordships have as good reason to believe that that Chest account (burnt by Mr. Trotter) had not that item in it, as you have reason to believe was in it. And as the presumptions of courts of justice, in trying criminal accusations, must be in favour of innocence, and consistent with probabilities, your lordships ought to believe that it was not in the Chest account, instead of believing that it was; or if it was there, that it was there totally unknown to lord Melville. For, to use the language of the learned manager, lord Melville could not be such a driveller, even with all his inattention to his own affairs, if that item had been pointed out to him, or if he had looked at it himself, after Mr. Trotter had retired, as not to have said, "good God, Mr. Trotter has taken all my stock from me, in security for the loyalty loan, and yet he makes me a debtor in the Chest account, for the sum of that loan, which never had any thing to do with the public service."

Now, my lords, consider this well; compare it with the testimony of 1789; there your lordships will find strong additional reasons for going along with the presumption that is contended for by us, against that contended for on the other side. Lord Melville had rejected Mr. Trotter's proffer of balances, to buy India stock in 1789: is it to be supposed that in 1797 lord Melville would have agreed, for this purpose, to have those sums of money placed to the Chest account, to contribute to a public subscription in 1797, when he had rejected a proposal of a similar sort in 1789?

Your lordships will observe, that from the year 1789, Mr. Trotter has sworn, in the most positive manner, that lord Melville never did at any time, under any circumstances, have any conversation with him, or he venture, ever afterwards, to state to lord Melville any thing respecting the purchase in the funds, or the application of public balances. On this part of the case therefore there cannot rest a doubt.

This brings me to the 7,000*l.* reduced annuities. It is but a word. How it can be brought into Mr. Kaye's computation I cannot understand. Mr. Trotter proves that it came from funds of lord Melville, and that he laid it out without his direction, because the reduced stock had been a productive fund before. "Did lord Melville ever say any thing to you subsequent to that time, of your having made that proposition from whence you collected a supposition on the part of his lordship that you were so using the public money?"—"Never."

My lords, it is in evidence before your lordships, that my lord Melville signed the accounts without reading them. It is in evidence before you, that he was extremely negligent with regard to his own affairs; and it is now I think, by observation, I may say in evidence, before your lordships, that lord Melville's negligence of his own affairs does not rest merely upon the testimony of Mr. Trotter, or any other witness; but is proved by the transactions themselves, I mean particularly by the transaction of his not having made any observation as to the state of the Chest account. But what I have to submit to your lordships gravely is this, that you are now in a criminal court, not in a civil cause; that whatever presumption may be just in a civil case, with regard to a person signing a deed which he has not read, or signing an account which he has not perused; whatever presumptions may be sufficient against him there, or however he may be bound by such an act in the civil transactions of life, I am sure your lordships will never apply that principle in a criminal case. On the contrary, if it is clearly in evidence before your lordships, that there was such negligence as prevented the party from knowing the contents of the paper he signed; such negligence as prevented the party from knowing what account was in the book or the papers delivered over to him, your lordships will exonerate him from criminal responsibility. In every case of a criminal nature, it is essential in order to establish criminality that you should prove the mind guilty. But where there is a complete ignorance and want of knowledge, as to the subject matter of the accusation, there cannot by possibility be an inference of guilt. And yet, my lords, Mr. Trotter in his evidence, page 155, being asked, "Do you consider the accounts having been so signed by lord Melville, as a proof of his lordship's approbation of the accounts, and the particular items therein contained, or as a proof of his lordship's confidence in you?" (he says) "It certainly was in the first instance, a proof of his lordship's confidence in me, as he must have known that I was subject to alter the accounts, in case he should have pointed out any error in them in future; but the public business in which his lordship was generally engaged, seldom or ever afforded him time to enter into any examination of the accounts, during the time that I remained with him, after having presented them to his lordship."* And your lordships will observe, that he signs them at the same moment; consequently that at the time Mr. Trotter was with him, it is clear he did not peruse them, but signed them upon Mr. Trotter's representation, giving confidence to Mr. Trotter; and when Mr. Trotter was gone, and the accounts signed, he could have no motive for examining them; and indeed, the whole evidence respecting the transactions I have been stating, shows that he could never have looked at them afterwards.

I stated, I believe, to your lordships, that 7,000*l.* three per cents reduced had been purchased by Mr. Trotter, without the authority of lord Melville, entirely of his own head; that the money had come from another quarter; that it was lord Melville's own money; and that he laid it out in a productive fund, because it had been before productive. I refer your lordships to the two pages in which this evidence appears, 131 and 132.†

Your lordships will observe, that in the year 1800, lord Melville quitted the office, and that his accounts were closed. My lords, although the learned manager who summed up this case, did not make any particular observation upon the transactions which took place at that time; and although there is every reason to suppose that he pointed to those parts only of the case, that were relied upon by the Commons, yet I think it necessary to trouble your lordships with a very few observations upon this head.

In the first place, your lordships will observe, by the evidence of Mr. Sprot, that the transaction of the final settlement was carried on entirely between Mr. Sprot and Mr. Robert Dundas. Your lordships, will observe likewise, that in page 159, Mr. Trotter being asked, "Did lord Melville express any surprise at the state of his account?" answers, "He did, he was very much surprised to find the balance was so much against him."‡ This relates to the state of the account current between Mr. Trotter and lord Melville. Your lordships will observe, that this account current between Mr. Trotter and lord Melville, though it had been delivered from time to time to lord Melville, never was finally closed, till the year 1800; that any balance that may appear afterwards between Mr. Trotter and lord Melville, arises from an account that must have been opened since 1800, because that account was then finally closed. Your lordships observe, with regard to the transactions in the payment of this money, that lord Melville immediately fell upon the means of paying up the money; but it is quite clear that lord Melville had apprehended from the situation in which he had placed all his funds, that Mr. Trotter had used these funds from time to time for the purpose of liquidating his accounts, and for the purpose of making a final settlement; and therefore, the situation of the account at the end of the period, must have arisen from this circumstance clearly, that lord Melville was not aware that Mr. Trotter had not reduced the balance, and therefore was much surprised at the state of the balance at that time. Lord Melville, it is clear, was deceived in this respect; otherwise he would have given particular directions for the application of his private funds, for the payment of Mr. Trotter. But, your lordships will observe, that this was an account entirely between Mr. Trotter and lord Melville; that it was an account in which there never was any interest charged on either side; that it was an account in which sums were received by Mr. Trotter for lord Melville; that it was an account, in which the balance was sometimes in favour of Mr. Trotter, and sometimes in favour of lord Melville; that it was drawn from the mixed account; it was only by that means, that there was a possibility of a single sixpence of the public money ever coming to lord Melville, and if it came to him in that way, it must have come completely without his knowledge, as he did not know that such an account as the mixed account existed; and if duty had been done by lord Melville in order to have his affairs wound up in 1797, when he made the transfer of the stock, there would not have been any account to be settled in 1800; and therefore we have a right to have it considered as an account which was finally settled by lord Melville in the year 1797.

I have now to state to your lordships one or two other observations; and I trust, that with them I shall have done all that it is necessary for me to do in this case.

My lords, it has been a very great part of my anxiety, as far as is consistent with justice to the noble person who has entrusted me with the care of his case, not to occupy more of your lordships time than is necessary, and I think I may satisfy myself, I do most justice to my noble client, as far as I can do justice to any one, when I attempt to conclude my observations this day, and not trouble your lordships with sitting another day to hear me. One of the subjects requires but a word. Mr. Trotter's being a gratuitous agent of lord Melville, is made a matter of charge per se, and it is likewise made a charge, as matter of inference, to show that there was an understanding between them. Now, really it seems to me in the midst of a variety of charges which the honourable managers have opened, to be too small and minute a matter, to attempt to make any thing of this gratuitous agency. Is there any person who ever stood in the situation and relation with any body for whom they have an affection and regard as a public officer, who would not most voluntarily, cheerfully, and gratuitously do the duty of a private agent, especially such private agency as this, which consisted of a few entries in a book of accounts? It would have been disgraceful in Mr. Trotter, standing connected as he was with lord Melville, if he had not endeavoured to do every sort of private service to lord Melville, without making any demand whatever for it. The consciousness that Mr. Trotter was, without lord Melville's knowledge, amassing a very considerable fortune, certainly was a sufficient reason for him not to ask for any gratuity from lord Melville; but, does it therefore prove in the slightest degree, that because he did that gratuitous service, for that reason, lord Melville was in the knowledge of the manner in which he was acting, with respect to the public money? Every iota of testimony both written and parol, every part of Mr. Trotter's evidence is directly against such a conclusion, and there is not one fact or circumstance to prove any thing, but the direct negative of lord Melville's knowledge of Mr. Trotter's gains; there is nothing but insinuation, insinuation arising from his situation in the country, as to his knowledge of Mr. Trotter's improved circumstances, insinuations completely answered by that to which I have repeatedly referred, I mean Mr. Trotter's private connections, his family connections, and his various means of gaining money. Mr. Trotter likewise says, that he never was a private agent, that he never had any regular appointment.

* Page 973. † Page 935. ‡ Page 978.

My lords, it is said, that a criminal inference is to be drawn from the release, and from the destruction of papers. My learned friend entered very largely into that part of the case; he did it in such a manner, as to make it quite unnecessary for me to do more than make a single observation or two to your lordships. In the first place, with regard to that clause in the release, respecting the destruction of papers, it was clearly, if the act of either of them, the act of Mr. Trotter. But as far as Mr. Trotter's evidence goes, it was not the act of either. Mr. Trotter says, he had totally forgotten it till he saw it again, and that he gave no positive directions about it; and therefore he imagines it must have been inserted by Mr. Spottiswoode. Now Spottiswoode's character is in proof before your lordships; he was a person extremely well known to many of your lordships, and the inference is, that if he did it, it was done as a matter of course, without any intention to cover fraud. But, my lords, there takes place after the release, or at the time of the release, a destruction of papers. My lords, the destruction of papers mentioned by lord Melville in his letter to the commissioners of naval inquiry is at a perfectly different and antecedent time. There was no release in contemplation at that time; it might have been in Mr. Trotter's contemplation, but there never was a clause of this sort, or any release in lord Melville's contemplation, when he burnt his papers in Scotland in 1802. The question was asked of Mr. Trotter whether any directions were given by lord Melville, as to the form of that release, or any particular clause which it should contain, and he says, "none whatever, to the best of my recollection." Your lordships, will observe too, that lord Melville signs upon the 18th of February in Scotland, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, Mr. Trotter signs in London, on the 23rd of February. There was no communication of the draft of the release to lord Melville; that is completely negatived. There was no communication of the draft; the only information lord Melville could have of the release, was by the engrossed copy, and that is signed on the 18th at Melville castle, and is sent immediately to London, and arrives in London in the course of the post, and there is no proof whatever (but the contrary is negatively proved) that lord Melville knew any thing of that release.

My lords, it is a strange mistake in this case, to suppose that this is a crime taken by itself; as if lord Melville in sorting his private papers, had destroyed public vouchers, or public accounts. There were no public accounts there; there were nothing but lord Melville's private affairs, which accumulated upon him in the course of business; there were no public papers among Mr. Trotter's, but there the destruction was Mr. Trotter's alone, lord Melville was totally ignorant of it; and we may even go further, Mr. Trotter was asked this question, "An account has been given of your having destroyed some books of account, was any one book of that sort, destroyed by any directions, or any previous communication of it to lord Melville?" to which the answer is, "None whatever."* Lord Melville is therefore completely freed from all concern in this destruction. Then what inference is there to be drawn from this? it may possibly be fit in some cases, that where any thing like evidence is destroyed, and there is evidence behind, that the evidence of the destruction may serve to lead to inferences; but in this case, in which there is not any one thing that could arise from the papers, which were in the hands of lord Melville, nor any one thing that could arise from the papers, which were in the hands of Mr. Trotter that could disclose any thing to make the charge any thing more, than that which it has been made from the public books of the country; no inference is deducible from the destruction of the papers. Here the charge is made; it is for lord Melville to get rid of that charge. I have stated the argument, ground, and fact, upon which we contend lord Melville is to get rid of that charge; and above all, there is not to be fastened upon him, an inference of guilt from the insertion of a clause in the instrument,—which instrument he never saw, till the clause was inserted in it,—for destroying papers, which papers he never destroyed, and the knowledge of the destruction of which by lord Melville, is negatived by the witness who destroyed them.

My lords, there is one other observation to be made, with respect to the destruction of these papers, and that is an inference that is referable to a great part of the history of this most extraordinary cause. I have had occasion to state to your lordships frequently in the course of my address to you, that Mr. Trotter, at the commencement of his account of this business did not speak out; that, owing to Mr. Trotter sheltering himself under the protection which the law and the act gave him, did not think it wise to disclose any thing which should discover either his delinquency, or his profits. It is owing to that. I may say, that your lordships are here; for from the moment, I can venture to say, that Mr. Trotter did disclose to this noble and most elevated Court, the real nature of the transactions between him and lord Melville, all idea of corruption on the part of lord Melville vanished, and was dispersed. But I submit to your lordships, that the same caution which dictated Mr. Trotter's silence, dictated likewise the destruction of his papers; he was determined to be silent, that his gains might not be discovered, that his delinquency might not be proved; and he was determined to destroy his papers, that they might not be discovered from that quarter; here then, is a direct motive on the part of Mr. Trotter for the destruction of his papers; and when I can show your lordships a direct motive on the part of any person for the act he does which is consistent with reason, and with the general nature of the case and the transaction, your lordships will not resort to a strained inference. Your lordships will be satisfied, that all Mr. Trotter's taciturnity would have availed him nothing, if the commissioners of naval inquiry, or the public prosecutor, had laid their hands upon the papers; and, therefore, here was a direct motive upon the part of Mr. Trotter to destroy those papers, which might have rendered his silence totally and completely abortive. Until this case took its progress before the House of Commons, and long after, Mr. Trotter acted uniformly upon the idea of protecting himself, either from criminal accusation or from civil suit, by maintaining absolute silence as to all the facts that could by possibility disclose either guilt or gain.

My lords, this seems to me to wind up all the observations that are necessary to be made upon the case which I have been intrusted to state to your lordships. I will not trespass any farther on your time than to beg your lordships to except my most sincere thanks for that attention with which you have honoured me. My lords, I am perfectly sure that you will not, when you examine this evidence; when you consider the case of the noble person accused, the liberality of his conduct, the disinterestedness of his character, vouched by the very persons who accuse him; when you consider that there is no disposition to avarice in his nature; when you consider that the whole tenor of his life is adverse to such a crime as he is here charged with; when your lordships consider that all the facts and circumstances which the prosecutors have narrated, either those which are more ancient, or those which are less ancient, are not sufficiently sustained by the evidence, or that they are sufficiently refuted by observation and argument; when your lordships consider, above all, that the facts which are proved by the principal witness, are perfectly consistent with the presumptions which we have suggested, and that all the presumptions to the contrary are forced and strained; when your lordships consider all these things, and come to deliver your judgment of Guilty or Not Guilty, upon your honours, your lordships will not conceive, that under the first authority by which lord Melville acted—the warrant—he has committed any crime. My lords, that warrant lays him under a civil obligation: that warrant was stated to your lordships by my learned friend, in a manner in which, I am sure, I should do but ill at this time of day to attempt to follow him. I refer your lordships to that argument; but, my lords, I contend that the fact is more important to the noble defendant than any argument upon the legal effect of the warrant. I contend that the noble lord is not proved corruptly, intentionally, or indeed at all, to have taken one single sixpence of the public money; and that that being the case, it is unnecessary to reason upon the operation of the warrant. I am sure that your lordships must be satisfied, from the clear manner in which my lord Melville, when Mr. Trotter's mouth was opened, was freed from all imputation of moral guilt—was freed from all connexion with corruption—was freed from all desire of making money—that he was from that instant freed from all political crime. It would be a terrible thing if the hearts of the court were to be at variance with its records. My lords, this cannot be, because, I trust, that the argument upon the statute renders my lord Melville as free from legal crime as the arguments upon the facts; and the facts themselves show him to be perfectly free from, and always incapable of such a crime.

My lords, as I stated to your lordships before, it is the mens rea, you are to consider. Lord Melville's situation is most extremely singular in this country;—renowned for the wisdom of its laws, and particularly for the humane policy of its criminal code, the first and ruling principle in that code has been reversed in his case. My lords, the law says, that no person shall be held to be guilty till he shall be convicted on a trial by his peers; and that every person till found guilty shall be presumed innocent. The noble defendant stands in a situation directly the reverse; although he is only now upon his trial, he has already been found guilty, and he has been already punished.

The cause of this unprecedented situation I have endeavoured to explain to your lordships. I have endeavoured to show you, that the honourable silence of lord Melville, dictated by his sense of public duty, and his sense of personal delicacy, and the silence of Mr. Trotter, dictated by the motives which I have detailed, left the country in ignorance till this cause came to your lordships' bar.

My lords, the case is now explained: you cannot relieve this noble person from the misery he has suffered in the interval; he has borne it with the fortitude of a philosopher, and the patience of a Christian, supported by the feeling of conscious innocence, in the full confidence that a judgment of acquittal by his peers, will restore him to his family, his friends, his country, and his sovereign.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Friday, May 16th, 1806.

The lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, managers for the Commons, you may now proceed to reply; and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Attorney General [Sir Arthur Pigott].—My lords, I hope that the duty which I have to perform, will not add considerably to your lordships' trouble, or much retard the termination of this most important proceeding. It has been the object of the managers for the House of Commons, animated by the exemplary attention, diligence, and perseverance of your lordships, in all respects so to conduct the prosecution intrusted to their charge, as to attain the ends of justice in the most speedy manner. I had, my lords, until a very recent stage of this proceeding, hoped that it would have been quite unnecessary for your lordships to have heard any voice from this place, except those which have already addressed you. The manner in which my honourable friend opened this impeachment to your lordships, left nothing unperformed. He, my lords, who has had the largest share, by far, in conducting this most important business to its present stage, discharged the duty committed to him, in a manner which has conferred a lasting obligation upon the country, an obligation which, I trust, will never be forgotten.

My lords, after he had concluded that opening, it would at least have been a superfluous task for any manager of the House of Commons to have attempted to add any thing to it. My learned friend, who undertook to sum up and state to your lordships the effects of the evidence adduced, in the observations which he submitted to your lordships upon it, stated every thing that could be urged on that head; and the managers, exercising their best judgment, thought it unnecessary to occupy more of your lordships' time upon the subject.

My lords, if the defence of the noble lord had been conducted by an attempt merely to weaken the effect of that evidence; and if the learned counsel of the noble lord had merely presented to your lordships, what they, on his part conceived to be the result of it; I think, my lords, that the managers might have persevered in the line of conduct they had adopted, and have left the whole of the reply to my honourable friend, who is so fully possessed of the facts of the case.

But, my lords, the defence has assumed another aspect. The managers for the House of Commons have had the mortification of hearing principles laid down, upon the establishment of which, the learned counsel who conduct this defence on the part of the noble defendant hope to obtain his acquittal from your lordships; principles which, in my humble apprehension, are not only unfounded in law, but are so perilous to the public, that it is the duty of the House of Commons, charged as they are with the care of every thing that relates to the expenditure of the public money, to have those principles sifted, examined, and minutely investigated, before they are allowed to obtain the august sanction of your lordships, and are consecrated as judicial principles by this House, the highest and last court of judicature in the kingdom; whose example must be copied by every inferior court of justice, and who, when they are applying laws to the case of the noble lord now upon his trial, must do the same for every commissary, for every contractor, for every deputy-paymaster, for every person concerned in the expenditure of the public money, in all the various parts not only of this empire, but in all the remote parts of the world, where we either exercise dominion, wage war, or carry on commerce. When your lordships are called upon to sanctify the principles on which the acquittal of the noble defendant has been asked at your lordships' hands, you have been asked to lay down principles of great public danger, and so destructive of the due care of the money granted to his majesty for the security of his subjects, and the safety of the state, that it is necessary indeed that those principles should undergo a very deliberate examination before they receive the sanction of your lordships judgment. If at last, my lords, the Commons should be compelled to retire from your lordships' bar, corrected by the learned counsel for the noble lord, and the judgment of this Court, in all that the history and constitution of the country have taught them; they will retire mortified and confounded: It will be the first time, my lords, that they will have been taught this perilous lesson to the public; that in the execution of a public office, of great trust and high confidence, charged with the distribution of the money granted by the Commons to his majesty, for the safety and security of his subjects, no public obligation lies upon the officer; and that he is in the same situation as if he had broken a contract entered into with a private individual, for the infraction of which, civil remedies only could be applied. My lords, we must read anew; we must begin to learn again, before we can submit to such extraordinary, I should, if my respect for those learned gentlemen did not deter me from doing so, have said such extravagant and preposterous doctrines. It is not only contended that the public officer has no public obligation upon him, no public duty to perform, an infraction and breach of which is the subject of a criminal proceeding; but it has been for hours attempted to argue your lordships into an exposition of an act of parliament, which would make a remedial law for preventing an ascertained grievance, acknowledged by the whole legislature of no more value than waste paper, and would render the exertion of the legislature ridiculous, and a perfect mockery.

My lords, these are the two subjects to which I mean principally to confine myself: and I mean to leave in general the facts of this case in those hands which are the best, because they are the hands of him who is best acquainted with them: touching the facts of the case only incidentally, as it shall be necessary to illustrate what I shall have the honour of submitting to your lordships; and only for the purpose of rendering more clear and perspicuous, what I shall take the liberty of stating.

My lords, it would indeed be a melancholy consideration, if the doctrine which we have heard could really be sustained. If, my lords, the people of this country, burthened as they necessarily are for the defence of all that is dear to them, are at this day to discover, that there is no real security for the expenditure of the public money, and that the public accountants, to whom it is issued for peculiar, prescribed and appropriated purposes, have it in their power to divert it to other purposes; either to their own emolument, or to the enrichment of others; with what feelings, my lords, can the public be expected to bear those burthens? My lords, it is because the contrary is the settled law of the country; it is because it has ever been the anxious desire of parliament, when such abuses have been fairly exhibited to their view, to adopt measures, not only to check, but effectually to prevent them; that the public have that well justified confidence in the legislature which induces them to bear so patiently all the burthens that are imposed upon them.

My lords, in the expenditure, as well as in the receipt, of the public money, a great variety of persons are employed. All the public money which is collected from the subjects of this country by the various branches of the revenue—by the excise, by the customs, by the post-office—is paid out through the channel of the public offices. The money issued for the maintenance of the army, for the support of the navy, all proceeds out of the Exchequer; and, in some measure, is placed under the control of great public accountants; by whom it is occasionally dealt out to persons employed under, and subordinate to, them, for the various purposes of those services. And, my lords, let it be recollected, that there is no part of the world in which the British flag is displayed, and the enterprising, ardent, and intrepid mariner employed; there is no part of the world in which the brave, patient, and heroic soldier exposes himself in the service of his country, in which it is not necessary to employ persons who have a distribution of part of this public money levied from the people: and if it is to be understood that all those persons who distribute the public money, where the soldier is to be paid—where the mariner is to be sustained—where necessities for the troops, and for the navy are to be provided—are under no public obligation, and have no public duty imposed upon them, which can be vindicated by a criminal prosecution, your lordships will see it is high time, at least, that this subject should be looked to, and that if this be really the law of the land, it should no longer remain so; for I am at a loss to conceive upon what principle any public officer of the crown is to prosecute any deputy-paymaster for his acts; I am at a loss to perceive upon what principle any commissary, or any contractor is to be prosecuted, or has been prosecuted (as they have been), if the law which my learned friends have laid down can be sustained.

My lords, I certainly shall not follow the example of the learned counsel, in tracing the law of this country from the debates in the House of Commons; I shall not quote the debates in parliament, or consider what Mr. Rigby thought was the law of the land; nor shall I presume to lay before your lordships the opinion of any member of parliament, whatever his parliamentary authority might be, upon a subject of this description.

In the year 1780, a parliamentary committee was appointed, to inquire into the state and expenditure of the public money; why the money did not reach the Exchequer, as it ought to have done; why the money was taken out sooner, and in larger sums, than it ought to have been; and why, when the purposes were answered for which it was issued, the surplus did not find its way back into the Exchequer. Persons were employed for seven long years in this inquiry; they presented various reports to his majesty, and to both Houses of parliament; and various measures were adopted in order to carry into execution the regulations recommended in these reports.

My lords, it was not the object of those commissioners to attack persons who might be truly regarded as perfectly innocent. In a long course of time, the custom had gradually grown up, of using a part of the public money in the possession of the accountants, for their private emolument. It was perfectly well known to those who administered the government; was connived at by them; and the commissioners, if they are to be dignified with the name of reformers, aimed at no reform that was not prospective. They did not aim at the ruin of any ancient family, whose possession of those offices had long ceased to exist: that was not the way in which they began to execute the purpose of the legislature. They did not, my lords, indulge any man's prejudice; but they honestly and firmly took the measures which they thought would be proper to point out to the legislature the existence of these abuses; and having done that, they took the liberty of suggesting such regulations as had occurred to them, in order to prevent in future the possibility of the recurrence of such mischiefs.

My lords, the act of parliament in question having stated these reports as the foundation of the measures adopted by the legislature, the managers thought it right to lay before your lordships, very shortly, what was the nature of those regulations suggested by them; and it renders it quite impossible to doubt, or contend against, this proposition, that what has been done upon the present occasion, and is proved, beyond the possibility of denial, to have been done and permitted by the noble lord, the defendant in this cause, is directly against the principal object recommended by the commissioners; against the object for which they transmitted those regulations to the legislature, which were afterwards formed into an act of parliament. It was for carrying the money to the Bank,—not in the way my friends have contended it was alone intended by this act, namely, that the moment it got into the Bank it should find its way out again, for the private advantage of any person whatever: my lords, it is a mockery of these proceedings to address any set of men with any such contention, any such controversy, as that in which the learned gentlemen concerned for the defendant have engaged;—it was for a directly contrary purpose, for the very purpose of destroying all subordinate treasuries for partial and limited purposes. And to state, after what is proved in the 129th page of that day's proceedings,* which contains Mr. Trotter's evidence, that for convenience, that to avoid sending back to the Bank of England, the noble defendant was authorized to grant that application of Mr. Trotter to take the money from the Bank which had once got there, in pursuance of the act of parliament, and deposit it at Messieurs Coutts's for convenience;—what is this but repealing the act of parliament?

If, my lords, Mr. Trotter in his superior wisdom and experience, thought it became him to set himself above the wisdom of those who have attended to this subject; above the legislature, who had been pleased to adopt and sanctify that wisdom, in repeated acts of parliament; it was his business to have stated that to the legislature, and to have procured a repeal of the act, or so much of it as was necessary to give effect to what he wanted to be done.

Alas! alas! my lords; these are miserable, pitiful pretences of sordid interest, framed to accomplish that which is too obvious to escape any human intelligence; and I should be sorry indeed to converse with a man, who could be imposed upon by arguments which have been addressed to your lordships in justification of the practice which has obtained, in order to palliate the violation of this act of parliament.

My lords, I was about to state to your lordships three passages from those reports; first remarking, that in the act in question, as well as in two prior acts made in pari materia, for the reformation of the Pay office of his majesty's forces, these reports of the commissioners of accounts are referred to; and the preamble of the act now before your lordships states, that "Whereas it appears by the reports made by the commissioners appointed to examine, take, and state the public accounts of the kingdom, that regulations are necessary for better conducting the business in the department of the treasurer of his majesty's navy." I cannot, my lords, therefore, I presume, proceed to any better source for discovering what regulations were necessary, and what grievances were to be redressed, than those reports.

My lords, this is a remedial law, and all courts of justice construe such laws so as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy; and it is therefore extremely material to be well and accurately apprized of what was the mischief intended to be cured by this law.

My lords, there are three reports which apply to the subject; they are made at considerable distances of time from each other. The earliest of them is made the 3rd of March, 1781, and after stating the defects in the treasurer of the navy's office, the commissioners took that which, as I believe, is the safest and most prudent course to be taken upon all such occasions, they speak with some diffidence as to what they recommend: They state, in these reports, that these defects should be speedily corrected; "To alter the constitution of the office; to abolish the subordinate treasury; to render the treasurer a mere accountant, and to vary the mode of accounting, carry with them a strong appearance of an effectual remedy." Still they do not now, in March 1781, which was four years before this act, they do not even now venture to recommend that measure; they pause upon it, they hesitate, and they state to parliament; "But were we, in the present state of our inquiries, to come to decisions of such moment, we should be premature, perhaps rash; it is easier to see the defects than to supply the regulations.

* Page 937.

The pay of the navy is an important object, and any alteration in the mode should be well weighed before it is adopted; it should be traced through all its effects, and perfectly ascertained to be as feasible in practice as it is specious in theory."

My lords, I quote this report merely to introduce the eighth report, which was made in December 1782, one year and nine months after it. This eighth report does recommend that alteration in the constitution of this office; it does recommend the destruction of the subordinate treasury; it does recommend, my lords, the avoiding of every thing that has been insisted upon here; it states the fact of those assigned bills (assigned upon the treasurer of the navy) which, in the early parts of these reports, the commissioners of accounts had stated were not always brought for payment to the treasurer of the navy upon whom they were drawn, as soon as they were assigned, but who was charged with them by the boards that assigned them upon him. When further examination had taken place, the office of the paymaster of the forces had, in the interval, been reported upon twice; and regulations entirely to alter the constitution of that office, in the very respect in question, had been recommended by the commissioners, and adopted by the legislature. Your lordships will find it stated in the eighth report; "The examination we have recently made, has enabled us to form an opinion upon another point of moment to the public; the legislature have in the last session of parliament introduced into the office of paymaster-general of the forces, a regulation which, as it seems to us, may be applied as beneficially to the office of the treasurer of the navy." Your lordships see they take the recommendation with respect to the Navy-pay-office; and there is the adoption by the legislature of that regulation, and the conversion of it into an act of parliament.

Now what, my lords, is that regulation? The custody of the cash. Not the custody of the cash here or there; not the custody of the cash westward of Temple Bar, and not eastward of Temple Bar; no such ridiculous project entered into the heads of those who recommended this measure to the legislature. Little could they foresee that the time would arrive when it should be gravely argued, that this was the construction of the act; that all that was done was to place a guard to conduct the money from the steps of the Exchequer to the Bank; that instead of sending a waggon and soldiers to carry it safe, they would send a Bank clerk and an act of parliament; and having done that, the act was functus officio; there was nothing further to be done; that how long the money remained there, or to what purposes it was applied, signified nothing. My lords, this is a pretext too flimsy to impose upon any understanding—that it matters not what became of it when it got out; in whose custody it was; for whose benefit and emolument it was employed; little did the legislature foresee, when they were taking these measures, that the day would arrive when this would be contended. O unwise legislature! O improvident parliament! What, was this all your care and caution? did you mean to do no more? Or, meaning to do more, were you so incapable of carrying your intention into execution, that all you did was to see that in carrying the money from the Exchequer, it was not purloined in the way to the Bank; but that the moment it got into the Bank, it was no longer the object of your care? that if the treasurer would insert in his draft, that he drew for naval services, he might, while the leaf in the account book in which it was entered was wet, draw it all away under the pretence of convenience?

VOL. XXIX.

My lords, I contend that the custody of the cash applicable to naval service was transferred from the Treasury to the Bank of England; but that the account of the receipts and payments was to be kept at the treasurer's office.

My lords, I beseech your lordships' attention to the continuation of this passage; "all the sums received by him may be received by the Bank; sums from the Exchequer may be imprested to the Bank; sums directed by different boards to be paid to him, may be paid to the Bank." Now here is an important article, that has furnished that pretence of convenience in argument, but not in evidence; for there is no evidence before your lordships to prove that the sums which Mr. Trotter applied to lord Melville to have leave to draw from the Bank, were confined to assigned bills. "All those bills assigned upon him for payment." Now these are the very bills in question. "All bills assigned upon him for payment may be paid, and all extra payments may be made, by his draft upon the Bank" The commissioners, a year and three quarters before, had stated all that history of assigned bills; but when they had examined further, the commissioners were of opinion that assigned bills might just as well be paid by drafts upon the Bank, as any other part of the service; and why not? To say to a man of sense, that the Bank is not as convenient a place to pay as Mr. Coutts's shop, is perfectly trifling. These assigned bills are generally for large sums, very few under 500*l.* they are generally larger; so that the pretence of having money a little nearer in order to pay them with more facility, is not sustained by evidence.

It was the object of the legislature that the assigned bills also should be paid by the clerks at the Bank. There are payments, unquestionably, for which some money must be kept at the Pay-office. Your lordships have heard that small payments are made—twenty shillings, ten shillings, five shillings; and who would think of giving a poor woman, who was coming for her husband's money, a draft to trudge to the Bank to receive twentyshillings? Be it so. If the noble lord had proved that in all the instances in which he allowed money to be taken from the Bank, and carried to the iron chest, or to Somerset House, or even to Messieurs Coutts's, it had been for that purpose only; he would have made a case within the exception, which your lordships will find stated by these commissioners. It could not be predicated of money drawn either by the noble lord himself, or by his deputy acting under his letter of attorney, that it was not drawn for navy services; any more than if it had been an assigned bill upon him which had gone for payment, and his paymaster had given a draft upon the Bank of England, it could have been predicated, that that bill was mere form, and that it was not drawn for navy services.

Your lordships will find the whole of this passage having this uniform object: to prevent—except only in the case of having money to pay the seamen at the out-ports, and to make the small payments,—the drawing the money from the Bank: these are the only excepted cases.

Therefore, if the policy of an act of parliament was ever clear beyond a possibility of doubt; if there ever was an act concerning which no cavil could be raised as to its real object, it is this: it was to prevent the treasurer of the navy, or any officer under him, having the custody of the cash; it was to direct that no money should go out of the Bank, except for those special purposes; and when your lordships come to see the means taken by the legislature to carry this into execution, you will see that that end was attempted to be attained; and, I think, is attained by a true and genuine construction of this act, such as a court of justice would put upon it; that is, such as will tend to suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy.

My lords, before I proceed to consider the act of parliament, I must take the liberty of considering first the preliminary question, which my two learned friends stated, one after the other. My learned friend, Mr. Plumer, conceives, that before this act of parliament, there could be no public offence.

My lords, it is, in my apprehension, superfluous to consider what was the state of the subject, previous to the warrant, upon the appointment of colonel Barré, which preceded the appointment of the noble lord, in August 1782. The noble person* since deceased who was attorney-general at that time, who, as my learned friend, Mr. Plumer, stated, proposed resolutions to the House of Commons, I know, had in contemplation some other measures, which might have produced a decree of a court of equity: Mr. Rigby's authority, I know, was against it, and I know there were other high and respectable parliamentary authorities against it; but the subject passed by. I believe almost every man felt, that there was no call for a retrospect at a time, when for so long a course of years the practice of using the public money had prevailed; when the high and respectable persons in the state who held those offices, really had not a remuneration that would induce persons of their consideration to take such offices. Some of the persons had long been dead, who had held those offices, and had been in possession of this money. Their representatives were children of tender years; it was an evil common both to those who had been ministers, and to those who were ministers. Lord North had been a joint paymaster of the forces, and so had Charles Townsend. There were exceptions, though few and rare; yet almost all of them had, either by their permission to those who had acted for them, or by connivance at their acts, made use of the public money; and accordingly it was passed over. But the government, concurring with the House of Commons, stopped the practice from that period.

Now, my lords, let us mark what were the measures taken for that purpose by the House of Commons, whose resolutions, we are told, are nothing. Be it so. If it became my friends so to express themselves of a resolution of the House of Commons upon such a subject I pass it over. The authority of the House of Commons will be little impugned by the representations of these gentlemen. The House of Commons resolved, that the paymaster of the forces, or treasurer of the navy, ought not thereafter to use the public money for private advantage. And, my lords, our gracious sovereign concurring with the object of the House of Commons, took measures, on his part, to give effect to their resolution, by granting an emolument adequate to the nature of those offices; not, my lords, proportionate to any labour, for of that there was none; but proportionate to the rank and importance of the person who might be expected to hold them. An increase of emolument to 4,000*l.* per annum was given to colonel Barré, who preceded the noble lord in this office. It was found in August, 1782, when the noble lord came into that office, that his majesty's intentions had not been completely accomplished; and a fresh measure was taken, to make up the sum of 4,000*l.* clear to the noble lord.

My lords, look back to the warrant. The warrant states it to be granted to him, in lieu of all fees, wages, and emoluments whatever. Why, my lords, was this not granted to take away all pretext for deriving any emolument from the public money? for applying it to any other use, than that for which the taxes are imposed upon the people and the money taken from them? Did that warrant prescribe to the noble lord a public duty? I should like to hear any man in England answer,—“No; that warrant prescribed no course of public duty to a public officer.” My lords, was the noble lord his majesty’s officer or not? If he was his majesty’s officer, was it competent to his majesty to prescribe this course of duty to him? Had his majesty a right to appoint, by patent, the noble lord to this office, and give him, at the same time, an increased emolument, as a consideration for all emoluments, except that liberal salary of 4,000*l.* a-year, which it was his majesty’s pleasure to grant him? And was it not competent for his majesty to prescribe to him, that he should not henceforth have any farther emolument from that office?

* Lord Kenyon.

Then those who argue that this did nothing, must state to your lordships, that there was something about this office of some peculiar nature which freed the person from all public obligation; that there was something about it which withdrew him from his majesty’s authority, from that authority from which he derived his appointment, that there was something about this office that rendered it competent for his majesty to increase the emoluments of it, but not competent for his majesty to prescribe a course of conduct to be followed by his servant.

My lords, can such a proposition be maintained? I have heard it asserted that there was no law binding upon him; but I contend, that the duty of every officer appointed by the king is a public duty, which the law will vindicate by criminal proceedings: and that the relation subsisting between him and the king consists in the difference between the situation of his majesty and another individual. If we talk of the relations between individuals as applicable to the case, and as creating the only obligations which arise out of it, we must renounce the whole history of the criminal law.

If those gentlemen had contented themselves with addressing to your lordships observations upon the facts, it had been one thing; but principles of jurisprudence are of great moment at all times—it is of the utmost importance to consider them well—that which is to be made law for the noble lord, that which is to be made law for any splendid or titled public accountant, is to be law for any clerk in the Exchequer; and to state of any public officer created by patent, that he had no public duty which could be vindicated by a prosecution; that no indictment, no information could be filed against him by the law officers of the Crown;—is a proposition which I apprehend to be utterly untenable, and which has not been supported by any argument.

My lords, between individuals, unquestionably, contracts can only be vindicated by civil remedies: an individual can only have his action upon the case, if the agreement is not under seal; he can only have a civil remedy resulting out of the contract: but it is a proposition scarcely to be addressed with decency to your lordships, that this public officer stood in no other relation to his majesty, than my servant stands to me. If I sent the one for any purpose with money in his hand, and he misapplied that money, under circumstances that did not bring him under a recent act, all that I could do would be to bring an action for my money; and so, be it recollected, his majesty may at any time file a bill in the Exchequer, to recover money or the profits of it, whilst in the hands of a public accountant; but, my lords, there is not a book on the criminal law which does not state, that the moment a public duty is cast upon a man, though it be a new duty created by act of parliament, if there is not a special remedy provided by the act of parliament, that man is responsible by the common law proceedings in respect of his duty. Then what are the exceptions to it? and above all, can the treasurer of the navy be stated as an exception to it?

My lords, what must become of the authority of the case of Mr. Bembridge, which grew out of the proceedings of the commissioners of accounts? Not only one of the noble lords who lately presided in the court of chancery, and in your lordships’ house, was his counsel, but the noble lord who now presides in this House was also his counsel: he had the best assistance, therefore, among whatever was rising to eminence in the profession; he had also the assistance of Mr. Bearcroft, who was afterwards appointed to a considerable judicial situation, chief justice of Chester.

But, my lords, what was Bembridge’s case?—He was an accountant in the Pay-office; Mr. Powell, his predecessor in that same department, had made up accounts. The noble employer of Powell had been dead from the year 1774, and the head and representative of that family was then an infant, but is now an ornament of your lordships’ house. Mr. Powell was executor of lord Holland, and he was charged with the task of making up his accounts, of which all the existing members of his family were as ignorant as I am. Mr. Powell omitted in those accounts a sum of 48,000*l.*—But that was Mr. Powell’s act. Mr. Bembridge succeeded Mr. Powell, and though he had not made up the accounts he knew of the omission, and concealed it. That, my lords, was the whole head and front of his offence—he did no more. Mr. Powell ceased to exist before a prosecution could be commenced against him, or at least before it could make any progress. Mr. Bembridge lived to his trial, and your lordships will find, that all that could be contended for, was contended for in the case of Mr. Bembridge.

My lords, I will take the liberty of stating this case:—It occurred at an interval when there is no printed report of the decisions of the Court of King’s Bench; it occurred after Mr. Douglas ceased to report, and before the commencement of the labours of Mr. Durnford and Mr. East; but there are several very correct manuscript reports of the case.* I shall content myself with stating what the noble lord† who then presided, as he had done for thirty years, over the criminal administration of justice in this country, and over a great part of the civil administration of justice in this country, said, after the long and repeated arguments of two of your lordships,‡ as counsel for Mr. Bembridge, not only in a great variety of forms, but on a great variety of topics, on a motion in arrest of judgment. These words are all which I shall take the liberty of stating to your lordships, because I think they contain all the principles which embrace the present case: "As to the motion in arrest of judgment the objection is, that at most it amounts to a breach of trust, a concealment, a fraud of a pecuniary nature—not indictable. It is a mere general injury, and that as for a public offence and a criminal proceeding there is no precedent."

Well worthy of attention, indeed, are the words of the learned lord;—"The law does not consist in particular instances, but in principles: two are clearly applicable—first, that if a man accepts an office of trust and confidence, concerning the public, especially when it is attended with profit, he is amenable to the king for the faithful discharge of it, and his majesty can call upon him by way of indictment. There are many officers not appointed immediately by the Crown: the custos brevium of this court is appointed by the chief justice. In Vidian there is an information for so neglectfully keeping the records of the court, that one of them was lost. This was a duty concerning the public, though he was not appointed by the king. Another principle is, where there is a breach of trust, a fraud or imposition, which, as between subject and subject, would only be liable to an action, it is indictable in the case of the Crown. There are some authorities, one as long ago as king Edward the 3rd; it was taken to be clear that an indictment would lie for the concealment of a pecuniary duty from the king." Lord Mansfield then states 27 Assize, and 1st Rolle's Report: and Mr. Serjeant Hawkins's Pleas for the Crown, cap. 25, sect. 4, he says—"Indictment does not lie for private injuries, unless they concern the king." He then cites 6 Modern 96, and concludes, "I am of opinion this crime is an indictable offence." Mr. Justice Willes and Mr. Justice Buller were of the same opinion; and Mr. Bembridge was sentenced to imprisonment for six calendar months, and to pay a fine of 2,650*l*. My lords, I have another

* The report of Bembridge's case, inserted in the first volume of this continuation, was taken from a manuscript in the office of the solicitor to the board of Treasury. The judgment of lord Mansfield will be found in p. 150 of that volume.

† Lord Mansfield.

‡ Lord Eldon and lord Erskine.

manuscript report of the same case, and I believe your lordships will find the correctness of the first justified by the second, and that of the second vouched by the first.

"It is said," said lord Mansfield, "this is a mere civil injury, a fraud, a breach of trust, and not indictable, and that there is no precedent of such an offence being indicted. The law, though explained by particular instances, does not consist in them, but in principles, which govern particular cases as they arise. There are two principles which apply to the present case—first, that where any person accepts of an office of trust and confidence respecting the public, especially when it is attended with profit, he is amenable to the king; and this can only be criminally, by whomsoever or howsoever that officer is appointed, whether appointed by his majesty or appointed by any other authority. There are many offices respecting the public which are not given by the king; for example, the masters in chancery." And then he cites the same cases which are stated in the manuscript report I have already stated.

"Secondly," he says, "there is another principle: any breach of trust, fraud or imposition, respecting the king and the public, which, between subject and subject, would only be actionable, if it concerns the public is indictable; there are some authorities for this, though the principle is sufficient, and it is essential to the existence of the country."

This principle, my lords, this venerable judicial magistrate, with all the experience he possessed, thus expresses himself to be necessary to the existence of the country; as if with a prophetic spirit he had foreseen what is passing before you; as if he had heard the doctrines that were uttered yesterday, when it was contended that there is no such principle—that this public officer, this treasurer of the navy, entrusted with the distribution and administration of public money, has no public duty which his majesty can vindicate—that he can commit no violation of that duty of which his majesty can go into any court to complain; but that he is subject only to the same remedies as if he were dealing in a matter of private concern with a private individual.

My lords, it will not be immaterial to conclude lord Mansfield's judgment. He says—"In the time of Edward the 3rd, it is clear that an indictment lay for an omission or concealment of a pecuniary duty to the king: 27 Assize, placito 17. Had that been between subject and subject, it would not have been indictable." Then he states, "In 1 Rolle's Reports, 2:—Lord Coke says, if a man collect any thing pro bono publico, and do not employ it accordingly, he may be indicted. In 2 Hawkins 25, sect. 4, the distinction between private and public injuries is clearly taken; in 6 Modern 96, it is said, any public officer is indictable for misbehaviour in his office; and there is no doubt that he is a public officer who has so much power over the public revenues."

Now, my lords, what was Mr. Bembridge's power over the public revenues compared with that of the noble lord? But if this be law, that the concealment of a pecuniary duty belonging to the king is a misdemeanor, and cognizable by criminal proceedings in the king's courts, what is the case of the noble lord? Has he concealed nothing? Has he permitted nothing to be done, my lords? There stand two confessions of the noble lord: one a spontaneous one, not only not sued for from him, but voluntarily tendered by him; not in the course of any inquiry, but which he chose deliberately to make.

My lords, my learned friend argued upon that, by asking your lordships if you would punish silence?—Punish silence!—Is it silence when a man says, I took ten thousand pounds of the public money, issued for naval services, and applied it to other public purposes, or applied it to private purposes? Is that what my learned friend, Mr. Plumer, understands by silence? If that be not speaking, what is it to speak? But, my lords, it does not stop there; for this silence continues with a defiance of all the public authorities of the kingdom, with a declaration that he would not disclose it; that his private honour or public duty, and other considerations which he states, induce him not to disclose it. This is Mr. Plumer's silence. My lords, this is confession. My lords, the noble lord, in his other confession, states distinctly that he knew, and understood, Mr. Trotter was employing the public money for his private advantage; for he is asked if he gave him authority. No: he gave him no authority. No, my lords, he did not give him a letter of attorney so to employ it, or a verbal authority so to employ it: but where is the difference, in a public officer's having a subordinate under him, knowing and understanding that that officer is using the public money for his own private emolument, and his giving him an express authority for doing it?

My lords, I should, be very glad if I had an opportunity of hearing what those venerable judicial magistrates, who are presiding in courts whose inquiries are of another kind, would say about the distinction, between the permitting a subordinate to do an act, and giving him authority to do it.

My lords, this, it appears to me, accounts for the resources to which the learned gentlemen were driven: they were oppressed and overpowered by the evidence; and to that only I can ascribe their having recourse to such strange and singular doctrines as they have resorted to in the year 1806, in order to contend, not only for that principle which is to absolve the noble lord, and to make him not accountable for the violation of that duty previous to the act of parliament, but also, my lords, to reduce the act of parliament itself to dust and ashes.

My lords, since the case of Bembridge, the case of the King v. Munton* has occurred. That was a case which would have created nothing but a civil remedy, as between individual and individual; but your lordships know (and the noble lord who presides, I believe, gave the benefit of his assistance to that defendant) what occurred in the case of the King v. Munton, and what was the nature of his offence and the fraud he committed. What are the circumstances which now press upon the public for consideration, and demand inquiry? Can any of those persons intrusted with the expenditure of the public money, for the purpose of providing for the wants of the army and navy, if they turn this power to their own private emolument, be brought to justice? May they not defy the Crown, and the officers of the Crown? If your lordships can be brought to sanction with your august authority the proposition contended for to-day, all paymasters and contractors may commit the frauds which they have been in the daily practice of committing, taking the chance of your getting back the money, if you can find them, at the end of an Exchequer suit. If that be all the inconvenience which they have to apprehend, adieu to the care of the public money. There are, in all human probability, persons of the description alluded to, attending this discussion, having a deep interest in the propositions submitted to your lordships by the learned gentlemen, and to which they have flattered themselves with your sanction: your decision is of the utmost moment to the general welfare of the country.

My lords, I shall not think it necessary to trouble your lordships any further upon that part of the case. I mean now to proceed to discuss the ideas of those learned gentlemen, respecting the remedial law: and it will be for your lordships to instruct us, and them, whether the construction put by the managers for the Commons on this law, be that construction in which the public have an interest, and which was the object of the legislature; or whether their exposition of it be the exposition which is to receive judicial sanction.

My lords, this act has two objects with respect to the public money. It directs, in the two or three first clauses, that the money to be issued out of the Exchequer shall be taken to the Bank, and shall not, any part of it, go into the possession of the treasurer of the navy. Why, my lords? because it was not intended that he should have the custody of cash; because it was intended to deprive him of the opportunity of having that custody, except only where it was inevitable. That not he or even his paymaster who pays nothing, but who draws for the money under a written authority from the treasurer of the navy, should have any custody of the public money: it is all therefore to go to the Bank. Then the learned gentlemen say, this is the whole object of the act of parliament? and when that is done, the whole is accomplished. Why all this care and caution to get it to the Bank, if the treasurer of the navy might have the custody of it the moment it got there? Such a construction of the act is perfectly ridiculous! They look at one end of the act, cut out the rest of it, and then they say, this act and the Bank clerk only were wanted to take the money safely eastward of Temple Bar; but when in the Bank, the power of the treasurer over it commenced, he might have the custody of it after that time. The act then was functus officio, according to them. A senseless thing in parliament! If that was the whole object of it, what was the use of taking care it should go safely there, when the moment it got there, the treasurer could draw it out, without restraint or limit, provided only that he put into the form of his draft, "for naval services?" And when any officer under him, whose sordid appetites might lead him to make pretences, which I will never pay a compliment so degrading to the noble lord as to believe could impose upon him for a moment, suggested to him some contemptible pretence, and imaginary convenience which could not impose upon a man of sense, especially on a person of the high acquirements of the noble lord, of his great experience in all business, that the money might be taken from the Bank, and lodged elsewhere at the discretion of the treasurer or his agent; does the act warrant it? Now, it must be admitted, that the reason why the money is to proceed from the Exchequer to the Bank, without the possibility of the treasurer of the navy's intercepting it, is, to prevent the treasurer's having the custody of the cash. What a singular idea then is it, that the moment that is done the act cares no more about the custody of the cash! It is only the custody westward of Temple Bar, only the custody of it here. Thus is this most important act, as the public supposed it was when they obtained it, and those who laid the foundation for it supposed it would be, made, I will not say senseless, but ludicrous. It is such a representation of the act as it is difficult to state with gravity. However, we have now got the money safe within the walls of the Bank; then what is to be done?

* 1 Esp. N. P. C. 60,

My lords, the fourth clause directs, "That the treasurer of his majesty's navy for the time being, by himself, or the person or persons in his office duly authorized by him, from and after the first day of July, 1785, shall draw upon the governor and company of the Bank of England for all navy services whatever, and shall specify in each and every draft, the head of service for which the same is drawn; and no draft of the said treasurer, or the person or persons authorized as aforesaid, shall be deemed a sufficient voucher"—I will take that branch of this clause afterwards, I stop therefore at the words "for which the same is drawn." Why, when it is in the Bank it is to be applied to navy services; it must be drawn for, for those navy services by somebody, but it must be drawn for, for navy services; that is the object of the act: not that the form of the draft is to be for navy service merely; not that in consequence of any body's ideas of convenience, he may draw a draft by way of having the custody of the cash somewhere else, in any other depository than the Bank: that is a thing distinctly prohibited. Then, my lords, can it be contended under this fourth clause, that the treasurer of the navy or his deputy, specifying only in his draft that it is drawn for navy service, may carry the money elsewhere for his own convenience, Mr. Trotter's convenience, or the convenience of any other person? The act can bear no such construction. The Bank indeed is justified in not paying the drafts of the treasurer, unless they shall specify the head of service for which they are drawn. It is immaterial to the Bank whether the drafts specify the real services to which they are to be applied or not: the Bank is justified if the drafts are drawn in the form which the act requires; not so the treasurer of the navy, he is to draw for navy services, but he is to draw bona fide for navy service; he is not to draw the money out for the purpose of defeating the principal and main object of the act, its corner stone, its sheet anchor. There is no phrase, however emphatical, that may not be applied to express that the object of this act was to prevent the treasurer of the navy from having the custody of the cash, and there is not a pretence to justify the drawing out any part of the money, and depositing it elsewhere, till it was wanted.

Before I proceed, I would trouble your lordships upon the following clause, which is a proviso rather than a distinct clause:—"That the monies to be issued unto the governor and company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, shall not be paid out of the Bank unless for navy services; and in pursuance of drafts to be drawn on the governor and company of the Bank of England, and signed by the treasurer of his majesty's navy for the time being, or the person or persons authorized as aforesaid."—Your lordships see that there are two parts of that sentence—it shall not be drawn out unless for navy services, and in pursuance of drafts to be drawn in the way this clause prescribes. First, "unless for navy services." Then how was this drawn out for navy services? If that proposition means, that some time or other the money has been applied to navy services; that I deny to be a correct interpretation of the act: if it means that the money two months or two years afterwards was applied to navy services; I deny that to be a compliance with the spirit of the law: if it means that money carried from the Bank, and in the mean time deposited elsewhere, was afterwards used for navy services, and that can be justified, because the draft specified it was drawn for navy services; all those propositions I deny: and yet your lordships must, by applying the law to the facts of this case, affirm all those propositions, before you can sanction the doctrine contended for.

My lords, the latter part of the act directs, "That upon the death, resignation, or removal of the present, and every other treasurer of his majesty's navy, hereafter to be appointed, the balance of cash, for which he shall at that time have credit on his account or accounts as treasurer of his majesty's navy, with the governor and company of the Bank of England, shall, at the end of the current month after a successor shall be appointed to the said office, actually vest in such successor in trust, for the service of the Navy under the respective heads, and be forthwith transferred, and carried over;" which supposes it to be at the Bank. It directs an account to be kept by the treasurer of the Navy, demonstrating that all he was intended to be, was a mere accountant, according to the spirit and letter of these reports, and to cease to be a banker.

My lords, in construing this act the 11th clause, for the effect of which I recollect my friend Mr. Adam felt some apprehension, is extremely remarkable. Here is a proviso, "That this act shall not extend, or be construed to extend, to prevent the treasurer of the Navy from issuing to the pay-clerks at the several out-ports, such sums as may be thought necessary by the Navy board, for paying ships, and carrying on recalls; and the pay-clerk at each port shall, and he is hereby required to make up at the end of every month, an account of all his receipts and payments during that month." I say upon this, when my learned friend, Mr. Plumer, asked, whether the money could be safer with a subordinate of the noble lord, than with the noble lord? I say, the law is the noble lord's justification; he would not be responsible for the money in the hands of his pay-clerk, because the law directs it shall be issued to him; and if he had wasted or embezzled the money, the noble lord would not have been responsible; because what he had done would have been in pursuance of the act of parliament; but this is not unlimited, because those sums are only such as shall be thought necessary by the Navy board, for paying ships, and carrying on recalls.

Then what am I to think of an act of parliament which contains in the body of it this proviso, "that nothing shall be construed to prevent him from drawing for such limited sums as may be thought necessary by the Navy board, for paying ships, and carrying on recalls?" Seeing in a law such a proviso as this, can I construe it in the way in which the learned gentlemen of counsel for the noble lord, call upon your lordships to construe it?

My lords, I wish to make one observation upon the nature of this office, before I address to your lordships a few words upon the effect of the construction which my learned friends are sanguine enough to ask from your lordships. There is one head only, my lords, of public money in this office, for which the treasurer of the Navy applies of his own motion, and no other. He, or his deputy, under his authority, applies for money to pay Exchequer fees; that is a distinct matter, and does not follow the rest of the account; and here is the only exception in the act: And with respect to the small payments which are made, all has been said upon that subject that need be said.

Now, let us try the two constructions. We are contending for this: Not that the noble lord, or any other treasurer of the Navy, may not furnish those officers, who are to make the small payments, with such sums as shall be necessary for that purpose; if any treasurer were questioned in a criminal court for having abused his power in doing so, he would have a complete answer to the allegation against him, by showing that he had only bona fide done so. The act enables him, under the authority of the Navy board, to issue money for paying the ships and carrying on recalls. Then beyond that what is the inconvenience? what is the object of the law? Can a doubt be raised in your lordships' minds that the principal object of the act was to prevent the public money, at any time and by any means being deposited any where but at the Bank; that all that is said is subsidiary and secondary to the attainment of that end? If that be so, upon what warrant is it that such a strange construction is asked as shall pervert this wise and salutary object of the legislature? What is the inconvenience of our construction? None can attend it. The public money is safe, it is free from risk; it is safer and better for a public accountant, and if your lordships thought yourselves at liberty to consult the convenience of public accountants themselves your lordships could not put a construction better for them, than to remove all opportunities of dealing with the public money, and all temptation of meddling with it. Your lordships could not put a better construction for them and their families, than that we are contending for. But take the reverse; look at the construction the learned counsel ask for! What does it lead to? Why, if this be done, the moment the money gets to the Bank, may not the treasurer say, I think it more convenient to have it at Charing Cross, or in the Strand; and may not his deputy, (for let me here say, the high and respectable person who always fills this office is frequently occupied with very different pursuits, and the execution of the duties of this office is left to some such persons as your lordships are brought acquainted with upon this occasion,) —upon the score of convenience, or any other false pretence to do the same.

In this case it is said, no loss has ultimately been sustained by the public. Is that to regulate the construction of this act of parliament? What may be the case to-morrow? What may be the case of the next public accountant? Was it that loss was certain to happen? or, was the object of the legislature to prevent the risk of loss? Was it not to remove a temptation of delay in passing the public accounts? Was it not that public accounts, such as those that remain at this day unpassed of more millions than I am capable of counting, those of 1758 and 1760 (now at a distance of time during which children are grown to be old men), should not recur? Your lordships are called upon to give a construction to this act, which is to lead to a continuance of all these abuses. Give him but the custody of the public money, will the accounts be proceeded in? will they be carried forward? But give his subordinates and deputies that power, will they ever be passed? Is it to be imagined that those upon whom the making up these accounts will depend, will part with them; in other words, that they will part with the money? Should they be the best and most moral men, will your lordships subject the public money to this risk by placing it in such a state? It was safe where Mr. Trotter says he put it. No doubt it was safe, so far as its safety depended on the credit of the persons in whose banking shop it was; but it was subject to Mr. Trotter's call; it was subject to his draft; he might take it from Mr. Coutts's the next morning.—These are the consequences of that construction which is contended for, on the other side. Your lordships are to look at the mischief which was intended to be suppressed; your lordships are to look at the policy of the legislature in this act of parliament. You will give it a liberal exposition, such as, according to the principles of our jurisprudence, courts of justice do give to all remedial laws. No public accountant ought to be heard to ask for another construction. What interest has he to state a right of carrying the public money elsewhere? The first learned gentleman stated, that it was his right to do it. My lords, he has no right, but to be a trustee for the public; his obligations are all the obligations of a trustee; and whatever those obligations would impose upon any individual, who had the money of any fund in his possession, he was under obligations as strict, or perhaps more strict; because, if such person acts bona fide, if he acts for the best, there are many instances in which he will be absolved from loss. But here is a plain duty prescribed to this public officer; he is only to pursue that duty; and no defence ought to be received from him which goes the length of claiming a right to deal with this money, or to suffer any person under him to deal with it, out of the course of the act of parliament.

The noble defendant's knowledge of Mr. Trotter's transactions, charges him with them upon the acknowledged principle laid down by lord Mansfield in that case to which I have referred, upon the acknowledged principles of jurisprudence. He knew of that breach of the act, committed by a person whom he had appointed by his sole authority, and who was removeable at his pleasure; he knew it, and he permitted it to be done. I should be glad to hear, if it were not indeed too late now to hear the argument that could be addressed to your lordships, or any court of justice, to absolve lord Melville from the consequences of Mr. Trotter's acts, after lord Melville's own confession.

My lords, I beg your lordships' pardon for having addressed you at this length, upon a subject of the deepest importance to the country. My lords, there never was before, in a court of judicature, a cause pregnant with more public consequences than this your lordships have now to decide. I shall have as little satisfaction as any friend of that noble lord, in seeing him subjected, in consequence of your lordships' judgment, to any mortification; but an attempt has been made to excite a weak and feminine compassion for the noble lord in the minds of this court. He has from many persons, no doubt, the highest claim to respect; he has, no doubt "honour, love, obedience, troops of friends," knots of dependents, in various parts of this extensive empire; but the public, I hope, has not fewer friends. And, my lords, I trust that your exposition of this act of parliament; your judgment, forgetting, as I am sure you will do, all the personal consequences to the noble lord, and applying the same law to him as you would apply to the meanest subject of this country, will not disappoint the anxious expectation of the Commons of the United Kingdom, and of an intelligent and enlightened public.

Mr. Whitbread; My lords, the Commons having addressed to your lordships that part of their reply to the defence of the noble viscount, which consists of a due exposition of the law upon this subject, through that powerful organ which has just ceased to speak; and he having completed, for the satisfaction of your lordships, and in refutation of the learned counsel on the other side, that perfect argument which you have just now heard; I am commanded, in pursuance of that method which, from the earliest period of this prosecution, they have thought it their bounden duty to adopt, to reply generally to all that has been urged on the part of the noble defendant. But, my lords, after the confident manner in which you have been spoken to by the learned counsel during twelve hours, how shall I address you? My lords, it can only be in the knowledge I have, that confidence is not always the sign of strength; and that diffidence does not always argue the weakness of a cause. For, my lords, neither have I that fulcrum which the great Syracusan philosopher, in the physical world, said he could not obtain, but which a modern orator has boasted before you, that he, in the moral world, possessed; neither have I that fulcrum by which I could wield your lordships at my will; nor, if I had it, by heavens! would I use it to confound the elements of moral justice in this court, any more than Archimedes himself would have used it in the physical world, if he could have obtained it there, to confound all the powers of nature. I would not attempt, if I were able, to shake, your noble minds from the due course of justice: and if I were to tell you there was a point in the moral universe upon which I could stand to effect it, you would deride my assurance; you would know the attempt to be as impracticable, as, if it were practicable, it would be criminal and foul.

Let not any man say, that the thread of those events in which he is engaged is spun to its utmost extremity. Let not any man say, in the anguish of his heart, that afflictions cannot increase upon him; that he has indeed drunk the cup of bitterness to its dregs. Let not any man, under any of those trials of public life in which he may be involved, imagine that the corroding cares and anxieties which surround us in the deep visions of the night, and attend our daily path, can admit of no accumulation! To these reflections, my lords, I am irresistibly led by those observations of the learned counsel on the other side, which have been addressed personally to myself, and the effusion of them before your lordships will afford me some relief.

If, my lords, at the moment I first read the impartial report of those able commissioners, one* of whom has appeared as a witness at your lordships' bar, I was stimulated with an ardour to see, what I thought, the wrongs of my country redressed; if I was anxious when I first brought the matter before the Commons House of Parliament; if that anxiety continually increased, even amidst the success of my endeavours, up to the very moment when I had the honour to address your lordships at this bar; I protest, that all I have before felt is gone, and vanishes, when compared to the feelings of this day. If, indeed (as represented by the learned counsel† in the vein of refined sarcasm which pervaded his whole speech), I have fulfilled all the various duties, which it was necessary that one or more men should undertake upon this occasion; if I have not only hewn the stone, and drawn the water, but have sketched out the foundation, and attempted to rear the fabric in part,—if hands, far abler than mine, have since contributed to the work; and if, at last, I am deputed to put the key-stone to this arch;—when I know that the materials are at hand; when I know that all the efforts to destroy the work have been vain, and that it depends only upon my steadiness and skill to complete the whole; your lordships will surely pardon me when I claim some indulgence at your hands;—and, notwithstanding the attention with which you have been pleased to honour me and this cause, I entreat the favour of you, if I am not able to express myself so concisely as I could wish, to grant me your patience to the end.

But, my lords, let not that learned person think he has succeeded, in what must have been the main object of some parts of his speech, to distract my attention from the cause to myself. The stores of his classical mind may have furnished him with repeated examples where the race has not been to the swift, but to the crafty; where, by attending to lures purposely thrown out, those who, but for their own unwariness, ought to have succeeded, have been obliged to yield the prize. In the tales of infancy, in those eastern fables which are first read with avidity, because they gratify the mind, as food is taken because it gratifies the palate, but which, when well digested, become the subject of mature wisdom in riper years, I have learnt the maxims of prudence. There I have read, that there was placed at the top of some lofty mountain, a great and desirable prize, which many had undertaken to obtain; but in the approaches to that prize there were such formidable aspects, such voices, such threatenings, such provocations of temper, and also such allurements of flattery, that many who had attempted it (forgetting the rule which was laid down as indispensable to their safety, not to attend to the terrors or temptations of the way, but to keep straight forward) were turned into stone;—the one who was proof against all this, succeeded and obtained the prize. So, my lords, I trust that I shall neither suffer any provocation of temper, nor any compliment which the learned counsel may have thought fit to bestow upon me, to tempt me, nor any self-love to prompt me, to turn aside from the object I have in view,—which is, to obtain justice upon lord viscount Melville, whom I here declare, in the face of his learned counsel and the public, we have proved guilty before your lordships.

My lords, the time will come, and it is not far distant, in which the learned counsel have made it necessary for me to speak of myself; and I trust that, if memory, strength, and life fail me not before that moment arrives, I shall be able to satisfy the learned counsel, your lordships, and the world, that the characters in which I have appeared before you and them are not incompatible; and, conducting myself with propriety as a manager, that I have conducted myself with truth and honour as a witness, in this cause. My lords, I trust I shall be able to show, not only that those duties are not incompatible with each other; but that there are no duties, which can be imposed upon a public man, however numerous, when executed with an upright, honest intention, in the true purity of his heart, and to the best of his ability, that are not reconcileable. There are occasions when he, whose mind is capacious enough to plan the building, may carry the materials with dignity and effect.

* Mr. Serjeant Praed.

† Mr. Plumer.

I have certainly felt the severity intended for me by the learned counsel, who has so frequently brought me before the Court; but as the most exquisite pangs of the body are supported by the most delicate and amiable of the human race, not only with forbearance, but with exultation, in the expectation of the delicious and beloved fruit thereof; so I, while writhing under the keen lashes of his wit, found consolation in the indulgence of a fond expectation, that the fruit would be indeed that which I love,—justice to my country: for I knew that his cause must be weak when he quitted it in pursuit of so humble an object as myself.

My lords, I was not wrong when I informed your lordships of the talents of the learned counsel opposed to me:—they have given you an indisputable proof of them now, if they could possibly have been suspected before;—they have acted like able honest men.—Of argument, in point of time or ingenuity, nothing has been wanted; of proof, indeed, on the part of the noble defendant, and of contradiction to the proof we have brought, every thing. They have boldly and repeatedly asserted, that our proof was nothing; they were bound to assert it; but foundation for their assertions there was none; and under such circumstances, what could men do more than they have done?

My lords, it is a wise maxim, that when a man is arraigned of any crime, he should not undertake his own defence. How truly has that been exemplified in the cause now before you!—for, if lord Melville, with all the ability he possesses, had undertaken his whole defence, would it have been possible for him to have made it of that sort which has been attempted by his learned counsel? for which we are to understand, he is not responsible: by which, however, he must at this hour abide. If, my lords, it be wise to trust the defence of a case to counsel, whose passions and whose interests are not so much engaged, whose minds are not prejudiced, and whose consciences do not interfere with their arguments, there is some danger in trusting the defence to two instead of one; there is still greater danger when a part of that defence is undertaken by the defendant himself. All the three have been here engaged, and it remains for some fourth person to show the inconsistencies of the different modes which have been attempted by the two learned counsel, and that which was previously attempted in the House of Commons by the noble defendant himself.

My lords, if, on the one hand, we have had, in a most able speech, for eight solid hours, from one of those learned gentlemen, deprecation, art, contrivance, endeavours to evade, to mislead, to misrepresent;—we have have had from the other, during four successive hours, bold assertions, of a sort that would astonish any man in a court of justice who had at all attended to the case.—After the attempts to evade by Mr. Plumer, we have concessions and admissions, on the part of Mr. Adam, from which, if the noble defendant were not previously bound by other ties, he could not possibly escape. Upon those admissions, excluding every other thing, if they be true, the noble lord at your bar is guilty.

My lords, I will not follow the leading counsel in this defence, by stating to your lordships what has appeared in or out of this House, previous to the day of trial. It is improper; it is irrelevant; I should not think it decorous. But, my lords, I may be allowed to take a short review of the circumstances of the trial itself, as affecting not only the character of this prosecution, as far as it regards the noble defendant and the public, but as affecting in the highest degree the criminal jurisprudence of this country, and giving to it a character, which, if it had been lost, or were even doubtful before, is now established upon the rock of justice and of truth.—My lords, the learned counsel has talked of associated libellers, of predisposition to punishment, of cruelty, and of the vexation of mind of the noble viscount;—of months passed in calamity. My lords, these are not now matter of consideration; but, if they were, I could refute every position of the learned counsel:—I repeat it, they are not now matter of consideration. He is upon his trial. My lords, by whom is he brought to that trial? by the Commons of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland. The Commons are a jealous body; jealous of their own rights, jealous of their own privileges, jealous of any thing that shall interfere with their exclusive and prescriptive rights. He is brought before a court equally jealous of its privileges, and equally standing upon its points of honour.

If we review the history of this country as to cases of impeachment, we shall find, that these conflicting jealousies and privileges have, upon some occasions, when pertinaciously insisted upon on each side, contributed to the escape of the delinquent: in others, long delay, resulting from peculiar circumstances, has brought the mode of trial by impeachment into disrepute. The assemblage of the public which is now around us, and the structure in which we stand, with all its accompaniments, have been sometimes represented as a vain parade, calculated only to enhance the expense of the defendant, and not conducing to any good purpose whatever. My lords, the greater the publicity, the greater the effect; and I am happy in being able to congratulate the noble defendant and his friends, on the event of this trial, so far as it has gone; which has proved that had he been tried in your lordships' own chamber of parliament, he would have been at the same expense both as to time and treasure as he is at this day. It is indeed a great satisfaction to me—How much greater satisfaction do I feel, that I can say, the Commons have maintained their dignity: and that that dignity has in no degree been intruded upon by any part of the Court! How happy am I to reflect, that the noble person presiding in the Court has so concentrated all the learning upon the law which has been adduced in the course of our interlocutory debates, that the other great legal characters have entirely gone with him upon every point which has been decided; and not only so, but that all the feelings of propriety, all the judicial dignity, all the mildness towards the defendant, and all the sternness towards the prosecutors, which ought to exist in order to cast a restraint upon improper zeal, have likewise appeared to center in that noble person; so that if there had been wanting a model of trials by impeachment, in all essential points, I think I may venture to say, such model is now afforded.

But, my lords, the Commons are not only jealous of their rights and privileges, but they are also jealous of any attack made upon those whom they delegate to execute their functions: and I wish I could say the learned counsel had so treated the Commons and their managers, as to leave no ground of blame. Insinuations have been thrown out respecting unwearied diligence, accompanied by a tone, which would lead one to believe that, in the mind of the person speaking, that diligence had not been free from persecuting zeal; and some attempts have been made to cast reproach, in cross-examination, upon the mode of obtaining particular papers, which have been brought in evidence before your lordships; it is not because the Commons do not feel these things, that they do not observe upon them; but because they know they stand so high, that they may treat all such insinuations with scorn. If they do not comment upon them, it is not because they forget them, but because they do indeed condemn them.

My lords, as to your own court, something has been thrown out about the possibility of a challenge. Upon such a subject it will not be necessary to say more than this, which has been admitted; that an order was given by the House of Commons to prosecute lord Melville in a court of law, where he would have the right to challenge his jurors; that after various proceedings, an eminent member of the House of Commons,* now no longer attorney-general, but who was immediately succeeded in that office by my able and honourable friend near me, was directed to draw up an indictment against him. What did the noble viscount then do, by the means of one of his friends? For to its present state it came at last by the interference of one of the persons who had said, either that he was guilty of no crime, or, if guilty, he had already been sufficiently punished. From the mouth of that learned gentleman* came at last the successful motion, "That Henry Viscount Melville be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors." I am justified, then, in saying that he is here by his own option; he is here by the desire of his friends, and by their means and instrumentality; for those who originally proposed impeachment, thought, for reasons which appeared to them sound, that the course first adopted by the House of Commons in opposition to them, ought to have been persevered in.

But, my lords, a challenge to your lordships! Is not every individual peer the guardian of his own honour? And can the learned counsel suppose for a moment that before you, clothed as you are, came into this hall, each had not consulted his own honour, and, having found it free from stain, has attended? Having attended, notwithstanding the admonitions of the learned gentleman, each is bound to decide upon his honour, whether that noble viscount be guilty or not.

My lords, another part of the course of the learned counsel, on the other side, has consisted in an endeavour to mislead your lordships upon topics far wide of any the Commons have submitted to your consideration. The learned counsel have laboured, both in their speeches and their cross-examinations, to impress you with the merits of that noble lord, and his services in other departments of the state. That he was an admirable secretary of state; an indefatigable president of the board of control; that his care of Scotland was exemplary; in short, that every thing belonging to him was good, but his custody of the naval treasure. My lords, it is upon that we charge. We charge not here, that he was remiss as secretary of state; we charge not here, that he was an inefficient member of the board of control; we charge not here, that he did not administer the government of Scotland with propriety, or that he clandestinely created for himself an improper degree of influence in that country. These are not our charges: But, I think, I can perceive the motive which has prompted the learned counsel to speak to these points. He is not ignorant of the political events of these or former days; and he may have thought, in a case where he had no defence, it was his duty to mislead. The Commons, happily for this country, can never be long an unanimous body; and he may have hoped to draw the managers into political discussion. From that also I shall abstain, and confine myself to the charge made by the Commons, of the mismanagement of the naval treasure;—that treasure, which has its fibrous root in the meal of every peasant; in the cloth of the

---

* Mr. Perceval.

---

* Mr. Leycester.

coat he wears ; in the implements with which he earns his daily bread ; in every article he consumes. If it has been exposed to the risk of loss only, without thinking at this moment of the gains the noble defendant may have made ; and if the example he has set shall not be corrected in his person, but shall produce the loss which was threatened by his means : every peasant in the kingdom, every mechanic, every sailor, and the widow and orphan of every sailor, every tar maimed in the victories of his country, must pay a share.

My lords, we have been also told, with a degree of ostentation—and witnesses (the only ones called by the learned counsel for the noble defendant) have been brought to prove it,—of the extreme munificence of the noble defendant to his country ; and the statement of his gifts has been contrasted with a calculation put in by the Commons, which the learned counsel would persuade you, shows all the gains, to the last farthing, that have been made by the noble defendant. My lords, we put in no such calculation ; we do not pretend to calculate the amount of his gains.—We did put in the result of a calculation of profit upon certain parcels of stock, which we have fixed upon him. In answer to this came Mr. Pollock, from the secretary of state's office ; Mr. Chapman, from the war department ; Mr. Litchfield, from another quarter ; and all tell you, that lord Melville, indeed, to their knowledge, has been so exemplary a servant to the public, that not only, as Mr. Meheux says, he has served his country night and day (which I do not now dispute ; let his services be as great as they may in other departments, that is not the question now) ; but that he has voluntarily relinquished large parts of his salary. O ! ungenerous, ungrateful public ! O ! unfeeling Commons !—say his counsel ; who so persecute this most excellent man, whom you ought to revere ; because, as guardians of the public purse, you should revere every man who attempts to ease the burthens of the people ; you have charged him in this paper, with certain gains, and we will show you he has presented you with a great deal more. How puerile ! how absurd ! Supposing, for the sake of argument, that lord Melville had, with a generosity towards the public, of a nature which is always suspicious, given up a large part of his salary ; could that prevent your lordships from pronouncing him guilty of the charge which the Commons bring against him ? No, my lords ; this is not the time to consider any thing but the charge itself. But, at least, it is competent to the Commons to show, that what the counsel build upon has no foundation whatever. That there was no relinquishment of salary ; and further, that the pretended relinquishment of a part of his salary, is one of the acts which would be conclusive against him ; as the strong presumption must be, that he retained the office of treasurer of the navy, for improper purposes.

My lords, there is an undisputed fact recorded upon the Journals of the House of Commons, Vol. LIII. p. 157, which is, that on the revival of the office of third secretary of state, an arrangement was made, by which no secretary of state could receive more than 6,000*l.* a-year in the whole ; and although the resolution proposed to the House of Commons on that subject did not pass, the fact stated is equally beyond dispute ; it is there said, that “ Lord Grenville having, as auditor of the Exchequer, a salary of 4,000*l.* a-year, and, as secretary of state, a salary of 6,000*l.* does not receive of the latter more than 3,200*l.* per annum, and consequently gives to the civil list the annual sum of 2,800*l.*” In consequence of the same arrangement, “ The right honourable Henry Dundas having, as treasurer of the navy, 4,000*l.* per annum ; as commissioner for the affairs of India, 2,000*l.* per annum ; as keeper of the signet, in Scotland, 1,500*l.* ; and, as secretary of state, a salary of 6,000*l.* per annum ; does not, in fact, receive from this last appointment more than 2,000*l.*, and consequently gives to the civil list the annual sum of 4,000*l.*” Why did he give it ? Because he could not help it ; because the arrangement was so made that he could not have more than 6,000*l.* a-year, be he secretary of state, treasurer of the navy, and what else he would, exclusive of his patent places. But why not take the whole 6,000*l.* a-year from the office of secretary of state ? Why retain the treasurership of the navy ? Oh ! he was so important a public man, that you could not find in all England—(alas ! poor England !)—you could not find within her precincts, or even in the adjoining kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, any body to fill any of the arduous situations in which he was toiling for the public. But are we so unskilled in political arrangements as not to know, that if a treasurer of the navy had been wanting, he might have been found any where ? not to know, that that office is a boon in the hands of an administration ? not to know, that the noble defendant himself is aware, that, in bestowing the office of treasurer of the navy, a great support is created for the administration that bestows it ? But no ;—although secretary of state, president of the board of control, keeper of the privy seal in Scotland, and keeper of the signet,—I will be treasurer of the navy still. Let us a little consider !—Supposing we were making political arrangements together, and I could presume I were a person fit to converse on such matters, I should say, this is a little whimsical ; why will you be treasurer of the navy all the time ? Why, I mean to quit the office of secretary of state almost immediately.—Oh, but you have changed from one secretaryship of state to another, and still you keep the treasurership of the navy !—Why, my lords, if we dive into the reason, it is, that 4,000*l.* a-year, as treasurer of the navy was better than 4,000*l.* as secretary of state. The Commons, then, my lords, reject this proffered kindness of the noble lord, and say, it is as much a pretence as the 10,000*l.* he states himself to have spent for their sake.

Other arguments have been used of a general nature by the learned counsel, and particularly the first who spoke; but insisted upon also by Mr. Adam, who followed him founded on the habits of the noble lord; his inaccuracy in accounts,—his indisposition to look at figures,—he cannot bear them at all; and as to money matters, look here, look there, say they, to various pages of the evidence, and you must acquit him; because Mr. Trotter has said he was so inattentive as to his private concerns. If there had been nobody to come after them, who had read the evidence, and out of that evidence could extract any thing, and out of their speeches collect more, they might have been in the right; but surely, surely, they were a little off their guard when they stated these things; for what is the very first act of this treasurer of the navy, who cares so little about money? Why this careless, negligent, inattentive treasurer says, Mr. Barré's salary, which is nominally 4,000*l.* a-year, wants of 4,000*l.* a-year so many pounds, shillings, and pence; now, will your majesty be pleased to give to Henry Dundas what was not made up to Mr. Barré?—There is his inattention to his pecuniary concerns, in the first moment of his introduction to the treasurership.

Then, as to talent for figures, they were quite out of his way. Yet the Commons have frequently witnessed the ability displayed by the noble defendant, in opening the Indian accounts, which are of the most complicated and intricate nature. Notwithstanding, he is not only so inattentive to his own interest, as that he never considers whether he owes money, borrows money, pays interest for money, or has money without interest; not only he knows nothing about those matters, but he has no capacity for accounts whatever, even if he had a taste for them. Upon these general topics, I should not have dwelt so long, if it had not been for the indefatigable attempts of the learned counsel, on the other side, to impress your lordships with this false idea of lord Melville's character. There might be another reason why lord Melville continued treasurer of the navy for so great a length of time, independent of those I have assigned, namely, that when he did go out, his balances must at all events be paid up, and that might not at all times have been convenient.

My lords, the learned counsel, who opened the defence, has in a most marked, gallant, but, I cannot help thinking, rather an injudicious manner, considering how that defence has been conducted, told us, that if we could fix the proof of one single act upon the noble lord, he would give up the case, and confess his client guilty.

Immediately upon this assertion, the learned counsel proceeded to consider what had been our means of proof, and after acknowledging a specific fact to have been proved, he says, no doubt the Commons have proved this; but still now after twenty four years, will your lordships expect that we shall be able to disprove it? My lords, unhappily his pledge is given, and we have fixed this single act. I select a single act, for the sake of argument (and to confute the learned counsel one is sufficient), and they have not attempted to disprove it; then a verdict of guilty must pass upon lord Melville, according to their own confession. But your lordships will also recollect, that lord Melville, has most solemnly asserted, under his own hand, that during the paymastership of Mr. Douglas, he never received one shilling of emolument from the public money. He had not only asserted it, but added, that he was ready to swear it.—Before he offered to swear it, he ought to have ascertained that he had the means of showing its truth.

The learned counsel, in the next place, lament over the death of witnesses, the silence of Mr. Trotter, and, last of all, they have the conscience to lament over the destruction of papers. Would to God, my lords, for the sake of justice, I could revive Mr. Douglas! Oh! What an unwelcome visitor would he be to lord Melville, if it were only because he could read his own manuscript; but he is dead, and, would you believe it? most unfortunately for the defendant. No, my lords, not so, most unfortunately for the prosecutors.—But Mr. Trotter was dumb—and then, the vouchers are all destroyed. Why, my lords, the death of Mr. Douglas was the act of nature; the destruction of the vouchers was the joint act of the defendant and Mr. Trotter; and the dumbness of Mr. Trotter was owing to the crimes for which he has now received his pardon: and there is the true solution of that bold defence made by the noble lord; there was the triple brass which he bound round him when he went into the House of Commons. "I know," said he, "that Mr. Douglas is dead, I know that Mr. Trotter is dumb, I know that the papers are destroyed: why then I may defend myself as I please, and I shall never be detected." But, my lords, industry and labour, without talent, will do much; we toiled, we did every thing that honourable men ought to do; but we did no one thing that can bring a stain upon the Commons House of Parliament; and by perseverance, we have succeeded in proving more than at this distance of time could possibly have been expected.

Then, my lords, as to the evidence we have brought, and the nature of that evidence, both parol and documentary. The learned counsel have talked a great deal about our hunting in this place and that place; of our having possessed ourselves of all lord Melville's private papers; and they have thereby endeavoured to throw an odium upon the prosecution. Why, my lords, where were we to find the traces of the charges we had made, except in the private papers of lord Melville? If the charge be, that a great public officer has taken advantage of his situation, to make profit of the public money, where can the traces of his deeds be found, except in his private papers or account books? We have abstained, as much as possible, from unnecessary knowledge of his private affairs; we have taken nothing but what we thought essential for the prosecution; and we leave to your lordships to judge whether we have made any improper use of our authority. Nay, I call upon the noble defendant himself to say, whether the Commons have not treated him, in that respect, as he would wish himself to have treated any other person.

My lords, another subject has been touched by the learned counsel; that of lord Melville's having hastily made some rash assertions, of his having used indiscreet expressions, and when called upon (I think that was the expression) to speak, that his speech had in part been taken down (upon which I shall have occasion to animadvert hereafter), and that even his silence had been construed to his disadvantage. What is the true state of the case? The learned counsel says, that the noble defendant had long courted inquiry. So far from it, endeavours were used to stifle all inquiry. At length, however, the time did come, when, of his own free will, he addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons, requesting to be heard in his defence. The letter* was founded upon a rumour which the noble lord had heard, that a motion, in the event of which he was deeply interested, was to be made in the House of Commons, by a member of that body. His act in going to the House of Commons to defend himself was voluntary, and it was our duty to pay strict attention to what he said when he came there.

My lords, there is another subject upon which, before I proceed to combat the argument of the learned counsel, I may be allowed to dwell, because it is not only of moment to myself, but to all society, that it should be a little discussed;—I mean the attack the learned counsel has thought proper to make upon me, because I omitted nothing which I thought could be favourable to lord Melville. Was it handsome, on his part, when I did, as in justice I was bound to do, speak of those acts of lord Melville, which I thought praise-worthy—was it handsome in the learned counsel to throw those expressions in my teeth, and to say, “you yourself have said so and so, of lord Melville, how then can he be guilty?” I repent not a word of that part of my opening speech;—the learned counsel has it written down, and repeated it yesterday:—I retract not a word of it. I am happy in being able to say any thing to the advantage of a man under accusation; but it weighs not in this cause one feather; these are only the little incidents by which generous minds endeavour to soften the asperities of life; but the learned counsel, whenever they draw indictments, or make accusations, wish that it should be all in fire, vengeance, murder, and blood. We confine ourselves to the charge we make, we urge nothing out of it; and if the noble lord has any merit, upon any other account, we wish him to take it.

It has also been put to your lordships, as a question by the learned counsel, and in a manner meant to create strong impression—“Can your lordships for a moment conceive, when lord Melville had such opportunities of taking largely of the public money, that he would condescend to pick up shillings?—that he would take from the public purse in such a paltry way?—that he would commit his honour for such trifles?”—I can only answer, we prove it. What a man would or would not do, in particular situations, is not the speculation we are now upon; but we are upon the proof of that which we assert. And when it is asked, could he risk his high situation for a thousand, two thousand, or ten thousand pounds? I would only remind your lordships, that it has been also asked, and from divine authority, “What can a man take in exchange for his own soul?” and yet do not men every day risk their immortal souls for things even beneath that which the noble lord has taken?

The learned counsel has then made a very improper use of that most luminous, satisfactory, and conclusive summing up of the evidence on the part of the Commons. Unable to answer the statement, he was obliged to pervert and misrepresent it. He says, the learned manager who summed up has put the issue of the prosecution upon two or three particular points. My lords, that learned manager, in a manner which we should have thought almost impossible, if we had not seen that he had effected it, stripped all the facts of their detail and figures, and put them before your lordships in a shape in which you must lay hold of them; in a way in which they could not possibly escape you;—and he chose the most prominent points of the proceeding, in order that he might relieve your lordships from that dull history into which I shall again be obliged to go.

But does the learned counsel think, that if any of the various details, which are necessary to form the links of the chain with which we bind lord Melville, should, in the summing up, have been omitted by the learned manager, that the Commons abandon that which an individual manager has, even with his capacious memory, forgot to state?—does he think we are bound by his omissions?—has he made any omissions? My lords, the learned manager who summed up the evidence stood in a situation of greater difficulty, as indeed he was well calculated to do, than that in which I am now placed. He told you, the evidence he was to sum up was proof so far only as it should be uncontradicted. I am now in a position, in which I can say, that not one single tittle of evidence has been contradicted by the defenders of lord Melville, and that their argument has not succeeded in invalidating the observations made upon that evidence.

* See it p. 560.

The leading counsel has proceeded in another way, in which, from his profession, he is admirably calculated to succeed—he quarrels with our articles as not being drawn with a sufficient degree of precision. The Commons assert that they have a right to draw their articles in a manner more general than that in which indictments are allowed to be drawn in inferior courts; and not only that they have a right to do so, but that it is their duty to do so; and that from the earliest precedents of impeachment, down to the present time, it has always been the practice established and conceded to them, and from which, if they departed, they would be blameable.

Mr. Adam yesterday irregularly quoted, as his learned brother had done the day before, the speeches of members of parliament. Mr. Burke was one of the members quoted by Mr. Adam. Mr. Burke was a fellow manager of Mr. Adam in an impeachment at this bar. After that impeachment was over, Mr. Burke drew up one of the most able and learned reports ever placed upon the Journals of the House of Commons. In that report, Mr. Cowper,* who has been justly cited as a great authority by Mr. Adam, is cited also as an authority:—"The counsel (says Mr. Cowper), cannot but know that the usages of parliament are part of the laws of the land, though in many instances they differ from common law, as practised in the inferior courts in point of form. My lords, if the Commons in preparing articles of impeachment should govern themselves by precedents of indictment, in my humble opinion, they would depart from the ancient, nay, the constant usage of parliament. It is well known, that the form of an impeachment has very little resemblance to the form of an indictment, and I hope the Commons will endeavour to preserve the difference by adhering to their own precedents."† I might refer your lordships to further matter in the same report, but this is sufficient. The right of the Commons is undisputed, and I assert that our articles are drawn, according to the form of articles of impeachment in parliament.

My lords, I know it has been successfully contended from the place in which I stand, that your lordships are not bound, in impeachments in parliament, by the rules of evidence observed in inferior courts. The Commons have made that assertion, and it is their duty to make it, because upon certain occasions it might be necessary to act upon it. But I beg to call your lordships attention to one feature peculiar to this prosecution; that the Commons have not claimed any such right; but the proof brought upon every article, has been according to the strictest rules of evidence that could be maintained in any court. I ought to say something, perhaps, to the learned counsel, on the manner in which he has observed upon the evidence that we have offered. In the first part of the proceedings, he took a great variety of objections: happily, most of the points, by the wisdom of your lordships, were decided against him. He acted in a triple capacity; first of all, he had in charge the honour of the court; then he had in charge the character of the Commons; but lastly he took charge of that which was consigned to him, namely the defence of his client. I do not desire to bind the learned counsel by his assertions on evidence; but if I had made memoranda of all he said was not evidence, I believe I should have compiled a pretty good evidence book.

My lords, what the law was before the act of the 25th of the king passed, has been so satisfactorily established, by the learned manager who preceded me, that I shall not venture for a moment upon the same ground; but I presume, your lordships will allow me to suppose, after that argument on the part of the Commons, that a person after a salary granted, and after having so entered into a compact with the king (provided even no prior compact should have existed) was in point of fact bound to keep the condition of that compact, and that a violation of that condition exposed him to a criminal prosecution. Such I take to be the law as established by the attorney general, before your lordships this day.

Then let us consider whether the compact itself was not made more binding upon lord Melville, than it had been upon any other person. I have stated that he expressly demanded a nett salary, and would be contented with nothing less. He said to the public, You shall perform your part of the contract to the utmost farthing; then I say, on the part of the public, you shall perform your part of the contract to the utmost farthing also; and if I were to come to a calculation of figures, I could show how much, from the month of August 1782, the noble defendant has been paid, in virtue of a contract which he has not performed.

My lords, the resolution of the House of Commons of June 19, 1782, has been quoted by the learned counsel, and he has found great fault with the Commons, because, he says, the resolutions are not all stated in the preamble to their articles, and therefore are not fairly stated. There is a further resolution it seems, which would have formed a connexion with the one cited, and put the matter in another point of view. The learned counsel allows that the noble lord, in consequence of that resolution, and after the grant of salary, was bound in honour at least. Did he adhere to those obligations of honour?—they acknowledge that he abandoned them. But what was the other resolution of the House of Commons which was read by the counsel? The Commons having declared it inexpedient that certain practices should prevail any longer, further declares, that they have not time, in the present session of parliament, but that they will in the next make a law for the regulation of the Navy-pay-office.* Then the noble defendant, forgetting all his obligations of honour, which, by the addition of the last resolution become, if possible, still more binding, avails himself of the interval, in order to make profit of the public money.

* Afterwards Lord Chancellor Cowper.

† Commons Journals, 1794.

My lords, upon the resolutions, and the common law, the learned counsel says, Here I take up the gauntlet of the honourable manager; and he certainly is on every account more capable of arguing these points than I am. But this happens not to have been the place where I threw the gauntlet down;—the learned counsel has moved it a little forward, in order to take it up at a place he might have thought more convenient to himself. however, if his doctrine had not been learnedly refuted,—if all the managers had been indocti,—if no lawyer had been found among them, I think, as common law and common sense go together, it might have been possible for a member of parliament, not a lawyer, to have defeated him. It is granted that there were obligations of honour, and civil obligations, on the noble lord. We say he was criminally responsible for this use of the public money, and the abuse of his trust. His attention then having been so roused by these resolutions, he did that which one would hardly guess any man would do,—he really did apply paltry sums, at different times, to his own paltry purposes;—he did that which, the learned counsel says, it is impossible he should have done, but which we prove he did: He did, by driblets, take from the Navy treasury, for his own use, what he had no right to take.

My lords, the learned counsel, with a degree of pleasantry, which he said he took from me, but of which I was not conscious, for I am not gifted with such talents, has laughed at the manner in which we have obtained our evidence on this division of the charges.—We have gone to this place, and to that place, and given you the memoirs of money,—I think was his expression. My lords, this reminds me, that a certain Guinea did once write its history; its name was Chrysal—If that guinea should, by chance, have been one of those in the possession of Mr. Douglas, and have brought the history of its adventures down to the present period!—We are told that that guinea was once in the possession of a learned counsel, who, by his ability, and ingenuity, obtained a verdict contrary to evidence and the matter of fact;—that must surely have been Mr. Plumer himself. After that, I think the guinea found its way into the pocket of a great statesman, who is said perfectly to have known its value, but not to have had a greater affection for it than a guinea deserved; that statesman was lord Chatham, then Mr. Pitt: and Chrysal is represented to have been present at an interview which passed (and a very affecting one it was), between lord Chatham and general Wolfe, before the latter set out for his command in America. Now, if that guinea should have travelled from the Bank into a certain iron chest, after having been counted over by Mr. Swaffield; proud of his destination, Chrysal would have exclaimed, “Oh happy guinea! now thou art going to be the reward of some illustrious hero, or of some meritorious sailor, who has fought for his country; thou wilt, perhaps, be sent to some out-port, to contribute to the merriment of the tar—or be employed in the more engaging duty of clothing his wife or infant child—or administering to the comfort of his widow!—But what was my indignation when I was taken out of the chest, not to be applied to naval purposes, but to be used for a paltry private purpose of the treasurer; how great my consternation, when, happening to be present in the House of Commons, I heard that treasurer declare, that I, together with ten thousand others, had been employed to perform some important service for the public. When afterwards I travelled into Westminster hall, in the pocket of a bank director, on the first day of the defence in lord Melville’s trial, I was a little satisfied with the modesty of one of his counsel, who did not affect to say, that what lord Melville had before declared was true: But I was astonished, beyond all conception, when, on the third day of that defence, Mr. Adam reasserted that which lord Melville had asserted before.” Why, my lords, the memoirs of this guinea, and about three and twenty thousand others, are said to have been written in a certain manuscript, and to have been shown to the learned counsel, but he, like a wicked sprite, well known on the borders of Scotland, ycleped Gilpin Horner, has shut the book so fast, that we can no more open it, than the lady of Buccleugh could the book that was taken from the tomb of the dead man at the abbey of Melrose;—and, therefore, my lords, there we must leave it. But we have shown, by the clearest evidence, that those statements—which could have been made by Mr. Douglas, could he have been brought to life—that the statements which would have been found in the book, if received, are true; and we have traced out of the naval money, intrusted to lord Melville, various sums;—and we have shown where they did not go. We have distinctly proved * Vide Commons Journal, June 29, 1782.

* Vide Lay of the last Minstrel.

three interceptions; out of a sum of 45,000*l.*—out of another sum of 50,000*l.*—and out of another sum of 93,000*l.* viz. one sum of five thousand pounds, and two sums of three thousand pounds each. We have shown, that no part of this intercepted money went to the Navy-pay-office; we cannot show where ALL of it went, but we have shown where a part of it did go, we have shown that, on a certain day, a Bank note, which was taken at the Exchequer by Mr. Douglas for the payment of navy services, was carried, by Mr. Dundas himself, to Mr. Drummond's. Then the learned counsel turn upon us, and say, Well, now you have proved this,—what of it all? You have proved a paltry Bank note, as if you were examining into the accounts of an insolvent debtor, or as if you were trying a man for forgery. I thank the learned counsel for the illustration he has afforded me. I call upon your noble selves, I call upon those learned judges who are present for your assistance, to inform me whether there requires more strict proof in this case than there does in the case of forgery. The learned counsel has said that the life of lord Melville is nothing to him, compared with his reputation. Reputation ought to be far more dear than life to every honourable person; but, my lords, let us recollect, that to deprive a man of his life, is to inflict upon him the greatest punishment that man can inflict upon man; and notwithstanding lord Melville's reputation is now at stake, I ask your lordships whether your feelings would not be more acute even than they are now, if I were arraigning lord Melville for a capital offence?—assuredly they would; for in every stage and condition of man, from the highest to the lowest, the greatest penalty he can pay, is life; and that is the penalty paid for forging a Bank note. If then we have proved lord Melville guilty of having taken this money from the naval treasure (be it one shilling or a hundred thousand pounds) upon evidence which would induce you to send a criminal to execution, we have gone to the extent of moral possibility. Is there such a thing as equal justice in this country; are all men before all tribunals throughout this happy land, tried by equal laws? and shall you be obliged without mercy to condemn and execute a mean criminal, who has forged a one-pound note, and when I have proved that lord Melville has peculated to the amount of a thousand pounds, shall you not find him guilty of that peculation? Is it a paltry sum only which we have proved? It is the barb which fixes in him—it is that which holds him to his crimes—It is not that which we suppose to be the only crime, but the one which unites him to all the rest.

My lords, is it admitted as any vindication of a poor felon, a victim to the temptations which the noble defendant when in the Navy pay-office endeavoured to remove (to his credit I have before spoken it, and to his credit, I am not afraid to repeat it), to say that one fact only has been proved? Is not the answer ready?—he may have forged thousands. Is it not generally the case? The proof of one is sufficient to fix upon him the guilt;—for that guilt he dies. The proof of this one act fixes upon lord Melville his guilt; and if it stood alone, you must convict him.

VOL. XXIX.

The learned counsel, in cross-examining some of the witnesses produced before your lordships, have asked them, with regard to their memory of the facts on which particular instances were founded. Why, my lords, when a banker's account book is opened before a man at the distance of twenty-four years, can you expect from the nature of his business, which, in making entries of this sort, is little more than the operation of a mere machine, that any account can be given, more than that he did actually write the entry, and that he can swear he made no false entry? But they gravely ask, have you any recollection upon the subject? is the recollection of the learned gentleman always accurate? Is the recollection of persons in his profession always so accurate, as to entitle him to ask a banker's clerk, whether he recollects every entry in the book of his employer? Indeed it seems to me as absurd as it would be to ask a steam-engine how many gallons of water it has drawn in an hour, when the register upon it will give you all the information you can desire; and the machine and the man are equally likely to give any explanation beyond it. But to illustrate this point, and to show you that things which are the most obvious, which ought most to be known, are not always known by those whose duty it is to know them: It was not long since a learned judge, lately an ornament of the bench (I mean the late lord Alvanley) was trying a cause in this hall, and an act of parliament was in question: a learned sergeant, who may perhaps now hear me, was pleading before him, and he quoted a particular section of the act. Lord Alvanley said, the clause was not in the act. "Why, but my lord, here it is," said the sergeant "Never mind, I tell you, I know it is not there;" said the judge. "I beg your lordship's pardon, but here it is in the book; read it." The noble judge at length took the book, and having read it, exclaimed, "O true! Here it is, as sure as God is in Gloucester!"—There the section was in the act, as sure as God was in Gloucester. Can these learned persons be so extremely surprised then at the failure of recollection in a clerk as to a mere entry of a Bank note? There is another anecdote which I recall only to the recollection of many of your lordships; and I am sure it is well known to every one of the learned judges. Lord Mansfield, whose opinion has been quoted, was a cool and dispassionate person, one of the greatest eminence; he was one who, before he delivered an opinion, reasoned upon it no doubt to the utmost stretch of his ability; and delivered an honest opinion upon every point of law submitted to his consideration. It so happened, however, that a cause was tried before lord Mansfield, upon which he declared a very strong opinion. The person pleading before him said,—“It is extraordinary your lordship should hold this opinion, for I have a paper signed William Murray, which gives an opinion directly contrary to the one now held by your lordship on the very same subject.” Lord Mansfield denied it; he had never written such a thing; his sentiments on the law were quite the other way. But the paper had been written and signed by William Murray, when attorney general, and contained the exposition of the law stated by Mr. Fearn, the learned person pleading; and it has since been published. Lord Mansfield, however, having entirely forgotten the fact, was of a totally different opinion when presiding in the court of King’s Bench.—I only mention these circumstances as illustrative of what I feel with regard to a question which appears to me to be so unnecessary, but which the learned counsel have constantly asked; and to which no reasonable person can, I think, expect any other answer than that which has been as constantly returned. Then, my lords, as to the witnesses themselves: really, they were some of them examined as to their accounts, in a way which was very remarkable; the learned counsel expected a man to be able to travel backwards and forwards through his book, and at the moment to explain every particular; and he pointed hastily here and there, and said;—“Now tell us what that entry means.”—“Why, said the man, seven and six, seven and six mean seventy-six:” whereas, they meant no such thing. And when he came to look at it out of the box, coolly, the thing was perfectly plain, as we afterwards proved to the satisfaction of the Court.

Surely then, my lords, when we prove that lord Melville’s paymaster, Mr. Douglas, by his authority, got a thousand pound note at the Exchequer; that the note was not paid into the Navy-pay-office; that it went to lord Melville: that it was carried by lord Melville himself to his banker; that lord Melville took change out of it; that at the same time his banker’s account was in such a state, that he must necessarily, the moment it was paid in, derive profit and emolument from it. If, by such proof, this be not fixed upon lord Melville, no proof of guilt ever can be fixed upon any man in the world. I talk not now of the quantum; that is a totally different consideration.

Further, my lords I call upon the counsel to recollect that we have proved that another note, precisely under the same circumstances, and so identified, went (not paid in by lord Melville himself, but paid in by Mr. Douglas) from lord Melville to Messrs. Moffatt and Co., and there discharged a bill drawn payable to a Mr. Newbigging, which was bearing interest:—that is the second note we have traced.

Then have we done nothing? Oh! say the learned counsel, you have proved it, to be sure; but after all, the thing is impossible. My lords, there is a familiar anecdote which strikes me as illustrative of the alleged impossibility of a thing’s having happened after it has been proved:—a friend of mine, not a very good whist player, was once playing in a public room; and he happened, just at the crisis of the game, to have a very good hand; a person, who did not know how badly he played, looked over him, and betted that he would win: the rubber, however, was lost; the gentleman paid his money, and, turning with indignation to the player, said, “Why, sir, with that hand it was impossible for you to lose.” “Very true, sir;” said my friend, “but you see I have done it.” So to the repeated exclamation of the learned counsel, “Impossible!”—we can only say, “We have proved it.” Can they get out of the proof? No;—they may scamper about like the country and city mouse, when disturbed at their feast; but they must surrender at last. “This damned stucco has no chink.” To proceed.—What farther do we prove? There is one link, indeed, deficient in the next piece of evidence. Now, my lords, next to proving any thing most conclusively and distinctly, is, to show how any part of the proof fails, and that we do.

But here I must for a moment stop, to make an observation upon the manner in which the learned counsel have treated me, and the House of Commons in me. Say the learned counsel, “The honourable manager who opened the charges, told you precisely what you would find; and you do find it.—Well, then, will you not acquit lord Melville?” Surely, my lords, I did no more than my duty to the House of Commons, not to overstate their case. Have I brought my proof up to the case I stated?—Entirely. Then I showed, in the outset, more of that impartiality and moderation which is conducive to justice (or rather the Commons showed it in my person), and of that strength of which the learned counsel boast, but which they have not shown, than if I had gone into an extravagant detail, and told you I could prove lord Melville had made so many hundreds of thousands of pounds, or drawn any inference beyond that which the positive proof warrants. But I submit to these remarks also of the learned counsel with pleasure, because they are so many additional symptoms of the weakness of his cause. Cicero, my lords, in laying down his rules for the instruction of a pleader, directs a person, when answering his antagonist, always to omit the strong parts of his argument, and dwell only on the weak. The learned counsel has followed that advice;—nay, he has gone far beyond it; for a great deal of his examination, and much more of his speech, has been out of the case altogether.

I not only opened to your lordships that I should prove lord Melville had taken these two notes of one thousand pounds each, but also another fact which we have proved, viz. ; that on the 25th of May, 1785, a certain draft was drawn, payable to George Swaffield, by Mr. Andrew Douglas, who, my lords, I beg you to observe, was at that time in a state of health so infirm, that he did not usually fill up the drafts that were drawn in his name, and Mr. Swaffield filled them up for him; but this particular draft Mr. Douglas happened to fill up with his own hand; there is that peculiarity in the draft. Mr. Swaffield, a living witness, an old and faithful servant of the Navy-pay-office, now beyond his eightieth year; but with a memory and faculties unimpaired, and an enunciation perfectly intelligible, tells you, upon looking at his books, that this 2,000*l.* never came into his account. Beyond that, we carry the draft to the Bank, we show you, by a living witness, that it was paid in Bank-notes. We then show you that the numerical books of the Bank, for that period, were burnt for want of room; and that the only place in which these Bank-notes would have been recorded, is unhappily destroyed. But we show farther, that on the very same day, two Bank-notes of 1,000*l.* each, were carried to Messieurs Drummond's, on account of lord Melville, by Mr. Douglas. We have proved that it was of importance to the noble defendant to have money paid in upon his account at Drummond's (these private affairs I am sorry I am obliged to relate) and that by that payment he relieved himself from so much interest.

Then are there not two complete positive proofs of pecuniary advantage derived by lord Melville, from the payment of two Bank-notes? Is there not the strongest presumption, short only of the most conclusive proof, that the third payment was in the same predicament? and added to that, have you not the knowledge, from the accounts that are before you, that these payments could not have been made on account of salary, because his salary was all paid up to a fraction, and because you may refer to the navy bills, to which the noble lord might have resorted, to disprove these facts if he could? Navy bills are always drawn in the course of office for the payment of the treasurer's salary.

My lords, a misrepresentation has been made of the evidence given by Mr. Archibald Douglas. Mr. Adam has said, it has been proved to your lordships that Mr. Douglas was lord Melville's private agent. I refer your lordships to the evidence. No such thing is proved. That Mr. Douglas acted only as paymaster for lord Melville, is in proof before your lordships; and that he had no means of paying one single shilling to lord Melville, except for salary, or out of such improper deposits of money as might have been made by desire of the noble defendant. Then another misrepresentation which has pervaded the whole of the argument of Mr. Plumer, and in which he has been followed by

Mr. Adam, is this: they would have you believe that previous to the act, the treasurer had only to apply, and take as much money as he pleased; and that there was no intermediate step. I refer your lordships to the books in evidence before you, and to the history of the period, and you will see that in fact the treasurer could obtain no money of his own mere motion; that he was obliged to go to the Treasury and make application in writing, before any money could be had at all, and the Treasury decided on the propriety of the application. Then they repeat their assertion, that although lord Melville did place the money at Mr. Drummond's, he had a right to put it where he pleased. I must repeat, he had no right to make profit of it: Moreover, that the presumption against him was strong, that it was for corrupt purposes, whenever he put it at any other place than the Bank. First of all, the Bank was, even before this time, the usual place of deposit for all treasurers of the navy; it was the place of deposit for the public cash, when the noble defendant came into the office; it was his own place of deposit up to the time that Mr. Trotter took the paymastership of the navy: And it was never removed by the noble defendant himself, except for corrupt purposes, such as we have proved; or for purposes which he has not attempted to explain. Then we have shown this, that the money was always at the Bank, from the time Mr. Barré was in office; that it was in the Bank during the time lord Melville was in office up to the time of Mr. Trotter's appointment, excepting those sums which were intercepted, and a part of which we bring home to lord Melville's pocket. Is not, then, the presumption strong, that no money was out of the Bank except for illegal, corrupt, and improper purposes? My lords, we then proceeded to show, and we have proved by the balances that were deficient at the Bank, that certain sums of money were not there, which, according to the ordinary routine of office, would have been there, if they had not been in his own pocket, as we have proved respecting some of them, and as we presume of the rest.

I stated to your lordships, in the opening of these charges, that we would show you, most accurately, by the balances at the Bank, and the balances in the hands of the treasurer, that all our inferences, as far as they could be confirmed by official documents, were manifestly true. We have proved that they are so. We sent the noble lord, therefore, out of office, with differences, if the learned counsel pleases (we will not quarrel with him for the title, but really they are deficiencies, and one might say to him, as Philip did to the persons whom his soldiers would call traitors, "the Commons are apt to call things by their names") to no less an amount than 13,000*l.* We have shown that the differences were increased in the month in which he went out of office, to 23,000*l.* Now, my lords, we have certainly not been able to prove exactly how the debt was increased, but we have proved that it was increased, and we have shown you how it was diminished. We have shown you the diminution, and the means taken to effect it; and have thus established the fact, that the money was gone to private purposes, because it returned from private sources.

I told your lordships, that I thought there was a near road to this proof; and the learned counsel yesterday opened it: he manfully told you, that the 10,000*l.* was gone to Mure and Atkinson's; and that lord Melville had a right to put it there, if he pleased. I say, he had no such right: for, I would ask your lordships—

Mr. Adam.—I never said any such thing.

Mr. Whitbread.—I understood the learned counsel to admit it, and I beg to refer him to the foundation he gave me for this incorrect statement, if it be such. Its foundation was the cross-examination as to the house of Mure and Atkinson, with which he pressed Mr. Callander, to know whether it was a house of credit: and the observation I understood to fall from him yesterday was, that if the house of Mure and Atkinson was a house of credit, lord Melville had a right to put what money he pleased there. I am now under the correction of the learned counsel.

Mr. Adam.—I certainly never did admit that 10,000*l.* had been carried to Mure and Atkinson's. I did state an argument as to the money which had been paid from Mure and Atkinson's to Payne's, and from Payne's to the Bank; and that sum was, I think, 13,000*l.*, or some other sum of money; but I never did admit the fact of the 10,000*l.* having been paid to Mure and Atkinson.

Mr. Whitbread.—The learned counsel is more likely to be right than I am, and I suppose he has made a correct statement. Then we have proved, that after the deficiency had been increased to 23,000*l.* it was again reduced to 7,600*l.* by payment from private sources; we have proved the payment of 1,000*l.* by a person unknown, and of other sums from the hands of Mure and Atkinson, or persons deputed by them to make those payments, on account of the noble defendant.

My lords, it would have been an easy matter for the learned counsel, who examined Mr. Callander as to colonel Dundas's account with the house of Mure and Atkinson, to have shown that the books of Mure and Atkinson were in existence, and he might have produced them. Why did he not attempt to disprove any of the facts we have proved? Lord Melville might not have received any interest from the monies so lodged in this house, but he must have received an advantage from them: Is it not an advantage to be able to accommodate a house in large credit, and who might at a particular time be in want of money?—Does a person in a public situation, or who is likely to hold a public situation hereafter; who has just lost his power, and hopes soon to retrieve it; and who is using every means, proper or improper, lawful or unlawful, to effect his purpose, gain nothing, in point of influence, by lending sums without interest out of the public cash? But there is a difference, the learned counsel say, between treasurership and ex-treasurership, and although the salary might have made a compact binding upon the treasurer, it had made no such compact binding upon the ex-treasurer. Surely, my lords, it will not be allowed, that when a person has entered into a compact to execute the office of treasurer for a certain sum of money, and not to derive profit or advantage from the public money whilst treasurer; the moment he ceases to be treasurer he may derive such profit and advantage. But, it may be said, the care and custody of his ex-treasurership balance may require remuneration. Put it in the Bank;—there it is safe: that is the proper depository, and you will be free from care or trouble on account of it.

But then, say the learned counsel, the Bank are making use of the public money all the time; why do you not find the same fault with the Bank that you do with our client?—Are not the Bank a chartered company? do not they pay for their charter? Have they not the legal custody of the public money? and do they not legally use it? Is lord Melville a chartered person, to keep and to use the public money to his own private advantage? The distinction between the Bank and lord Melville is this; that the Bank may, and he may not.

But lord Melville has relieved us from these difficulties, if there be any such, because, in fact, he paid the debt due to his ex-treasurership when he became treasurer again, out of the money which then came into his hands; and I shall presently show the precise time at which he paid the greater part of the debt, amounting to 9,000*l.*, out of the 10,600*l.* with which he has been fixed, in January 1786; and I beg your lordships will observe the distinction I shall attempt to draw, and the proofs by which we have attempted to carry you to these facts. Going out of office on the 10th of April, 1783, debtor to the public in 13,000*l.* increasing his debt at the end of the same month, to 23,000*l.* reducing that debt by the sum of 15,400*l.* before the end of July, and remaining debtor at the end of July in the sum of 7,600*l.* he returned into office in January 1784, owing that sum. I must refer your lordships to one of the operations which took place after he was a second time treasurer of the navy; that of transfers, as we have called them, from the new treasurership to the old, or, more properly speaking, the drawing of drafts upon his new treasurership, and so discharging the debt which was due to the old;—that he did to the amount of 6,000*l.* He also took a draft in the name of Mr. Swaffield for 2,000*l.* which never came into Mr. Swaffield's account; not the one I lately mentioned to your lordships, but one into the proof of which we have not been able to go so far. In this situation the whole debt, except 1,600*l.* having been paid out of the new treasurership, we charge him, at the death of Mr. Douglas, with a debt of 10,600*l.*

My lords, there is another statement made by both the learned counsel, certainly not founded on the evidence before your lordships, which I beg leave to set right. In speaking of the ex-treasurership account, they say, he was always ready to pay in his ex-treasurership balance, but could not if he would. Your lordships will be pleased to observe, that the contrary is in evidence before you. Mr. Bernard Cobbe has proved to your lordships that money may be paid in by a public accountant upon account at any time; and a receipt upon account is always given. And, upon my calling upon Mr. Cobbe by another question, to prove the thing over again that it might not appear in doubt, I was properly stopped by the Court, and told that it was already in evidence. Under that observation so marked, that piece of evidence was recorded; and then the counsel come in the front of the court, and tell you it is proved to be directly otherwise;—surely, my lords, that is sufficient to characterise the whole of the defence.

My lords, the learned counsel finds some fault with the Commons for having exhibited a supplementary article. The truth really is, that the committee, appointed by the Commons to draw up the articles of impeachment, did feel themselves under considerable difficulty upon that head. We obtained Mr. Douglas's papers; and found in those papers what we thought matter of further criminal charge against lord Melville. We thought, indeed, we might have offered that matter in proof under the articles already exhibited: but we also thought it our duty to the House of Commons, which always involves our duty to the defendant, to propose a fresh article, and to state to the House the grounds upon which we founded that article. But I am not surprised that the learned counsel quarrelled with this article, because it has enabled us to go without controversy into proof of matters, the proof of which would otherwise have been contested step by step.—He would have thrown up his intrenchments at York to defend London:—He would have gone to the Land's-end to prevent our making a landing at all; because he knew if we once landed we must conquer.

Upon the subject of the 10,600*l.* there is a substantive article; the first. That article contains a simple statement, that lord Melville declared himself to be possessor of the sum of 10,600*l.*: that he made the declaration in the House of Commons on the 11th of June, 1805, and added that he would not reveal the application of the same, being impelled to concealment by certain motives; and those motives are stated in the express words of lord Melville, as proved by a witness at your lordships' bar.

My lords, the learned counsel have taken a course useful for their client, but not fair to the memory of the dead: the only one, however, by which they could hope to extricate themselves from the difficulty in which they were engaged. They have said, if the opportunity had not occurred of making a revelation of the destination of a certain sum of 40,000*l.* to the employment of which, as you all know, an uncorrupt minister, who is now departed, was consenting,—what would you have said if you had found lord Melville charged with 60,000*l.* of the public money (for he has avowed the diversion of 60,000*l.* altogether)? What would you, who had for so many years placed your confidence in Mr. Pitt,—you who had for so many years placed your confidence in lord Melville, who was the bosom friend of Mr. Pitt, his political associate, whose union was so strict (mark the emphatical words), that they had, as it were, but one mind;—what would you have said if lord Melville had been accused, and he had held his tongue on the subject of the 40,000*l.*? My lords, lord Melville might have said this, if he would have said no more: “I am a peer of parliament;—the application of that money I cannot reveal; but, on my honour, Mr. Pitt knew it.” And I think there are many persons in whose presence I now speak, who would have been satisfied with that declaration. I am not one of the number.—I might have thought the revelation at all events necessary; not that I think Mr. Pitt would have touched one farthing of the 40,000*l.*; but neither he, nor any other person, however eminent in his situation, however upright, however exulting in the confidence of his country, can be justified in attempting to strain that confidence so far. Was the declaration uttered as if he thought it would be unfavorable to his cause?—No, my lords, the expression of unfavorable is applied, for the first time, by his learned counsel; joy elevated his crest—his countenance appeared fraught with the magnanimity of his own resolution: but whom would he not tell?—not the public—not the Commons—not the cabinet—not the king—nay, not even his own mind—Mr. Pitt himself should not know it. If historical relation be true, the effect produced, was that of general consternation:—all were aghast! Some exclaimed, “It was the very infatuation of guilt.” My Lords, if the debates in parliament could be quoted with propriety, and I thought it worth while to trouble your lordships with the speeches of members, I could tell you of comments made upon that declaration in the House of Commons; and, as rumour goes, it was that declaration which decided their vote in the minds of many.

But, my lords, what have we proved beyond that?—We have proved the reason why he did not tell Mr. Pitt; why he did not tell his own mind, his other self;—it was, that there was nothing to tell:—there was no public service performed; no 10,000*l.* applied. We have traced the public sums in such a way—we have so followed them, as to show you it was impossible that lord Melville could have any secret to communicate.

My lords, I am about to enter on a painful part of my duty; not painful because I am afraid to meet the witness, of whom I am now to speak, in the face, but because it is always painful to speak of one's self. As to the rest, I never saw the man, in my mind's eye, with more satisfaction, than when he was called before this Court.

My lords, you have this declaration proved by a witness, who, when he came into your box, was a credible person. He spoke in the presence of, at least, four hundred others, who might have contradicted him, if what he said could have been contradicted; but not one has been called to disprove his testimony. Who is this witness? He is a manager, a person who has taken the principal lead in the prosecution. Who called him? He was first called to an examination upon other matters; as to the manner of obtaining Mr. Douglas's papers, as if there had been something clandestine and improper in that transaction; and having been so called, he again appeared voluntarily at your bar.

It was said by the learned counsel, that an intention had been announced of calling another witness to the same fact. My lords, it was the intention of the person who offered himself as a witness, to have added a confirming testimony:—that confirming testimony he intended to have derived from the most dignified representative of the people;—most dignified in his official character, and as dignified as any man can be in his private character,—I mean the Speaker of the House of Commons. But when his cross-examination had proceeded some way, he determined that he would not expose the dignity of the chair; for he could not imagine that the counsel had any thing in view but the justice of his cause; or that he would treat any witness that might be called, with more delicacy than the one then before the Court.—If indeed I could quarrel with any thing in the conduct of the learned counsel towards Mr. Whitbread, it would be the severity of his wit. I am sure he will excuse me if I cannot answer him in his own way. The world has been told, by a perfect master of eloquence, that to be an orator, a man ought to possess every qualification. He should be a philosopher, a poet, a statesman, a wit; and should be acquainted, not only with every science, but almost every trade,—When I had once read this passage, I closed the book, lest, by dwelling upon it, I should despair of ever being able to open my mouth in public. But the learned counsel is eminently gifted. What was his plan? From the arts of war we can illustrate what is done in the forum, and in courts of justice. Perhaps the learned counsel thought that nobody had taken so much pains in this prosecution as myself;—he considered me as acting a part which I really did not fill (true, I have sometimes worn the general's uniform,—but I am not the general); and so he did, what in war is not unfair,—despairing otherwise of the defeat of the army, he attempted to take off the general.—For this purpose he planted himself behind a pamphlet, and aimed a shot at me,—but his piece missed fire. The learned counsel may have recollected, that by a shot, purposely aimed at the immortal Nelson, he lost his life. The gallant Faulkner fell in the same way:—in that glorious profession—

—uno avulso, non deficit alter

Aureus—

A Collingwood succeeds a Nelson; a Northesk to a Collingwood; some illustrious hero succeeds to a Faulkner; and there will always be a succession of such chiefs, each to take the place of the other.

But, I dare say, as soon as the learned counsel sat down, after his notable attempt to destroy me, his learned brother, who knows me a great deal better than he does, pulled him by the sleeve, and said, “Now, do you know, you have been doing a very foolish thing. If you had taken him off, you would have done yourself a great deal of harm; you would have had an abler hand to deal with;” and such, would undoubtedly have been the case.

I have somewhere heard an anecdote of the duke of Marlborough:—In one of his campaigns, a young officer, more full of zeal than discretion, told him, with great eagerness, that he had been very near rendering a most important service to his excellency and the army, for he had very nearly succeeded in taking off the French commander. “If you had,” said the duke, “I would have hanged you,—you could not have done me a greater piece of disservice.” Such would have been the case of the learned counsel in respect of me;—and, I dare say, my friend Mr. Adam told him so: but, really, if they both laid their heads together for this performance, they are no wiser than the girls who killed the old woman's cock, that they might not rise so early in the morning. Here are bells near me, would have rung such a peal in their ears, as to waken them had they been dead.

My lords, if the learned counsel be armed at all points, so are the managers, collectively, too. Do they attack us with law? We have law also. You have heard two of our lawyers. If they attack us with wit, Anche Noi,—we have wits too; nay, we have belonging to us the very first wit in the very first line. He ought to be here, but he is not; or I would ask him to “Lend me one spark of his consuming fire, Thoughts that breathe warm, and flashes that inspire.”

Ah! the learned counsel would say, still you are no conductor; you cannot use it, you are a non-electric. True, my lords! then I must treat this matter in the dull manner which becomes me. I pardon Mr. Plumer: if there was a reputation to be sacrificed, and it lay between me and his noble client, he could not hesitate. I put myself forward: and if he could, by cross-examination, shake either my credit for veracity, or any little reputation I might possess for common sense; he, perhaps, hoped thereby, to do great good to lord Melville, and I freely forgive him.

But, my lords, cannot I proceed to examine Mr. Whitbread's testimony, in the same manner I would that of any other witness before the Court? And what does it amount to? first, a simple declaration.—Mr. Whitbread says, that lord Melville, on the 11th day of June, 1805, confessed in the House of Commons, that he had taken possession of a certain sum of public money, the application of which he would not reveal, being impelled to do so—I believe that was the awkward expression I used—but being impelled to concealment by motives of public duty, private honour, and personal convenience. An uncontested fact, proved to your lordships: and this fact we charge as a high crime and misdemeanor.

My lords, the witness was cross-examined as to many other parts of the speech, in which this declaration was contained. He was first of all asked, as if he had been a person of great memory (which I know he is not), to repeat the speech which had occupied more than two hours in delivering: and the learned counsel has sarcastically observed, that he verily believed I could have supplied any part of the accounts, if any had been deficient, from memory.—I suppose the next time the learned counsel meets with me in a court of justice, he will say, "Repeat your balances," by way of showing me off. Repeat the speech! No, my lords, I could not repeat the speech; but I told the counsel, if he referred to any part, or passage of the speech, I would tell him whether I recollected it or not. "Did you recollect any passage favorable to lord Melville?" I did not recollect any other particular passage, whether favorable or unfavorable, but I had a perfect remembrance of that which I had stated, and that it was uttered on the 11th day of June. Upon my accurate recollection of the date, the learned counsel was a little severe. It is a day, my lords, henceforth memorable in the annals of this country. But I wish to exculpate the witness from the suspicion of having a convenient memory; and to show your lordships that the 11th of June was a day likely to be strongly imprinted on his memory.

The Romans had a custom in their great families, the observance of which, in the families of this country, might produce admirable effects, of commemorating certain dies notandi—days made memorable by the performance of great exploits by their ancestors; and on those days the achievements of their forefathers were held up to the admiration of the children, in order to form them to the execution of those great duties which they would afterwards have to fulfil. Now the 11th of June happens to be a dies notandus in the family of the witness. On that day, in the year 1748, his father (with a fortune of about the same amount which Mr. Trotter had when he began the world, viz. 2,000*l.*) set up as a brewer in the city of London. On the 11th of June, in every year, he balanced his accounts, and, by God's blessing, he always found them on the right side; and he early called the attention of his son to that fact; and showed him how, by the quiet progress of uncorrupted industry, a fortune would gradually accumulate. On the 11th of June, 1796, he died: I received his parting blessing, and closed his eyes; and they say, my lords, that when a good man, as he was, dies, the angels in heaven rejoice.—That day then was again strongly imprinted on my recollection. On the 11th of June, 1805, as I was going forth to the House of Commons, to move the vote of impeachment against lord Melville, I happened to see the children with which God has blessed me, and I remarked to them the circumstances that had occurred on that day in our family; and from the day itself, I drew, what in former times would have been called a happy augury; that is, I felt that such events having marked the day on which I undertook this great national work, I ought to exert my utmost ability not to discredit it; and I hope, my lords, the day was not discredited. Such are the reasons for my remembering the 11th of June.—The 8th of April, also, I could not forget, because the 8th of April resounded through the kingdom; and, moreover, I found, in my researches to prepare myself for this business, that on the 8th of April, near two hundred years ago, the earl of Middlesex was impeached for the same sort of offence as that for which the noble lord now appears at your bar. But as to the rest of the days, on which the other important motions were made in the House of Commons, I have tried, but I cannot recollect them.

My lords, the impression made upon the mind of the witness was that which he has stated. As to the substance of the other parts of the speech, he told it as he believed it to be; and when particular expressions, and denials, and averments, on the part of lord Melville, were stated to him, he said, "he believed lord Melville said so." But, my lords, we have disproved those averments of lord Melville. He said he did not know that Mr. Trotter did certain things; and we have proved by Mr. Trotter that he did know it. Upon a review of the whole of this evidence in chief, and the cross-examination, I believe it will amount to this: that lord Melville did make a certain positive declaration in the House of Commons of a certain fact; that the substance of his speech was to exculpate himself by equivocal expressions; but that he did not positively and directly deny those things, which the learned counsel would fain have made the witness say he did deny.

The learned counsel, in speaking of the witness, got half a word out of his mouth, which he exchanged for another; he would have said he endeavoured to extort, but he changed it, for he endeavoured to draw from him.—My lords, the witness is of a character not to have things extorted from him if not true, and not to require them to be extorted if true. Having said thus much, to which I have been led by the course of the learned counsel, I can assure him I shall not follow his example, and perpetually recur to Mr. Whitbread. Whatever it may have been in him; in me it will neither be necessary nor decorous. Don't let him be angry with me, —Ne sævi, magne Sacerdos.

This trial once over,

Discedam; explebo Numerum.—Non reddar tenebris.

So long, not only as the rafters of this hall remain, so long not only as this court shall sit, representing the high criminal judicature of these kingdoms, but even so long as that beam of light which now pierces upon you shall shine; which, as it is an emanation from the first and greatest of created things, so it may truly be considered to represent the eye of God as extended over this assembly; so long as the history of any country and its transactions shall be read in a civilized world, so long shall it be recorded, that the impeachment of lord Melville was voted by the House of Commons, and tried before this court, and so long shall I be carried down to posterity; not in consequence of any exertion, or merits of my own, but because I am joined in this great cause by the men who surround me; because the bright effulgence of their glory will shed some small degree of lustre on a name, even obscure as my own.

My lords, I believe I have gone through the whole of the first and tenth articles: and I am extremely anxious to leave nothing unsaid upon each, in this crisis of the cause. I am bent on speed: and I am sorry to ask your lordships for any indulgence of time. I want it not from failure of bodily strength, nor do I want it for additional preparation; for, as far as I can be prepared, I am, to reply to the whole of the defence; but the extent to which I have already gone, the time which it has occupied—the time which I must still further occupy, and this appearing to be the natural break, I trust your lordships will not think (having to answer a speech of twelve hours in length), that I am unreasonable in requesting you to afford me till to-morrow to proceed.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

FIFTEENTH DAY.

Saturday, May 17, 1806.

The lords and others came from the Chamber of parliament, into Westminster Hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—Gentlemen, managers for the Commons, you may now proceed in your reply, and the lords will be pleased to give their attention.

Mr. Whitbread.—My lords, in the course of the reply which I had yesterday the honour of addressing to your lordships, I had brought it down to the fixing upon lord Melville, as the Commons contend by evidence irresistible, the possession of a certain sum of 10,600*l.* My lords, I had endeavoured to recollect, and to detail to your lordships, every circumstance of proof which had been adduced to stamp corruption upon the noble defendant. But, in the very minute particularity which was necessary, I find that I have omitted one fact, which I am sure your lordships will now give me leave to supply. I had stated the two notes of 1,000*l.* each;—I had stated the 2,000*l.* draft drawn to Mr. Swaffield; but I had omitted to state that lord Melville had determined the debt, due from some one to the public, to be his own private debt, by a payment out of his own private pocket.

I now call your lordships' attention to that part of the evidence in which Mr. Davies has proved, that he paid into the public account at the Bank the sum of 1,000*l.* being a quarter's salary, and consequently private money, due to the right honourable Henry Dundas in October, 1785. My lords, that furnishes an additional proof, which the Commons have established against him; and which the learned counsel in the course of their defence have not attempted to controvert.

In order to relieve your lordships as much as I can from a recapitulation of all the evidence which it has been necessary to adduce; I beg now to call your attention to the fifth article of impeachment against lord Melville, not having altogether disposed of the first, because it will be necessary in a short time to mention the latter part of the charge in that article; namely, that lord Melville continued in possession of that money after the act had passed; and made an acknowledgment of its being in his possession to a witness who has appeared before your lordships. The fifth article charges a second sum of 10,000*l.* precisely under the same circumstances as the first. That charge is also proved by one witness of credibility, who offered himself to the Court; and upon whom I will not again for one moment dwell.

Now, my lords, the learned counsel for the defendant have contended, that these two sums of 10,000*l.* each (or thereabouts) might have been (one of them asserted that they both were) used for the public service; and they have, in the manner which I had the honour to state to your lordships yesterday, contended that those two sums were to be put upon the footing of another sum of 40,000*l.* which was avowed by a minister, now no more, and to the employment of which lord Melville was originally moving. If such be the case, that this sum of 40,000*l.* is to give the character of the other two sums of 10,000*l.* each, the illegality of their application is incontestable; because your lordships will see, by referring to the statutes of last year, that the legislature has declared the application of the sum of 40,000*l.* to have been illegal, and that, in consequence of the explanations given it, voted an act of indemnity to the persons who were concerned in the transaction. Now, if this 40,000*l.* was illegally applied, and the two 10,000*l.* stand upon the same footing, they are illegal too. It is only an explanation which could induce your lordships, and the other branches of the legislature, to say that the penalties attached to that illegal conduct should not be inflicted upon the noble lord. He has foregone the time of explanation. We say explanation was impossible; that, according to an homely, but most appropriate phrase used by the learned counsel, it was all a sham; and that there was no application of money for public purposes at all.

My lords, I purposely postpone the confession made to Mr. Trotter, until I shall have an opportunity of saying something in answer to the learned counsel upon the subject of that witness. But there is another matter, upon which, as a member of the House of Commons, it becomes my duty to detain your lordships. After having disposed of that argument of the learned counsel (what weight it may carry with your lordships it is not for me to determine), by which he would show that if you chastise lord Melville by a conviction on this charge, you expose the nation to great risk; because, forsooth, public accountants hereafter will be afraid of serving their country in the way in which lord Melville has served it. As if the receivers of the land-tax, and other persons who carry money to the Bank upon the public account, would be fearful in future of saying, We have disposed of such and such sums, for this, that, or the other public service;—and they have quite as much right to do so as the treasurer of the navy. But, I believe, if the receivers general of the land-tax were to act with the magnanimity and spirit of lord Melville, and tell us they had disposed of the public money in a way which motives of public duty, private honour, and personal convenience, would not suffer them to reveal, they would soon, under an extent from the crown, recover from their reveries in the county gaol. It has been stated by my learned friend, as an aggravation of the offence, that the noble defendant uttered the expressions, attributed to him, “in the sanctuary of liberty”—My lords, the expression was most appropriate; for the Commons contend that their Chamber of Parliament is the sanctuary of liberty. They know that that Chamber has been the refuge of liberty in the worst, and her chosen abode in the best of times: and it is not without being offended, that the Commons have heard that expression repeated by the learned counsel with sneer and derision. Such language was emphatically, and dutifully used by the learned manager who summed up the evidence. We know, perfectly well, that the repetition, in certain tones, of the most splendid passages of the purest authors; that the naming in a certain manner, the emblems of majesty, which attach to the king,—the decorations of honour which distinguish your lordships,—may bring them, for a moment, into disrepute among the vulgar; and that, if the learned counsel were to say, in the same sort of sneering tone, the sceptre and the crown, the scarlet of the judges, the ermine of the peers, the stars and garters of the knights, and so forth, he might for a moment bring them all into contempt with unthinking minds.—But, my lords, scarlet clothes the judges, to denote the respect to which they are entitled in the land;—the ermine denotes the purity of noble hearts;—the crown and the sceptre are the insignia of that royal authority, which, together with your lordships and the Commons, form the support of the liberties of this country.—You know that stars are given as the reward of valour, of distinguished personal service, or as the honourable badge of noble families of high estimation and illustrious ancestry;—and, when the sanctuary of liberty is mentioned, we the Commons contend, that so mentioned, she has a right to all the respect which can possibly be paid to any great council assembled at any time. We contend, that in the Chamber of the Commons House of Parliament, liberty tends her holy flame; and we the Commons feel that, while such men as he who so properly used that expression shall be found in that house, her flame will not expire. My lords, if it be possible by a deriding tone, to bring so sacred an expression into disrepute, it is equally possible by tones of voice, by a feeling and lofty manner, to add to its intrinsic dignity. Your lordships must recollect the manner in which that expression was uttered.—I could not help immediately reflecting upon the song of the immortal Cowper (more than one Cowper have claims to immortality), and applying his words upon a subject on which he fondly thought the legislature had finally decided:

VOL. XXIX.

So sweet was his melody clear,
That whilst he of liberty spake,
’Twas liberty only to hear.

My lords, it is by calling to your recollection those tones, by vindicating the expressions used by the learned manager, I am induced to hope, that I put away the reproach cast on the Commons by the learned counsel.

My lords, the learned counsel has thought proper to comment much at large upon the opening description which I had the honour to address to your lordships, of a witness to whom it is now my duty again to call the attention of the Court; I mean Mr. Alexander Trotter. He has said, you have described your witness in most favourable terms (such indeed as became me, because they were the terms which I thought he deserved), and you foretold us precisely every word that Mr. Trotter has said. You told us that Mr. Trotter was a man whom the Court might implicitly believe: you told us he was dignified by every feeling that could mark a gentleman, and with the characteristics of a man of sense; and you added, said the learned counsel (which I did not add), that Mr. Trotter was the only human being who could reveal these transactions to the Court. My lords, I said I had heard him so described; I did not so describe him myself—I mean as to the latter part of the description—"that he was the only human being who could reveal these transactions." My lords, Mr. Trotter, before I saw him, had been represented to me as a man, whose memory was so much impaired by disease, as to render him incapable of giving a distinct account of any transaction of remote date. The reasons which might have induced such representations of him, it is not now for me to canvas; perhaps they might be to show the folly of opening a mouth which, when opened, could not afford any intelligence. But, my lords, upon the examination of Mr. Trotter before the committee, he appeared to be a person quite collected, and capable of giving your lordships the history of his transactions. He detailed them to us in a manner consistent with the appearance he has made here. I do not now mean to call upon you to discredit Mr. Trotter as a witness; but, at the same time, I would have the learned counsel observe, that we understand sufficiently of human nature to know, that not only the words, but the demeanor of the witness,—not only the words and demeanor of the witness, but the words and demeanor of the persons who examine him also, are to be taken into consideration; and when that is done, it is for your lordships to form your opinion upon the result of the testimony which is afforded by all the circumstances and the words put together.

My lords, Mr. Trotter has been represented as a person cruelly persecuted by the committee of managers, in their repeated and harassing examinations and cross-examinations. To Mr. Trotter himself, I would appeal for the truth: and, if the managers for the Commons did in one instance move that the displeasure of the House should be shown against Mr. Trotter, it was when they were compelled by necessity so to do. The effect was produced; Mr. Trotter opened his mouth; and he spoke what I believe to be the truth. My lords, the Commons are vested, as well in the examination of witnesses, as in every other part of the management of a proceeding like the present, with large and formidable powers. It is the uncontested right of the Commons, pending trial, to examine such witnesses as may or may not have appeared before the Court. But discretion is to be applied to the exercise of that right. A rumour has gone abroad, of which the defenders of the noble lord may wish to avail themselves, that the Commons, in the exercise of their right, have not acted humanely or discreetly towards Mr. Trotter; and it may have been circulated that, after Mr. Trotter had made the long and painful appearance he did before this Court, the committee had summoned him, and subjected him to a further examination of several hours. The fact is this: the committee did summon Mr. Trotter after his examination here, and Mr. Trotter did attend them, but only for two minutes; he was ill, and scarcely a word was said; no examination of any sort took place.

My lords, I have said, that, from the demeanor of witnesses before a court of justice, much may be inferred. In a remarkable case, which, lately occurred in the Court where a noble and learned lord * now so happily presides, a symptom of horror discovered upon a witness giving testimony, was immediately remarked by one of the ablest and most acute men at the bar, who was counsel in the prosecution; I mean Mr. Garrow, upon the exhibition of a certain paper to Louisa Calderon:† the shrug of horror which she gave at seeing a representation of the instrument of torture with which she had been punished, made it evident to the feelings of every spectator, that the story she told could not be false. You have observed Mr. Trotter, and from that observation I request you to say, whether, with all the disposition to speak the truth which I ascribe to him, it is not evident that there is still a leaning in his mind towards lord Melville, such as from the frailty of human nature he cannot control; a disposition to take upon himself (as the learned counsel has said) all the load of guilt which we charge upon the noble defendant; and in which he was an accomplice. My lords, the learned counsel illustrated Mr. Trotter's conduct by the quotation of a beautiful passage from Virgil: and he told you, that Mr. Trotter stepped forth as Nisus did, to the rescue of his friend Euryalus, exclaiming—

Adsum!

"Adsum qui feci! in me convertite ferrum—"

"Nihil iste nec ausus"

"Nec potuit."——

* Lord Ellenborough.

† This refers to what has been reported to have taken place on the trial of general Picton in the Court of King's Bench. See the proceedings against that officer in the next Volume.

My lords, I thank him for the application, and would beg him again to refer to the passage. If my memory is not incorrect, he will see, that, taking the whole of the story of Nisus and Euryalus, and attending to all that Nisus said, when he found his friend in the hands of the Rutulians, it is much more applicable to the case of the noble defendant than he has represented it. What is the story? Two soldiers of the army of Æneas had undertaken to perform a secret service in the night: they went into the camp of the Rutulians, slew a great number of the enemy who were asleep, and plundered their camp. On their return, after having satiated themselves with slaughter, they missed their way: one was taken by a patrol of the Rutulians: the other soon after came up unperceived, and saw the danger of his friend, whom the enemy were about to put to death; at this crisis he rushed forth, exclaiming,

Adsum qui feci!—

But then the learned counsel left out three remarkable words:

“Mea fraus omnis;”

Mine was all the fraud!—Notwithstanding they had both been engaged in this scene of death,

“Mea fraus omnis!”

I will take it all upon myself! And why did he take it all upon himself? Because human nature operated strongly upon him, as it has done upon Mr. Trotter;

“Tantum infelicem nimium dilexit amicum!”

And so it is here; the debt of gratitude is so great, which Mr. Trotter falsely thinks he owes to lord Melville, that the infirmity of his nature has got the better of his judgment; and he tried to exonerate lord Melville altogether. But the learned counsel,—after extolling Mr. Trotter, and adopting all the language which, I do not deny, I made use of to his advantage;—tells you that he is criminal, perfidious, treacherous; that he has not only neglected his duty, but, by his misconduct, has thrown his patron into the abyss in which they see him plunged. My lords, there are sentences even of just condemnation, which come from the mouths of particular persons, with tenfold severity. I have said, that the conduct of Mr. Trotter in every part of his life was untainted, as far as I was acquainted with it, except in the Navy-pay-office. What tainted his conduct there, was, in my opinion, this: that the moment he entered into the office he found out, or his principal revealed to him, that he was a debtor to the public 10,600*l.*; if Mr. Trotter had not found his principal in that situation, he might have passed even through the Navy-pay-office with a character unstained; but after having been so misled by the noble lord, does it come well from his learned counsel to charge this man with perfidy and treachery? Perhaps some of your lordships may have read a most affecting tale, told by an ingenious writer, called “Art and Nature;” in which an unfortunate woman, who had in early life been led astray, brought, by the commission of one offence, to another and another, comes at last to be tried before the very man by whom she was at first seduced, and by him, upon her conviction, sentence is pronounced against her: she is then made to exclaim, in all the emotions of agony and horror, “Oh! not from you!” My lords, Mr. Trotter may well look in the face of that noble lord, when his defenders are accusing him of perfidy and treachery, and also exclaim, “Oh! not from you!”

My lords, under what circumstances was the revelation made to that servant of the misconduct of his master? When Mr. Trotter, on the 10th of January 1786, took upon him the paymastership of the Navy, by the appointment of lord Melville, he discovered that the balances were deficient; or lord Melville told him so; it is not perfectly clear which, neither is it material. Mr. Trotter says (and I beg your lordship's attention particularly to this part of his evidence), “there was no occasion for him to tell me so, for I knew it.” Now, my lords, Mr. Trotter has generally spoken altogether to words—to what lord Melville said. Has he spoken to signs? To what he understood from lord Melville? He has indeed spoken to different modes of communication, by which he comprehended lord Melville's meaning, and I beg your lordships to reflect, that in the sort of intercourse that passed between these men for so many years, it was absolutely impossible that there should not have been a private understanding of signs; and it is manifest there was so.—In proving this confession or acknowledgment to Mr. Trotter, we have proved the remaining part of the tenth Article. I will briefly recapitulate the proof upon these articles to your lordships. We have proved the 1,000*l.* note at Messrs. Drummonds. We have proved the 1,000*l.* paid to Mr. Newbigging; we have proved the payment of the quarter's salary: we have proved, with the omission of one link of evidence only, the 2,000*l.* drawn to Mr. Swaffield, and paid to Messrs. Drummonds: we have proved illegal drafts drawn upon one treasurership, to pay the debts of the other: we have fixed lord Melville with the sum of 10,600*l.* unaccounted for; and we have proved it by his own acknowledgment. We have also proved the fifth Article, which contains the avowal of the possession of another sum of 10,000*l.*

My lords, the learned counsel, in speaking of the cross-examination of Mr. Trotter, made use of a very happy expression, and to which I beg to call the attention of your lordships:—he called it the popular cross-examination of Mr. Trotter. My lords, no expression ever uttered by any advocate, in any court of justice, could be more applicable than that to his own performance on that day. It was indeed a popular cross-examination; calculated to mislead the public, but not calculated to shake the examination in chief, or to take off the due effect of the re-examination of the following day. In the course of that popular cross-examination, it was unsuccessfully attempted by the learned counsel, to extort from Mr. Trotter, more conversation than had actually taken place between him and lord Melville. "Are you sure" (I think were the words) "that lord Melville did not tell you that this money was applied to public purposes?" Mr. Trotter answers, "I do not recollect that he told me any such thing; he might have done it; but at this distance of time, I have not the least recollection of it." I hope your lordships will excuse me, if I detain you some little time in referring to particular passages of this examination, and cross-examination, because the learned counsel in the popular speech that he made, in consequence of that popular cross-examination, took particular care to avoid almost all allusion to the evidence, and I do not think he read above one or two extracts from the whole of it; although he made a sort of index to the carelessness of lord Melville, and referred to several different pages upon that head. I refer your lordships to the printed evidence for the question and answer to which I before adverted:—"The first circumstance you were interrogated to, after that of your being appointed paymaster, was, his lordship's acknowledgment of a balance in his hands of 10,000*l.*—At the time lord Melville said that was in his hands, did he not at the same time say it was not applied to any private use or emolument of his own, but to public purposes, from whence it was likely there would be a loss?"—"His lordship expressed to me, he was afraid that there might be a loss; the conversation might be very pointed; but I do not recollect it so much as to be able to say that his lordship actually stated it to be for public purposes, but it is at a very distant period, and it is not impossible he did."*—But the witness does not undertake to swear that he did, nor has he any recollection upon the subject.

Now, my lords, this 10,600*l.* forms, as your lordships will be pleased to recollect, the first item of a certain account, denominated the Chest Account: and which Chest account, upon a question put by the court, Mr. Trotter says, may have acquired its title by lord Melville's direction. I particularly beg your lordships to attend to that fact; and desire you will do me the honour to carry it in your minds.

This Chest Account contained, then, the 10,600*l.* it contained also the sum of 40,000*l.*; which was money illegally taken; and it was said this Chest Account consisted altogether of memoranda of money of the same sort. Before I conclude, I shall show your lordships that we have proved not only that those sums were illegally taken, but that they were corruptly taken. In the mean time, however, an act of parliament had passed, containing new regulations for the conduct of the Navy-pay office. That act has been so ably argued, and its true construction so incontrovertibly shown, by the attorney general yesterday, that I should not, for a moment, think of detaining your lordships upon it, were it not merely to observe that the learned counsel, Mr. Adam, founded his hypothesis upon the omission of the principal parts of it: he took two or three separate independent clauses, and left all the rest totally unargued upon, and unexplained. He began with a maxim, a good one, as well in morals, as in the construction of acts of parliament; he told you, as to a particular clause, noscitur à sociis. Then why did the learned gentleman immediately take all its companions away from the clause he was upon, and leave us in ignorance of its associates? The learned counsel jumped from one clause to the other, in a most extraordinary manner, leaving altogether out of his consideration, the sixth clause, which orders that the balances shall immediately vest in the successor of the existing treasurer: not that they shall be transferred; but vest. What is the presumption to be inferred from hence? Why, that the Bank alone is allowed to be the banker of the treasurer of the navy.

My lords, I will not say much more upon the act, except this, to take off the effect of a false representation which the learned counsel has made of another part of the case, namely, with regard to the money that is sent to the out-ports; for which the treasurer has been described not to be responsible. My lords, it is no such thing. The treasurer is as responsible for every clerk at the out-ports, as for the clerks in Somerset-place. I will appeal to the little knowledge the noble defendant himself may have acquired of his office since he came out of it, whether that is not the case? I would appeal to other ex-treasurers of the navy, who now hear me, whether it has not been matter of great anxiety to them, to keep down the balances of those out-port clerks, and to send persons down to watch them, and examine the contents of their coffer? Undoubtedly, the balances in the hands of clerks at the out-ports, as well as the balances in the Bank, vest in the hands of the successor; and if the stated balances should not be found at any time to correspond with the balances actually in their hands, the treasurer going out of office, would have to account for the deficiency. Then as to the common sense of the act; if it were really legal for the defendant to authorize Mr. Trotter to do that which he did! supposing a man in trade were to be treasurer of the navy;—What! might he take any part of the navy money immediately from the Bank to his own house, to carry on his own concerns? Is that contended for? And if he could not do that, how could it be taken to Mr. Coutts's? How could it be taken any where, under any pretence, false or true? and if it were not possible to conduct the Navy-pay-office, without the intermediate agency of such a house as Mr. Coutts's, why was not a law brought in to make such transfer of the cash legal?

My lords, the companions to that clause of the act, which was particularly insisted upon by Mr. Adam, were immediately taken away: but the learned counsel forgot the companions to the act itself. He forgot the Army-pay office act, upon which the Navy-pay office act was founded. For if the treasurer of the navy, under chapter 31 of the 25th of the king, can take the public money and place it where he pleases, the pay-master of the army can do the same; for the acts correspond precisely as far as the Navy-pay office act goes. I beg your lordships to compare the two together, and see whether they do not in fact, exactly tally in all the material enactments.

How has every pay-master construed the act for the regulation of the Army-pay office? Not one of the paymasters of the army has ever thought of withdrawing one shilling from the Bank to an account at a private banker's. The same in the Navy-pay office, with the exception of the noble defendant, who it seems, is to be protected by his negligence and carelessness from all punishment.—It has been said, in his defence, that Mr. Ryder, now lord Harrowby, trusted Mr. Trotter; that Mr. Bathurst trusted Mr. Trotter. No, my lords, they did not trust Mr. Trotter, they trusted lord Melville; and they thought they could safely confide in a man whom he had so long employed.

Let us recollect the history of the times, and as the learned counsel have brought me to the historical facts contained in the tenth report, I will beg your lordships to refer to that report also; you will there see, that as soon as Mr. Ryder discovered that the money was not lodged in the Bank, he said, "I am just come from the office of paymaster of the forces; there I know things were conducted with perfect ease and propriety, according to the provisions of law; why cannot the same be done in the Navy-pay-office?" Mr. Trotter, for reasons which are now perfectly undisguised, told him it could not be. Mr. Ryder, however, was not satisfied with this, and he commenced an inquiry with a view to alterations, which ill health alone prevented his carrying into effect.—He was succeeded by Mr. Bathurst, and he has told your lordships what was his conduct:—he ordered all the money to be placed at the Bank.

Presuming, my lords, not so much upon the arguments I have brought before your lordships, as upon the acknowledged information and tried ability of the learned manager who argued before your lordships yesterday, who would not risk his former reputation, or the dignity of the place he holds, in maintaining any proposition which he felt to be false; and he having established the truth of his proposition independent of authority;—presuming, I say, that the act is what he construed it, I proceed to inquire before your lordships, what has been the conduct of lord Melville, subsequent to the act,—what our farther articles have charged,—and what proof we have brought of the charges contained in those articles.

Still, my lords, it is necessary to clear away some more of those popular topics upon which the learned counsel so long and so ably dwelt; and to endeavour to remove, if the removal be necessary, from the minds of your lordships, those circumstances which might induce you to suppose that lord Melville ought to be acquitted, in defiance even of the proof of guilt, because in truth he is so negligent a man, that he looks after nothing that concerns the Navy-pay-office, nor ever did. I use the word in the present tense designedly—looks, for I will show your lordships hereafter, that if he was inattentive before, he is equally inattentive now.

My lords, the learned counsel have told you, that lord Melville was so careless of all papers that were laid before him, that although he signed them, yet it is in proof he immediately destroyed them. I defy the learned counsel to point out that part in their cross-examination, popular or unpopular, in the examination in chief, or in the re-examination of Mr. Trotter, which justifies that assertion. No:—Mr. Trotter, says he was extremely negligent; but that he always signed two parts of each account. I should be glad to inquire of those learned persons who assist this high court, when called upon, with their judgment, whether, if an account so signed had been brought before any one of them in a civil suit, it would not have been conclusive against lord Melville? It is his act and deed; and by his act and deed he must abide. If those papers would have justified him, why not produce them? Has he burnt them?—Then he burnt them because they would make against him. They were laid before him;—they were signed;—they were left with him;—why did he destroy them? The learned counsel, I believe, did not go so far as to say that Mr. Trotter proved lord Melville was in the constant habit of destroying them.

Mr. Plumer.—Mr. Trotter said he believed lord Melville did not keep his vouchers.

Mr. Whitbread.—I beg the learned counsel will refer me to the passage.

Mr. Plumer.—It is in page 162 of the printed evidence:—"I do not know it, but I believe lord Melville seldom kept his vouchers at all.*

Mr. Whitbread.—I thank the learned counsel:—"I believe, but do not know—." After that learned gentleman has so often, in correcting us the Commons, said to your lordships, "My lords, let the managers only ask what the witness knows of his own knowledge," and now to produce this to me when I challenge him to find it in the evidence,— "I believe, but I do not know." Oh, my lords! is that the way in which the learned counsel will consult the safety and honour of his client? Again I say, still more established in the position I before took, that Mr. Trotter has given no evidence to that effect; and that it does not appear before your lordships that lord Melville did destroy those papers at the time he took them: and, indeed, he must have been a man more infatuated than his learned counsel would willingly represent him, to have so destroyed them, because they were the only hold he could have upon Mr. Trotter for the faithful settlement of his account.

If Lord Melville can get rid of obligations so binding, on such shallow pretences, there is an end to all your title-deeds. What!—signed in a moment of haste!—I beg pardon; excuse me;—I signed in a hurry; I did not know what I was signing. Here is a deed by which you conveyed to me certain property; don't tell me of your inattention; if you will not immediately do what you ought, I will take you to a court of justice. And what must that court of justice decide? It would be idle to trespass upon your lordships' time any longer.

But even in criminal cases, how does it stand?—If a man has signed his name to a treasonable paper, and that paper be brought against him in a court of justice, the paper not even written with his own hand, but having his signature—could it be explained away by saying he was a hasty, careless, negligent man,—he wrote his name to every thing, or to any thing? I would put it to the noble defendant himself, who, during a long series of years, was the channel of mercy from the throne to the subjects of this country;—and in despite of the language used by the counsel, who vainly imagined they were taking advantage of what I before said in the same strain, I will give credit to the noble defendant for having had pleasure in recommending to his majesty the exercise of the royal mercy;—and I shall not forget an instance wherein I was an applicant for that mercy towards an unfortunate felon, in which the noble viscount conducted himself in a way in which I should wish to conduct myself, could it ever happen to me to be in a similar situation;—but I would put it to him, whether, if a treasonable paper had been brought in evidence against a man and proved by his signature, and the consequence had been the conviction of the prisoner, would the noble defendant have thought himself justified in an application to the crown for mercy, upon the foolish pretence that the party was not privy to that which he had not signed?—He could not have done it. Are we then to try the noble defendant by rules different from those by which other men are tried for their lives? or are your lordships to exercise equal justice upon him and every other of the subjects of this United Kingdom?

My lords, there are still other topics upon which the learned counsel delight to dwell, and indeed they are delightful; namely, the appeals to your charity! and, when they find a fact too stubborn to be controverted, they say, would any honourable mind, any charitable person, any person out of this Court, think of convicting lord Melville, in his own breast, of proceedings so corrupt? My lords, I love acts of mercy, and should be pleased, in due season, to dwell on the beauties of charity, as much as the learned counsel themselves; but this is not the place where, nor the time when, we can so indulge ourselves. We are now trying the noble defendant upon accusations brought against him;—we say we have established those accusations.—It is not now for you to think of charity;—it is not now for you to think of mercy; it is not for you now to think of any thing but the proof; and, if we have proved our charges, you can have but one course. The learned counsel know that likewise; but, in the absence of all stable ground, they are obliged to tread on quicksands, which are every moment failing under their feet.

My lords, the learned counsel then come to the second article, which contains the dry abstract point of law; that Mr. Trotter was permitted by lord Melville to do that which we maintain is contrary to law. Now, that Mr. Trotter acted with the express concurrence of lord Melville, is most indisputable; that he did it to a large extent also. My lords, the learned counsel have talked at times as if we had no evidence upon this subject but Mr. Trotter; forgetting altogether that we have the evidence of lord Melville himself, an uncontroverted witness, one whose testimony cannot be shaken.

My lords, first of all then, we have proved the fact; namely, that Mr. Trotter had obtained that permission from lord Melville. Farther we contend, in the same article, that lord Melville by such permission, put the money beyond his own control, and exposed it to great risk of loss.—Again, we have proved it. We have proved that, by such permission given to Mr. Trotter, without any restriction, not only was it put beyond the control of lord Melville, the treasurer, but that Mr. Trotter, in the exercise of an authority corruptly given to him, put it beyond his own control; that the person to whom he delegated that power might have put it even beyond his control: and we have proved, by the testimony of Mr. Wilson, that lord Melville knew, not only that it was under Mr. Trotter's exclusive control, but that he (Mr. Trotter) had put it under Mr. Wilson's control. We have proved all this; but then, lord Melville is a man so easily duped:—the governor of India, the secretary of state, the nightly watch, the guardian of the liberties of his country, and the unraveller of all sir Thomas Rumbold's intricate concerns, is so duped, so enchanted by Mr. Trotter, that Mr. Trotter could persuade him to any thing; that he could persuade him, not only that Somerset-house was at a greater distance from the Bank than Broad-street, and therefore the agency of Coutts's house was necessary, but what would be a much more difficult matter, one should think, that Broad-street was at a greater distance from the Bank than Coutts's house in the Strand: and yet, my lords, it is an historical fact, that when he gave Mr. Trotter leave to place the public money at Coutts's, the office was in Broad-street. Your lordships will find Mr. Trotter says, "he believes the office had been removed." The reverse is the fact; and although Mr. Trotter may now believe so, I am not bound to give so much credit to Mr. Trotter's memory. I am not bound to believe every thing Mr. Trotter believes, when it is contrary to history and the matter of fact. His recollection fails him here, for the office was really removed in the month of September, 1787, and payments were made into Coutts's early in 1786. The noble lord could not be such a dupe as then to believe it was for official convenience; they were within a stone's throw of the Bank.

What then were the official regulations which made it necessary for Mr. Trotter to have money at Mr. Coutts's? None at all. He has not even attempted to establish any. The noble defendant, in his evidence before the naval commissioners, has talked about an opinion, to which he still pertinaciously adhered although he was conscious many sensible persons might differ from him, that official convenience was consulted by this arrangement. In 1804, when he had been four years out of office, and had had frequent opportunities of reconsideration, he still adhered to that opinion.—I wish one could give the noble defendant credit for not having taken up an opinion loosely, to which he so pertinaciously adhered.

Now, I beg to call your lordships' attention to the examination of lord Melville, contained in page 62 of the printed evidence.* The learned counsel upon this evidence began a course which they thought proper very soon to abandon; and, indeed, to adopt the sort of phraseology used by the learned leader of this defence, it was rather too tough a morsel for them. However, they began the cross examination of a very able witness, Mr. Sergeant Praed (who appeared before your lordships with the documents containing this evidence of lord Melville) with questions as to the notice lord Melville had had, that he was to be examined, or of the questions that were to be put to him? Whether the questions were put in writing? Whether he had an opportunity of correcting his answers? All which received most pertinent answers from the learned sergeant, who must have shown your lordships, if there were not persons in this court who had been also before those naval commissioners, that they have conducted themselves not only with the most scrupulous vigilance, as respects the public, but with the strictest attention to the justice due to witnesses.

My lords, lord Melville was apprized as early as the beginning of the year 1803, by his conversations with Mr. Trotter, what was the pursuit of the naval commissioners. He was again informed by the precept in the month of June, 1804. His attention was irresistibly called to it; because they had demanded specific records from him, to which I shall have occasion to allude hereafter; and previous to his examination on the 5th of November, 1804, he had a particular precept directed to him, begging him to come to the office of the commissioners on any day convenient to him, which he fixed for the 5th of November; and then he appeared.

At that date, my lords, Mr. Trotter had been under examination for a great length of time; I believe that his first examination had taken place so early as the 8th of June, 1804. Lord Melville had communicated with Mr. Trotter, previous to his coming before the naval commissioners, and he so informed the naval commissioners in a letter which he wrote to them on the 28th of March, in the following year. Mr. Trotter having been so long under examination, and being in habits of intercourse with lord Melville it is impossible that lord Melville could have been ignorant (any more than I was, when I came here, of what I was to speak to), of what he was to speak to, when going before the naval commissioners. But the learned counsel would have you believe, that this unfortunate defendant was taken by surprise; that things were extorted from him, by a sort of peine dure et forte, which otherwise he would not have said. If such were their feelings for lord Melville, I think the learned counsel must be ashamed of their own conduct towards the witnesses here. No time given; all upon the alert; and here were witnesses brought out of dark rooms in the city, unhooded on the sudden like hawks, in the full blaze of this tribunal, not with the eyes of hawks themselves, but with the eye of an hawk upon them, and a voice of thunder asking,—What? cannot you cast up these accounts in a moment?—Poor lord Melville! He had his questions put in writing.

* Page 803.

Did they put their questions in writing to Mr. Edgar? Did they allow him to consult his friends upon them, and come the next day to answer them? Most assuredly not. But the noble defendant wanted no such foreknowledge of the questions to be asked; and what was his answer to most of the questions? Why, that most magnanimous answer described by Mr. Adam, "I will not answer you at all; I protect myself under the fifth clause of the act of parliament." My lords, it was not magnanimity, it was refuge. The learned counsel has talked, in some part of his speech of lord Melville's old clothes. This was the old cloak with which he covered himself when he wanted protection, "he cast his auld cloak about him."

He had learnt then, before the end of June, "that Mr. Trotter kept his accounts in a way which made it impossible for him to give lord Melville the accurate information he required; the same reasons," he adds, "render it impossible for me to give you an answer to the question you now put." Again, "he would not be warranted to give this answer," in consequence of the injury he may do the public as well as himself; and that reason operates strongly upon him. But when again pressed, "Upon what ground does your lordship refuse to answer the question?" He says, "Upon the ground that I have already stated, under the fifth clause of the act, 43 Geo. 3rd, cap. 16." "Did you authorize the paymaster?" (Now I beg your lordships to attend to the date stated in this question) "in or about the year 1786, to draw the money applicable to naval services from the Bank, and lodge it in the hands of a private banker." "I cannot precisely fix the time;" he does not, however, deny the date fixed by the commissioners: "but I am certain that I did permit Mr. Trotter to lodge any money, drawn from the Bank for public purposes, in his private banker's hands during the period it was not demanded to the purposes for which it was drawn." Your lordships have it also in evidence from the noble lord, that his permission was given, not only with a view to official convenience, but that Mr. Trotter might make profit and emolument from it. He has no hesitation in saying that, "he believed and understood he did (i. e. make profit from it), and never prohibited him from doing so; and he believes it was so understood by others at different times, when the establishment of the Navy-pay office was under consideration.

The learned counsel have, for one purpose, adverted to an historical record, and they said, They would have proved it, only it was an historical record, and therefore it was unnecessary to put it in proof. Taking, then, that record as a matter of history, I mean the report of the committee of finance (and the learned counsel derived from those reports abundant reason to praise the noble defendant, and to say that he has acted meritoriously for his country), I must show your lordships, that it unfortunately happens that every statement made under the authority of the noble defendant before that committee, was false. The persons from the Navy-pay office, who were called before that committee, stated the amount of their salaries, and that they were without the addition of any fee, perquisite, or gratuity whatever; Mr. Trotter amongst the rest: yet the noble lord knew at the time, that he had permitted Mr. Trotter to withdraw the money from the Bank, and that he was making advantage of it. Then he tells the naval commissioners it was so understood by others when the establishment of the Navy-pay office was under consideration. Was it so understood by the committee of finance? If it was, that committee made a false report. Could it have been so understood by the committee of finance? It could not; because all the evidence given before that committee went directly the other way.

The learned counsel have taken another extraordinary ground: and they say, Oh! but without this permission, Mr. Trotter could have done the same under his power of attorney. Could have done the same thing!—He could have broken his trust;—which he did not break towards lord Melville. You must, said the learned counsel, in one part of his speech, put trust in man. There must assuredly be confidence in human affairs: and the more trust you place in man, the more he is to be trusted: at least that is the feeling which I wish to encourage in myself. Yet confidence has its limits, and every day affords fresh instances of deceit. But this is the question: if the noble lord had given the power of attorney without his permission added to it, would Mr. Trotter honestly, and with propriety towards his employer, have done that which he did; I contend he could not. I would ask Mr. Latham whether he could honestly have exercised his authority to such a purpose? I would ask Mr. Tierney whether, if Mr. Latham had done so, the moment he had discovered it, he would not have cashiered him, and dismissed him from his confidence for ever?

My lords, if the head of an office be corrupt, the country can have no redress against their servants unless through the load of toil which the Commons have undergone, and the consumption of time they have expended; but if the head of the office be pure, and the subordinates should misconduct themselves, there is an immediate and efficacious remedy; and the noble lord himself had he been pure, would have been able to apply the remedy; which, if Mr. Trotter had so used his power of attorney, it would be fit he should have applied, and which would have operated as an immediate corrective to the abuse.

My lords, that abuses do frequently exist in public offices without the knowledge of the superiors, I admit;—we all know it; but then there is a remedy. Information frequently comes from unsuspected sources. Independdent persons, who know nothing about political arrangements, may happen by accident to have possession of public securities; such, for instance, as belong to the Navy pay-office, and from receiving payment of such securities by drafts upon Coutts's, discover that matters are not properly conducted, and follow up the discovery by giving information of the fact. My lords, I have heard an affecting story of redress given to a great grievance by the means of a very humble instrument. The gaols of this country are now for the most part, such as so enlightened a community would wish to see them; but your lordships well know that, till within a short period of time; the reverse was unhappily the case: and it did happen within the memory of man, that there was, in a remote county a debtor confined in a gaol where the gaoler was brutal, and the place of confinement insecure; the debtor was the object of the gaoler's vigilance, because, in the event of his escape, he became responsible for the debt; and the method which he took to satisfy himself that his charge was safe, was, by chaining him hand and foot on his back to the floor. An obscure person, who happened to visit the unfortunate man in this situation, after revolving in his mind what he should do, made a drawing of him in all his wretchedness, put his name at the head of it, and walked with it to London. He made his way to one of the principal officers of government, and placed this drawing before him. The earthly reward of that man, if he be alive, is in the heaven of his own conscience!—his eternal reward rests with his Almighty Father. His effort had its effect, and redress was immediately obtained; and had this scene of misery been exhibited to the noble defendant himself, no doubt the remedy would have been equally prompt.

Now, suppose the case of an individual discovering an abuse in the Navy-pay-office, and receiving payment for a bill under circumstances, such as I before stated, in perfect ignorance of politics; for such a man may be sufficiently informed to know that there are great officers of government, and what are their duties; he might say, I know that by law the money of the Navy-pay-office ought to be all in the Bank. Here, I have remitted to me a draft upon Messieurs Coutts for a navy bill: I am sure there must be some abuse; the person at the head of the office is a confidential servant of the crown, and certainly would not knowingly permit it. Suppose he had sought out the head of that office, and said, "See how your subordinates conduct themselves:" the answer would have been short, "I know it, and I permit it." Supposing further, that the man, unacquainted with the individuals who filled the offices of state, and impressed with a still stronger notion of the existence of criminality somewhere, had reflected that there was a secretary of state, to whom he might make the case known, and had betaken himself to the secretary of state, unfortunately he would again have met Mr. Dundas, and would have obtained the same answer. Supposing he had heard of another great officer, called the president of the board of control, and gone to him; there also he would have met with Mr. Dundas, but neither attention nor redress. Supposing, then, he had heard that there was a person occupying the first station in government, who had been the king's confidential servant during more than twenty years, and he had said, I will go to that man who I have heard is hereditary and personally uncorrupt. Why, there also he would have met with no redress; for it is a matter of history, that Mr. Dundas had been questioned by Mr. Pitt on the very subject, and had deceived him, and by deceiving him had satisfied him there was no abuse. Is there no disadvantage to the public arising from such things? and, if the noble defendant might do this with impunity, might not every other officer in every department of government do these things? But, I think we cannot fail to have convinced your noble minds he is guilty, when we have proved the second article of charge; that he permitted Mr. Trotter to withdraw the money from the Bank—that he suffered it to be placed beyond his own control, and beyond Mr. Trotter's control, and exposed it to great risk of loss.

Mr. Trotter, it is said, never lost any thing—he was an ingenious and successful man—he never lost by his speculations. If stocks fell, he could keep his stock till the tide changed; and I think the noble defendant has been as fortunate as Mr. Trotter in every case without exception. Your lordships were lately told that the India stock did not immediately rise, and that the three per cents were at one time worse,—that the loyalty was first at a discount, but it so happened, that when the time came to dispose of them all, each bore a premium upon the price it had originally cost. We have heard of a bliss in ignorance, and a folly in wisdom, which is strongly exemplified in the noble lord; it would have been folly for him to have been wise in this matter—his ignorance was most blissful, because it produced to him the fruit of the speculations of his agent.

We do not charge actual loss, but that great risk of loss was incurred; and we prove it by the evidence of Mr. Sprot. Mr. Sprot had purchased for, or had in security from Mr. Trotter, or Mr. Trotter had in his possession, for it matters not which, a large quantity of navy bills, which fell to a discount, so great as to induce him to borrow money to pay the service of the navy rather than sell the bills; Mr. Sprot does not know the amount of the bills, but it may have been very large.

Mr. Trotter has stated himself to have been originally a clerk, at 50*l.* a year,—to have been raised by degrees,—and, at length, to have obtained a fortune of fifty or sixty thousand pounds. Now, if Mr. Trotter had been obliged to sell those bills at a discount, it is in evidence before your lordships, that he could not, at that time, have made good the difference, and the public must have suffered by his being a defaulter: so that we have proved the money was exposed to risk of loss. The learned counsel with great emphasis says, has the public lost one farthing by this? We do not charge it—what we charged we have proved, and we did not undertake to prove more.

The extent to which the public money was used was from 10,000*l.* to 20,000*l.*, 48,000*l.*, 69,000*l.*, 102,000*l.*, 139,000*l.*, 270,000*l.*, 310,000*l.*, 490,000*l.* and upon going out, to 344,000*l.* Why, my lords, when any man has such a control over public money, is it not evidently exposed to risk of loss?—and in the various channels through which Mr. Trotter was permitted, by this original authority, to let this money pass, was it not put to hazard every day?

The learned counsel in his cross-examination of one of the witnesses, obtained this fact, that lord Melville knew Mr. Trotter had made profit of the money,—and that he had heard lord Melville say (the witness did not assert that lord Melville knew it was so), that the money was made profitable to Mr. Trotter, or, according to the expression of one of the learned counsel, that it had fructified for his use in the hands of Messieurs Coutts. But could lord Melville be ignorant, that Mr. Trotter made money in other ways than by a small per-centage on a small balance; when he saw that he had purchased an estate at Dreghorn,—that he lived, not splendidly, but in a comfortable gentleman-like manner, such as might become a man of an income, of two or three thousand pounds a year. Could all this be passing under the eye of the noble defendant, and he suppose that it was all paid out of a salary of 500*l.* 300*l.* from exchequer fees, and a small profit on the money left in Coutts's hands?

I will not fatigue your lordships by going over some of the observations of the learned counsel; their pathetic lamentation over a sailor's widow, who is to carry a half-crown note to the Bank, where she cannot get it changed.—We all know, that since 1797, cash payments can be made at the Bank alone, and therefore, since the year 1797, it was impossible any convenience could result from the use of Mr. Coutts's house, because, from the general prohibition to the Bank to issue specie, it was necessary there should be a Treasury order, to authorize the Navy-pay-office to receive cash at the Bank; nothing but paper then could be had at Coutts's, and cash could be had at the Bank alone. Is it not then the most absurd proposition that ever was entertained by any man in the world?—in the teeth of the evidence they persist in telling you that it was for official convenience the money was lodged at Coutts's, when those unfortunate persons, if they went to Coutts's, could have nothing but paper, and could have cash only at the Bank. Couple this with the removal of the office from Broad-street, and then ask the noble lord, who was privy to the regulations of the year 1797, whether it be possible he should have been so duped, as to believe, when told, in the first instance, sitting in Broad-street, that it was for official convenience to have the money at Messieurs Coutts's, and to continue of that opinion in 1797, when there was no gold, but at the Bank?—Surely none but a man little above the rank of an idiot, could be so imposed upon:—Lord Melville is a man of a very different stamp, and therefore must be guilty of the charge imputed to him.

I fear I have detained your lordships much too long, but I am desirous that nothing should escape me. I am anxious that every misrepresentation made by the counsel, should be set right, and that the evidence should be stripped of all the extraneous matter cast around it.

My lords, I apprehend I have shown, that we have proved our charges against lord Melville, up to that part of them wherein we impute to him a corrupt participation.—My lords, before I go into that subject, I beg leave to refer your lordships to the opening made by the Commons; and as large passages have been quoted from the speech of the unworthy manager to whom that task was deputed, I beg to state to your lordships what that manager said, which is not exactly what has been said for him.—And here again, I complain of the hardships which the counsel inflict upon me; by giving a false meaning to my words, they wish to make me odious in the end of this prosecution; and to extract from me harsh things relative to lord Melville; such as are not in my heart, such as I do not intend to utter; but many of the sentiments which they impute to me, respecting lord Melville, were not such as I professed towards him myself, but what I said his friends might be allowed to entertain. I gave no opinion of my own. Mr. Adam has told you, I did not call his client avaricious; and he adds, that avarice and profusion are incompatible.—As he has favoured us with some quotations, I would refer him to a description given by a Roman, of a Roman; "Alieni appetens, sui profusus:"—and when he imputes to me having said that the noble defendant was not avaricious,—I answer? I charge him not with avarice: but I repeat the sentiment I before uttered, that the desire of acquiring wealth for other purposes than those of mere hoarding, may be more dangerous than the gratification of seeing and handling the coin, in the sordid manner for which there is a madness in some part of mankind.

I certainly did endeavour to remove a general impression, which I thought might have its weight in the minds of some, who would say, as his defenders have actually done, notwithstanding your proof, it is impossible to believe that a man of the disposition of lord Melville, can have been guilty of these crimes: and in order to show that it was at least possible, I instanced one who had incurred such guilt, between whom and the noble defendant, whatever his acquirements may be, the distance is immeasurable. I told you that lord Bacon had done the same.—Now I beg to read a passage from the works of sir Michael Foster, upon the character of lord Bacon; I wish the words were my own, they so accurately describe my feelings.—He says of lord Bacon, “Avarice, I think, was not his ruling passion, but whenever a false ambition, ever-restless and craving, over-heated in the pursuit of the honours which the Crown alone can confer, happeneth to stimulate an heart, otherwise formed for great and noble pursuits, it hath frequently betrayed it into measures full as mean as avarice itself could have suggested to the wretched animals who live and die under her dominion.—For these passions, however they may seem to be at variance, have ordinarily produced the same effects; both degrade the man; both contract his views into the little point of self-interest, and equally steel the heart against the rebukes of conscience, or the sense of true honour.”*

It is that passion, so described, which I impute to the noble defendant, and which, notwithstanding the boasted expanse of his mind, has rendered him capable of the acts which the Commons have charged upon him.

My lords, the learned counsel have opened their defence to the remaining charges, by saying, that their magnitude created a necessity for the strictest proof. I think I have shown your lordships, that, up to this moment, the most strict proof that could possibly be required in a case of life and death, has been exhibited; and it fails not to the end.

My lords, the items selected by the solicitor-general are, a certain sum of 14,500*l.* India stock, 10,000*l.* loyalty, 2,000*l.* India, 7,000*l.* three per cent reduced; and these, say the learned counsel, are all: these, —Rari nantes.

Then there was, it seems, a great gulph of corruption in which these things were swimming. But it was not my learned friend who made that selection; it was they who made it, and we have shown you that there was a constant stream of corruption, flowing, according to the metaphor which the learned counsel has used, from the beginning of lord Melville's administration of the Navy-pay-office, down to the very time when he quitted it. These are only the prominent features in the case; and so prominent are they, that it is impossible your lordships should overlook them. They are of such a character and stamp, like the features in some human faces, that being once seen they can never be forgotten; and having seen, and recorded them in your memories, you will ever remember that they are the features of lord Melville.

My lords, the observations made by the learned manager who summed up the evidence, upon the transactions in India stock, to the amount of 14,500*l.* are confirmed out of the mouth of Mr. Adam. The learned manager said, that lord Melville was no fair speculator in India stock; that the president of the Board of Control has no right to communicate the feeling he may have of the value of India stock, by making purchases on speculation: and the purchases made in East-India stock for his advantage, were purchases merely upon the speculation of its rise. The prosperity of the affairs of the East India company, you are told, was a favourite topic of conversation with the noble defendant and he was not mistaken in his notion that the company's stock would rise, for the dividends were increased. My lords, we charge, that he took a sum of money from a person (to adopt for a moment, the statement made in his favour) unknown to him: he suffered his estimate of the probable value of India stock to be communicated to one with whom he was unacquainted, to induce that person to lend him money; and upon what security? Upon the security of the stock itself, which (as my learned friend has stated), was such a security as no money-lender would think of advancing money upon. Mr. Adam acknowledges that no man would think of lending money on such security, except to lord Melville; and to such a man, says Mr. Adam, then in the plenitude of his power, confided in by his sovereign, at the head of the Board of Control, resplendent with his various offices, would not any body have lent the money? There is the grievance. If he was the only man who could have obtained money upon such security, he, of all others, ought not to have accepted it. The learned counsel has asserted, quite contrary to the evidence, that Mr. Sprot, who is known to be extremely wary, lent money on the self-same security: but your lordships will recollect, that he had the security of Mr. Robert Dundas by his letters missive, added to the stock.

Then comes another appeal to the feelings of the Court upon the mention of the name of Mr. Robert Dundas. Indeed, indeed, my lords, if I might be permitted, or any thing could be grateful to that gentleman which came from me, I should be one of the first to express my feelings towards him; nothing can be more meritorious, more consolatory to all mankind who have witnessed it, than his conduct towards the noble defendant now in distress. If afflictions can ever produce their own consolations, that is a consolation this affliction has produced to him. I am reminded by it of what I once heard an affectionate father say to his son: “I rejoice that I have been afflicted, for without that affliction, I should not have known your worth.” We are as open as the learned counsel can be to all the feelings of humanity, but this is not the time to call them forth; and we must not suffer them to distract the Court.

* Foster's Crown Law, p. 199, 4to. edition.

The learned counsel tell you, lord Melville knew not that Mr. Trotter was the lender of this money from the beginning to the end of the transaction; that we have not shown that he did. I say, from the internal evidence of the thing, he must have known it, and not only from the internal, but from the external evidence also. But then, we must not drop any part of the evidence. From a review of the whole of it, we contend, that it is impossible your lordships should not be convinced, that he must have known Mr. Trotter was the lender.

The learned counsel then say, with an odd tone of triumph, Mr. Whitbread told you the story about the India stock, just as Mr. Trotter has told it. He was very accurate; and he added, that every thing would be confirmed that Mr. Trotter said. Accurate again. Mr. Whitbread did not go one jot further than he knew the witness could go; and from all this, the learned counsel modestly desire the Court to infer that we have disproved our own case. I state the just inference to be that we have proved it. We have proved a most interesting conversation between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, which your lordships will find in page 122 of the printed evidence. It is very material, that your lordships should attend to the history which Mr. Trotter there gives, in his examination in chief; and that you should observe that it is given in an uninterrupted narrative; that the method in which the manager who examined Mr. Trotter proceeded, was, first of all, to ask Mr. Trotter whether a transaction of that kind ever took place, and when he had said that it did take place, to desire that he would narrate it; and that he did so without interruption.

My lords, one might imagine that the learned counsel who opened this defence had been present, as a little familiar in the corner, at this interview, for he gave a long conversation, well imagined enough, between the principal and his agent.—Surely he was in the closet all the time. But how differently does Mr. Trotter relate the conversation! he says, “I will state the transaction, as far as my memory will carry me, which was in consequence of a conversation I had with his lordship, in which he stated his opinion of the value of East-India stock, from the probable rise that would take place ultimately in that stock;—and I observed to his lordship, that if he was impressed with so good an opinion of that stock,” (and it was a natural way of leading Mr. Trotter to make that observation), “that I thought, in consideration of his own interest, he ought to invest a sum of money in that stock:—his lordship’s observations seemed to throw it aside, by saying that he had no money to invest in stock! I had mentioned to his lordship that there were considerable balances lying at all times in my hands that were not called for, and, in all probability, would not be called for, from circumstances that I need not, perhaps, relate at this time; but it was money lying unclaimed in my hands, which it would not be necessary to advance to the public, until it was claimed, and there was no prospect of that claim taking place soon; and I advised his lordship to give me leave to lay out so much of that money as would buy about 13,000*l.* or 14,000*l.* East India stock; but which his lordship refused in the most pointed and decided manner, insomuch that I was afraid I had incurred his lordship’s displeasure by proposing it.”* Now, my lords, having so risked incurring his lordship’s displeasure in proposing it, does this deputy, who, although in the situation of a gentleman, was still lord Melville’s inferior in the office, retire altogether?—Does he refrain from making any other proposition to lord Melville?—No;—he immediately returns to the charge, and tells lord Melville, he has a friend or relation whom he thinks he could persuade to do the thing. Good God, my lords! could any man above the situation and intellect of an idiot, be so imposed upon as to suppose any third person was really intended? Again he says, “he made the matter easy to lord Melville,” that he might be possessed of the stock, and not disappointed in it. Lord Melville having originated the conversation by telling Mr. Trotter his good opinion of India stock; Mr. Trotter immediately taking the hint, and proceeding upon it; lord Melville becoming indignant and rejecting the offer; Mr. Trotter returning to the charge with his friend in his hand; and, as he states, making the matter easy to his lordship.

Is there not internal evidence of the nature of the transaction? Has Mr. Trotter told the truth, or is this all sham?—No;—it is the truth; I believe no other words passed between them. But, have we not had evidence of modes of request, in which particular intelligence was conveyed with regard to particular accounts by certain communications?—Have we not sufficient examples, in the intercourse of mankind, of communications made without one word passing. Our own country affords the sublimest master and describer of the passions and feelings of men, and of all their secret turnings and windings: I mean our great dramatic poet: he certainly must have been present at an interview of this kind, to have enabled him to write the admirable scene, wherein John unfolds his murderous purpose to Hubert.

When he had formed his bloody resolution against the unhappy Arthur, and wanted to mould Hubert to the deed; he is introduced as saying,

“Come hither, Hubert! Oh! my gentle Hubert!”

"We owe thee much; within this wall of flesh
 "There is a soul counts thee her creditor,
 "And with advantage, means to pay thy love.
 "If that thou couldst see me without eyes,
 "Hear me without thine ears, and make reply
 "Without a tongue, using conceit alone,
 "Without eyes, ears, and harmful sound of words;

"Then, in despite of broad-ey'd, watchful day,
 "I would into thy bosom pour my thoughts."—

The desideratum between these two persons was found by lord Melville and his accomplice. Lord Melville intended, and conveyed his intention to Trotter; but no words passed between them: the stock was bought by Mr. Trotter, and "the matter was made easy" to lord Melville. From the internal state of the evidence, it must be so, or lord Melville be reduced to an avowal of this meanness, that he would condescend to accept a favour from some third person to whom he was utterly unknown.—He abandoned his character as a statesman, to be carried into the alley by Mr. Trotter. Who will lend money to buy stock, on the sole security of the stock? None.—Who will do it for lord Melville? All! would be the reply;—and we will at the same time purchase for ourselves; because, if lord Melville is about to speculate in India stock, it will rise.

Then how was the stock afterwards purchased? Mr. Trotter tells you, and, I believe, truly, that he spoke to Mr. Lind, and Lind not being able to make the advances, he used the public money, and charged lord Melville 5 per cent interest upon it, which lord Melville always paid. To be sure, after the conversation that had passed between them, it would have been rather too strong for the noble defendant to have said, now you have got this money from your friend, I will not pay any interest for it. This stock afterwards increased to 14,500*l.* It is in proof, that within a specific time, 1,000*l.* out of this 14,500*l.* was transferred into lord Melville's own name: for which he gave no valuable consideration. Then, I ask you all, to put your hands upon your honourable hearts, and declare whether lord Melville could have so degraded himself, as to have accepted the obligation of a thousand pounds stock, given to him by Lind! and whether he must not have known that it was Trotter who was the lender? after this 1,000*l.* stock had been transferred, the debt was diminished by its value, and the proportion of interest was deducted. My lords, the reasoning upon this transaction, appears to me conclusive; but we can carry it still further; and it will not stand upon reasoning alone. When we come to sum up the account, we shall show your lordships that the whole was put at lord Melville's disposal by Mr. Trotter.

There is another transaction in East India stock, which, in the estimation of the Commons, bears very strongly upon this transaction also, and this the learned counsel have almost omitted; I mean the 2,000*l.* India stock. I beg to remind your lordships, that 2,000*l.* was purchased on the 4th of September, 1792, for lord Melville. A question was asked by the Commons, relative to the state of Mr. Trotter's account, at Messrs. Coutts's on the morning of that day; and your lordships were informed by Mr. Chapman, that Mr. Trotter was out of credit in one account, and only 400*l.* or thereabouts in credit on the other: on the two accounts together, he had not a balance of much more than 300*l.*; that Mr. Trotter gave a draft upon the Bank for 8,000*l.* and that the produce of that draft was immediately paid away, in order to purchase 4,000*l.* East India stock; half for Mr. Trotter, and half for lord Melville.—This money having been shown to have been so expended, a question came from the Court, whether Mr. Trotter had not also credit at Messrs. Coutts's for 25,000*l.* in the hands of Mansfield and company at Edinburgh; and whether he could not have drawn for that at any moment? No doubt he could, but then what would have happened? the money in the hands of Mansfield was producing four per cent; if he had drawn, 8,000*l.* out of it, he would have lost four per cent upon 8,000*l.* so that he took a sum out of the Bank from which he was deriving no interest, and made lord Melville gainer upon a part of that sum; taking care that he himself should not lose his four per cent upon any part of the other sum of 25,000*l.*

What are the circumstances, my lords, under which Mr. Trotter describes that he bought this additional 2,000*l.* India stock? the transaction is posterior, and not greatly posterior, to the purchase of stock made by Lind for lord Melville's use. The indignation which lord Melville had expressed, could hardly have been cold in his mind, when he directed Mr. Trotter to do,—what? without saying, "Abstain from the public balances;" without saying, "Have you money to do it yourself? Do not place me in the situation in which you would have placed me before. Do not speculate for me with the public money." No, without a word of that sort, he said to Mr. Trotter that he wanted a further qualification in India stock. I beg to refer your lordships to the specific question and answer in page 131. "The first purchase you speak to was 2,000*l.* East India stock, whether after the documents you have seen on the subject, you have now any memory or recollection upon the subject?" "I recollect generally that lord Melville wanted to be possessed of a further qualification of East India stock, and he begged me to procure it for him, but whether he told me that he would immediately repay me the money or not, I do not recollect."*

Now, my lords, how had he any qualification of India stock? only by the 1,000*l.* which had been transferred into his name by Lind; for which he gave no valuable consideration. He wanted a further qualification, and he received it upon the same terms. And then the learned counsel would have you believe that he was totally ignorant of the circumstances of the original purchase. Where is all this indignation gone? All extinguished! not one spark of it remaining. At the best, he condescends in this grovelling manner to take 1,000*l.* from a person unknown to him, and he then takes this further sum of 2,000*l.* East India stock from Mr. Trotter also. Do your lordships want any further proof? one should imagine it almost impossible to fix upon any man by circumstantial evidence any fact, more strongly than this has been fixed upon the noble defendant. But when we come to the close of the scene, we shall show that it must have been brought under his knowledge again. Nay, if he had never known it before, he must have known it then; although, I am sorry to say, the noble defendant has told you, that he never knew it till after the publication of the tenth report.

The next item is the 10,000*l.* loyalty. This 10,000*l.* loyalty was ushered in with great parade. The guards were all out again. The charity of your lordships,—lord Melville's carelessness,—his conduct as a public man—stoppage of the Bank—mutiny in the navy,—famine; all the horrors that can be conjured up, and he the support of the state in the midst of them,—all usher in this 10,000*l.* loyalty. The doors are at length opened, and in walks the patriot, lord Melville, subscribing to a loan for the benefit of his country: and then they bring in to his assistance, most unjustly, his departed friend, Mr. Pitt. But how, in contrast with lord Melville, does Mr. Pitt stand? Can his injured manes be at peace, whilst his pretended friends are stabbing his reputation for the purpose of varnishing their own.

It is true Mr. Pitt is on the list of subscribers to the loyalty loan, and for the same amount as lord Melville. Mr. Pitt, like the noble defendant, had not probably a command of money to pay the subscription; but did Mr. Pitt take any part of the public money to pay the instalments on his 10,000*l.* when he was at the acme of his power, when there was nothing which stood either before him, or in competition with him, did he, like the noble defendant, take the public money to subscribe to the public? No, he might get it from his private friends, if he thought fit, as a matter of policy, to support that subscription; he might have done any thing, except that which the noble lord did, and to have done that, would to him have been worse than death:—added to which, Mr. Pitt sold his subscription when at a discount; lord Melville kept his at the public expense till it rose to a premium; and then sold it for his own advantage. Hold not up these two men together! No,—hold up one to honour, and the other to conviction for the offence he has committed.

We have then a cavil about words: “Mr. Trotter did not know who ordered the purchase of it.” Why, nobody purchased it; it was a subscription, Who subscribed for it in lord Melville's name?—Mr. Coutts. Who paid Mr. Coutts immediately?—Mr. Trotter: as each instalment became due. These payments were entered in one of the accounts kept between them; and these are the accounts of which Mr. Adam and Mr. Plumer says, that though lord Melville signed duplicates, and kept one part, and Mr. Trotter the other, yet, because he was a careless and inattentive man, he ought not to be bound by them. These two accounts I shall have occasion to state presently; and your lordships will find them both so knitted and bound together, by the loyalty loan, as to convict lord Melville, in default of all the other proof that has been adduced.

The 10,000*l.* loyalty having been so bought with the public money, a power of attorney was given to Mr. Trotter to sell it again; and that power of attorney is described as in the nature of a security from lord Melville to Mr. Trotter; but it was only a common power of attorney. They have read it to you. It purports to be for the transfer and sale of stock, and receipt of dividends, in the usual form. At the close of the treasurership, however, we find by a direction given under the hand of the noble defendant to Messieurs Coutts, that it was impossible the stock should be transferred without a special order from him. The loyalty loan fell to a discount, and therefore it is said, the calculation put in by the Commons cannot be in this part correct; but the learned manager who summed up the evidence, has shown distinctly, that, if it did fall to a discount, so much the greater the advantage to lord Melville: because, if he must have sold it at a discount, had he not been enabled to keep it with the public money till it came to a profit, he has received all the advantage not only of positive gain, but of indemnity against loss.

This 10,000*l.* loyalty was carried first to the account current between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter; that account in which Mr. Trotter states himself to have stood between the public and lord Melville. Having been so placed in the account current, and lord Melville, from carelessness or neglect, or what you please, not having repaid to Mr. Trotter any part of the advance, it was transferred to the Chest account. Here Mr. Adam cuts the Gordian knot with a vengeance!—he admits, “Mr. Trotter has proved this,” but he says, “it never went there.” Let him show us the duplicates of the Chest account. No, they are gone; then we will leave his assertion to weigh what it can in the minds of your lordships, against the evidence of a man, whom he tells you he believes, and we are bound to believe. But Mr. Adam's description of this Chest account is of some importance; he says it contained memoranda of public monies; and he says, one of these memoranda was of the sum of 10,600*l.* illegally possessed by lord Melville; another of the sum of 40,000*l.* illegally taken also, as declared by an act of parliament; then comes the 10,000*l.* loyalty, which had passed first into the account current, but settled in the Chest account. It is material to observe, that Mr. Trotter has told you, that the Chest account received its title by lord Melville's direction. These two accounts, with the alteration, were placed before lord Melville. The transaction was recorded upon the face of them both; it forms the bond of union between the two.

My lords, there is another sum which I stated not to have been charged expressly in our articles, the 7,000*l.* reduced. The learned counsel attempted by their cross-examination to show, that this parcel of 7,000*l.* reduced annuities, was not bought with the public money. They say that there were large remittances sent to lord Melville from Scotland at that time. True, there were some remittances; but what was then the state of the Chest account? It was debtor to the public. Therefore, with a sum of money, which came into Mr. Trotter's hand for lord Melville, instead of extinguishing any part of his debt to the public, he bought stock; the profit of which lord Melville received. Now is there the smallest difference whether he bought stock with the public money, or whether he did not pay the public with the money he had in his hand, but purchased stock with it for lord Melville's benefit leaving the account to stand as it did?

My lords, there were other advances made by Mr. Trotter, for lord Melville to pay off debts in Scotland. These advances, it is contended, may have been made at a time when Mr. Trotter was in the receipt of large sums of money, for lord Melville: and very likely they were; but your lordships will again observe, in the evidence of Mr. Trotter, that he carried every thing to the credit of the account current between himself and lord Melville, that he received upon account of the noble defendant; and notwithstanding such credits the account stood against him, and, as we charge, generally in a balance of from ten to twenty thousand pounds; so that it mattered not whether he was in the receipt of money for lord Melville at that particular time or not. You have the evidence of sir William Forbes, Mr. Robert Trotter, and others, to these advances.

I come now to state to your lordships, that we have proved an account current kept between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter; and the first item of that account was a sum of 4,000*l.* advanced very early in the intercourse between them; I mean so early as 1786 or 1787. It is incontestibly proved that this was advanced out of the public money, and specifically out of Exchequer fee money. The bond and obligation which Mr. Trotter took, bore upon the face of it, that it was advanced without interest. Then we are gravely told, lord Melville never read the bond. I will not fatigue your lordships by again urging that point, that lord Melville must be deemed to know his own affairs, like another man, and must be bound by his own signature. This was done when Mr. Trotter had been newly appointed paymaster, and had just ceased to be a clerk at 100*l.* a-year; so that in taking 4,000*l.* of the Exchequer fee money without interest, lord Melville abridged Mr. Trotter's small acknowledged emoluments, in the paltry sum of 200*l.* a-year. This account current was carried on between lord Melville and Mr. Trotter, to the close of their public transactions. The advances made upon it were manifestly of the public money. The chest account was carried down to the same period. These accounts were written in books; those books are destroyed; these accounts were placed upon papers duly signed, and those papers are also destroyed; and all the evidence we can obtain of them, can be from Mr. Trotter, and Mr. Trotter alone.

My lords, I now come to the close of the general account, upon lord Melville's going out of office in the year 1800. Its liquidation was effected as between Mr. Trotter and himself, by the intervention of Mr. Mark Sprot; and the assistance and kindness of Mr. Robert Dundas. I refer your lordships to page 211 of the evidence; you will there find a letter addressed by lord Melville to the house of Coutts, dated in May 1800, directing them to put all his different parcels of stock at the disposal of Mr. Mark Sprot. The order contained in that letter was acted upon; the different stocks were conveyed as security to Mr. Sprot; who advanced money upon them, and an additional security given by Mr. Robert Dundas. The advance was made upon the loyalty, upon the 1,000*l.* India, part of the 14,500*l.* India, and the 2,000*l.* India bought in September 1792, and upon the three per cents: making a total advance of 51,000*l.* Mr. Sprot took at the same time the remaining 13,500*l.* of East-India stock. Did lord Melville execute any release of the 13,500*l.*? No paper passed between him and any person respecting it; all was done by signs, but Sprot advanced the money upon it, and that money, together with an addition of which I shall presently speak, made the whole amount to 71,000*l.* These monies went first to the discharge of the Chest account, which was avowedly public money; next, to discharge the balances upon the account current, which were also of public money; and after having travelled through the two accounts, in order the more clearly to prove that they both consisted of public money, they were paid into the act of parliament, account at the Bank. There is still another feature in this case. There was, in the year 1800, standing at the Bank, in the name of lord Melville, the sum of 5,350*l.* as an ex-treasurership account, which, if tendered at the Exchequer, would at any time have been received, as you have heard from Mr. Cobbe. This further sum of public money was taken out of the Bank by lord Melville, and paid to Mr. Trotter. Mr. Trotter carried it through his account current, and then paid it into the act of parliament account at the Bank also. This sum of 5,350*l.* or thereabouts completed the whole of the balance due, amounting as before stated to upwards of 71,000*l.*

My lords, the accounts of lord Melville's first treasurership having at length come to be audited in the year 1805; the auditors thought proper to make a charge of interest upon him. Lord Melville stated to the Treasury that he ought to be exonerated from that charge, because the money had been either in the Bank of England, or in the hands of his sub-accountant, from the termination of his first treasurership in April 1783, till the close of the second treasurership in 1800. Upon that assertion the lords of the Treasury ordered his quietus. Now, I beg to recall the attention of your lordships to the period of 1786, when we prove that 1,600*l.* of that ex-treasurership account was not at the Bank;—to another period, when we prove that only 8*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* was at the Bank;—and to the books of the sub-accountants at both periods, which show that the money was not with them. The letter to the Treasury is dated in July 1805, when lord Melville's attention had been sufficiently roused to an examination of his accounts, by Mr. Trotter's having abdicated his office of paymaster under Mr. Canning; by the resolutions of the 8th of April; by his having quitted his post as first lord of the Admiralty; by his name having been struck from the list of the privy council; and by the vote of impeachment. Under all these circumstances he made the false assertions, on which the Treasury granted a remission of 4,500*l.* interest, charged on the balance in his hands. My lords, it was material to show this in evidence, as the conclusion of the whole business, as well as for the purpose of proving that lord Melville has not paid any interest to the public for that money.

My lords, it does not appear to me that, on the part of the Commons, I have neglected to press any material point, so far as my ability would enable me, except, indeed, this circumstance with regard to the two accounts kept by Mr. Trotter; of which the balance on the account current was generally, and of the Chest account always, against lord Melville.

There is another charge made by the Commons in their articles, as matter of aggravation against the noble defendant, that Mr. Trotter acted gratuitously in his service: And we have proved that he never received any compensation from his principal. Lord Melville could not have accepted his services upon such terms, if he had not known that Mr. Trotter was remunerated by the use of the public money.

My lords, we have contended that the loan made by Mr. Sprot was for the exclusive benefit of lord Melville: It was in the power of the learned counsel for the defendant to have disproved that fact, if untrue, by the most incontestible evidence.

Further, my lords, the Commons have charged, as criminatory matter against lord Melville, that he destroyed all the papers and vouchers which could have given the history of these accounts.

My lords, your attention should be recalled to the release, which has been given in evidence. You should recollect, that it contains an unusual clause;—that it was drawn by a person, who acted as solicitor to lord Melville, as well as to Mr. Trotter; that it was executed by Mr. Trotter, under impressions that he might be called to account for crimes he had committed in the Navy-pay-office; that it was executed by lord Melville in Scotland, and Mr. Trotter in London; and, that it was prepared at the moment when the precepts, which had been issued from the naval commissioners, received their return. We are then told that lord Melville never looked at this paper; but he signed it; and we have his signature here produced before you. Then comes an argument upon the subject of registration; and an appeal is made to the Court, founded on the good sense of the noble lord. Would he, it is said, for the purpose of concealment, sign a deed which was to be registered? The noble lord knows better. He knows that registration purports not publicity; he knows that the deed itself is not registered; and need not be registered till the moment it becomes necessary to act upon it; he knows that, without the clause of registration, it would be no deed at all. So that if they had a deed, they must have had that clause of registration inserted in it. Suppose, again, it were registered; among a million of deeds at a public office, who would go to look for it, or know of its existence? Unless for some special purpose, how could it be come at? It would be no more public there than in the private depositaries of the noble defendant himself. All the argument upon the clause of registration falls to the ground upon the mere explanation of the fact. Again; it is said: Supposing he did destroy the papers, &c. in consequence of this release, he had a right to destroy evidence that would make against himself. Who says he had not? If he were in possession of a Bank note he had forged, and knew the officers of justice to be in pursuit of him, he would put the note in the fire, and there would be an end of it. But is it not to be presumed, from his having destroyed it, that it contained evidence of his guilt? If he destroyed evidence at all would he destroy evidence of his innocence? Does not the noble lord know that, in the court of Scotland, guilt has always been inferred from the destruction of papers? Does he not know that the lord-advocate, who succeeded him, his friend and near relation, in observing on the circumstance of papers destroyed, positively inferred the guilt of persons who had so destroyed their papers, from their very destruction?

The learned gentlemen on the other side, admit this in civil cases, and that every thing is presumed against a man, who withholds or has destroyed his papers. There is a case where marriage articles had been destroyed, and the man was imprisoned till he admitted that every thing contended for was contained in the instrument. In another case, where papers were suppressed, the man was obliged, even after their production, to abide by the statement made by the other side; merely because he had suppressed the papers; and the court would not look at them, to see their contents.

But has not the destruction of evidence, where a person has been upon a trial for his life, been adduced against him? and has not life been forfeited upon such circumstances? The solicitor-general the other day put an hypothetical case of the destruction of clothes; the learned gentleman affects to turn this into ridicule, and says, would you execute a man upon that single circumstance? No, neither did the learned manager so state it. He said, if such a circumstance were to conspire with other circumstances, it might be material in showing the guilt of the accused. The circumstance did happen, as I have been well informed, not long ago, at the assizes for the county of Surrey; where the destruction of the clothes of a man who was supposed to have committed murder, conspiring with other circumstances, was material in deciding his fate.—But have your lordships forgotten the impression made by the destruction of evidence in a trial, which a few years since created a great sensation in the country? I mean the trial of captain Donellan. Do not your lordships recollect, that because captain Donellan had washed out the phial which was presumed to have contained the poison, in order that the remaining contents of that phial might not be known, Mr. Justice Buller dwelt upon it to the jury, as one of the strong circumstances which should induce them to believe that captain Donellan had been guilty of the murder, because he had destroyed the evidence. Had it been pure water, or any other harmless thing, it would have proved his innocence, and it was presumption of his guilt, that he had thrown it away. There was another trial in the middle of the last century, which also made a great impression at the time—I mean the trial of Miss Blandy,* for the murder of her father. That unfortunate woman, after she had administered the poison, endeavoured to burn the paper in which it had been contained. It was, however, rescued from the flames: but the inference drawn from her attempt to destroy the paper was, that it contained evidence of her guilt. The counsel who opened the case against her, dwelt much upon the circumstance, and the learned judge, in summing up, took particular notice of it, as conspiring to prove her guilty of the murder.

Then, my lords, you cannot have forgotten the remark of the solicitor-general, that the vouchers destroyed by lord Melville were of infinitely more importance to him, than those destroyed by Mr. Trotter were to him. They were his vouchers against his private agent: and when lord Melville destroyed these papers (if he destroyed them at the time he tells you he did) he left himself without one single voucher, by which he could control Mr. Trotter's accounts. Whether he destroyed them before or after the release, the inference is the same; because, if he destroyed them first, he left himself without witness, and the release was framed as a justification of the act: if he destroyed them after the release, the destruction showed them to be papers bearing evidence of guilt.

My lords, in mentioning to your lordships the account given by lord Melville, in his letter to the naval commissioners, of June the 30th, 1804, that after his return to Scotland, he had, at different times, selected papers for destruction, I would again refer to the argument used by my learned friend behind me. It was upon selection these papers were destroyed. He must have read them, and destroyed those he deemed useless; he must have read them in order to decide upon their value: and what did these particular papers contain? Nothing less than all his money transactions with Mr. Trotter, for a long series of years. Having then inspected, if he will, for the first time, the contents of the Chest-account, the Account Current, and the East-India stock account, he committed them all to the flames. For what purpose? That they might not be brought in evidence against him. When did this happen? Long before the final settlement: for, the final settlement did not take place till February 1803. His letter of June the 30th, 1804, says:—"It is impossible for me to furnish you with the account you ask. It is more than four years since I left the office of treasurer of the navy, and at the period of doing so, having accounted for every sum imprested into my hands, I transferred the whole existing balance to the account of my successor: from that time I never considered any one paper or voucher that remained in my hands, as of the smallest use to myself or any other person;"—that is, from the period of the transfer of balances in 1800. Was the account really settled with Mr. Trotter in 1800? The release is signed in February 1803; the accounts of the noble defendant's first treasurer-ship had not been given into the office at that time. You have seen by the release, that at that very time, namely, February 1803, the parties declare they have mutually examined all their accounts, and in consequence of that examination, have delivered them up or will destroy them. "From that time I never considered any one paper or voucher that remained in my hands, as of the smallest use to myself, or any other person; and consequently, being often in the practice, since I retired to Scotland, of employing, occasionally, some time in sorting my papers," (this careless man, habitually occupied in sorting his papers, and of course, reading them for the purpose of assortment,) "I am satisfied there does not exist any one material by which I could make up such an account as you specify." Then all these vouchers of Mr. Trotter were gone; and yet the final settlement did not take place till February, 1803, when the noble defendant was again reluctantly dragged into office. Your lordships will be pleased further to remark, that he arrived in London in the month of April, but the necessity for the release had been so urgent, that it was sent to Scotland, in order to be signed there, although the interval between the execution of the release and the arrival of lord Melville in London was so short. My lords, I think the argument and the proof so complete on this part of the case, that I need not detain your lordships any longer.

* 18 Howell's State Trials, 1117.

My lords, I hope I have omitted nothing in reply to the defence set up by the learned counsel. I hope I have treated nothing unfairly. I protest to you that I have been actuated with a desire to view things with that degree of impartiality, which every man, engaged in such a cause, ought to possess, and with an endeavour to control and curb my feelings, which are undoubtedly strongly impressed with the criminal conduct of the noble defendant.

My lords, something remains to be said upon the mode in which the defence to the charges of the Commons has been conducted. The noble lord abandoned himself to his counsel, and by their defence of him he must now abide, the time is past in which he might have given explanations; and if, as we were told by the learned counsel in the outset of their examinations, when they contested the proof of the warrant under which Mr. Barre received his salary; when they wanted to dispute the history of England; if the noble defendant felt impatience at the mode which they then thought it their duty to adopt, how must his feelings have been tortured during the whole course of this trial! Oh! miserable man! to have been so defended! if he has explanations to give, how must his breast have laboured to tell you what was the application of the two ten thousand pounds! how must his heart have almost burst its bounds with earnest desire to lay before you the great services he has rendered, in order to receive a verdict of honourable acquittal, and to be restored to the estimation of his country. Having offered to swear to you he made no profit of public money, in the paymastership of Mr. Douglas; when we proved the first, and second Bank-note; when we proved the application of the draft for 2,000*l.*; when we proved the way in which drafts were drawn on the new, to pay debts due to the old account; when we proved his revealing his debt to Mr. Trotter; when we proved that Mr. Trotter was permitted to transfer the money from the place of lawful deposit, for corrupt purposes; when we proved that he was a participator with Mr. Trotter, in the East India stock, in the loyalty loan, in the other India stock, in the 7,000*l.* reduced, and all other various sums; when we proved how he balanced that account at last; when we proved the mode in which he borrowed the money; and when no one witness was called to contradict our proof; if he had within him that which would proclaim his innocence to the world, what agonies must he not have endured! Oh! miserable man, to have been so defended!

The time will soon arrive, when it will become your lordships' duty to pass judgment in this case. My lords, I repeat that the learned counsel on the other side, have done well; they have fought their best fight as they would have done for any individual however mean, whose life, or reputation had been committed to their care: But, my lords, might it not have been expected, from the tone which was taken by those learned gentlemen, that when their client was attacked in his fortress, they would have sallied forth, and repelled the besiegers? That they would have brought an army, to defeat the army arrayed against them? instead of that, they have been trying to escape in every direction, first to the fosse, then to the postern, and if they can but carry off the body of their client, they have left his reputation at the mercy of those who may possess themselves of the fort.—There are times, my lords, when a sovereign himself is called upon to gird on the sword, and march forth to the defence of his dominions; there are others when, through infirmity or infancy, the royal person has been given in charge to the body guard, and it may be then their duty not to fight but to fly: they have fled, they have been pursued, they have been taken, they have been produced, beaten and conquered before this court; and there is but one verdict, which according to the evidence, the Commons feel you can pass upon their devoted client.

My lords, we the managers, have executed a painful task. In the discharge of our duty, we have despised the clamour of party opposed against us; we have contemned the sneers of those who, incapable of acting from any public motive, have ascribed our conduct to such motives only as would have influenced themselves: but we cannot be insensible to the reproaches which from other quarters may have been thrown upon us; I mean from the numerous friends and connections of the noble defendant; but, my lords, whilst we deplore their injustice, we give due credit to the affectionate feelings in which they have birth.

There is a mode of defence, and there are circumstances, which might make a man like lord Melville, appear to greater advantage under trial, than he ever did in the moment of his highest prosperity, in the plenitude of his power. Persons have been accused; the turn of the times has been against them, popular clamour has unjustly pursued them, and when put to answer at the bar of justice, they have been defended so as to be highly exalted.

My lords, when the learned, the wise, the brave, the generous, the philosophic, (but unhappily incredulous) Julian, was stationed at his favourite Paris, amongst his beloved legions; his weak and suspicious brother attempted to withdraw from him the bands of veterans which surrounded his person, imputing disloyalty to the Cæsar. His affectionate troops, indignant at the injustice of the imputation, placed him upon a shield, and carried him triumphant through their admiring ranks, proclaiming the new Augustus. The foul attempt to degrade him was the means of his greater glory. If indeed, the learned counsel had defended their noble client with the shield of truth, and had afterwards borne him aloft upon its resplendent base, and carried him triumphant through the admiring crowds of his peers, what good heart would not have rejoiced? Nay, subject to the frailties of human nature, which he who denies, is either an hypocrite or a fool, in this box there would have been exaltation at his acquittal: But that he should escape by quirks and quibbles, by low means, and strained constructions, would be a matter of grief to the nation at large, a matter of eventful evil to the most remote posterity.

For the Commons, they have conducted themselves as became so great a body residing in the sanctuary of liberty. My lords, there lived in times more chivalrous than the present, a man of unshaken loyalty, of great exertion, of independent spirit, beloved by his sovereign, and by the people amongst whom he lived, he neither flattered the one nor betrayed the other, he was the chevalier Bayard. That man by the proofs he gave of his valour, and the uncorrupt integrity of his life, obtained the honourable distinction to be called "Sans Peur, et sans Reproche:" that distinction the Commons arrogate to themselves in this prosecution; they know that they entered into, and have conducted it without fear, so they trust they have closed it without reproach.

Lord Chancellor.—Mr. Plumer: Their lordships will no doubt be of opinion, that you are now at liberty to address the Court. There are two charges made against the noble defendant, previous to, and subsequent to the act of the 25th of the king. The Commons charge an offence at common law, independently of the provisions of that statute: and they charge other facts as offences against the statute. The managers in their opening (as it was their privilege to do), enlarged upon both the accusations; and you, as counsel for the noble defendant, answered their arguments: the managers for the Commons have replied; and there the proceedings must have closed, had not the positions which they maintained, and which you have controverted, been again insisted upon, on the authority of two cases which the honourable and learned manager yesterday relied on: these cases you would, by the forms of other courts be entitled to observe upon: but though the forms of courts are different, yet as justice must be the same in all places, their lordships will, no doubt, if you claim that privilege, allow you the exercise of it at this moment. You are aware, however, that the privilege is confined strictly to observations upon the cases, and that it does not entitle you to go beyond that which is the fair and liberal scope of an argument upon them. This equally applies to the honourable managers in their privilege of the ultimate reply: their own sense of justice will lead them to observe, that the authority of the court will direct the same limitation to them.

Mr. Plumer.—My lords, after the very great indulgence which the counsel for lord Melville have experienced at your lordships hands, they feel that they should be perfectly unworthy of it, if they were to trespass longer upon your lordships' time than the indispensable discharge of their duty appears to require.

I am perfectly aware of the limitation that is now imposed upon all that it is competent for me to do:—and therefore, my lords, with regard to all the legal argument, that respects the construction of the statute, I feel that it would be improper, and I hope, I am not too sanguine in saying, that I feel it would be unnecessary, to enter upon the arguments, that have been addressed on that part of the subject, and not to leave the case entirely as it now stands before your lordships.

Upon the other part of the case, to which two authorities for the first time have been adduced, on the part of the honourable and learned manager who opened the reply, under your lordships' correction I shall be at liberty to observe upon, and explain the nature of those authorities. At the same time, my lords, I feel that, in saying one word upon that part of the case, perhaps I may again subject the noble defendant to the inferences that are drawn from too anxious a disposition to rest upon any matters of law, as betraying somewhat of distrust and diffidence in the true merits of this important cause. But knowing, my lords, that I shall not suffer in your lordships minds unjustly from any inference of that nature, though I do not mean to avail myself of the great indulgence your lordships are now pleased to offer, of entering at large, upon that part of the case, I shall do it no more than barely to produce before your lordships, the record in that case that was referred to, being a part of the case that we feel it to be our duty to possess your lordships with; and entirely to leave that part of it, as well as every other, to the decision of your lordships.

My lords, two cases were cited; of the one, the King v. Munton,* I do not recollect that the particulars were stated to your lordships; and therefore I forbear to say any thing. Of the other case, the King v. Bembridge, somewhat more was stated by the honourable and learned manager [the attorney-general] who quoted that case. I do not mean to detain your lordships now, with travelling into the argument upon that: all that I shall do, will be to possess your lordships of the facts in that case, and the record upon which the Court pronounced judgment, in order to show that that case undoubtedly bears no fair application to the present. It was a case that came before the court of King's-bench, as the honourable and learned manager stated, upon a question respecting the propriety of the objections made by counsel for the defendant in arrest of judgment. Your lordships well know that, in that stage of the business, the Court were obliged to pronounce upon the case as it stood upon the record.

What the nature of the case therefore was, must appear upon that record. Now, though I have not the least doubt of the correctness of the manuscript reports that were referred to by the honourable and learned manager, yet, in a question of that nature, he will pardon me if I take the liberty of saying, that I should have thought it rather material to have brought before your lordships the terms of the record in a case arising on arrest of judgment; and upon a question whether there was stated upon the record an indictable offence. The honourable and learned manager did not state the record. It so happens, my lords, that I have now in my hand a copy of that record, in which your lordships will see that the case there stated has not the smallest application to the present. I will only very shortly possess your lordships of that record, and, upon the statement of it, will leave the case entirely for your lordships judgment.

This case, which arose in the 23rd Geo. 3rd, was upon an information in the court of King's-bench against a person of the name of Bembridge. The information that I have in my hand contains three counts, and the first of them states these facts.—It states that lord Holland had been paymaster of the forces, that a variety of accounts of receipts and payments had gone through his hands.—It states that he had gone out of his office without having passed his accounts.—It then states that, after that, a person of the name of Powell being an accountant in the office, and receiver and paymaster-general of the guards, had made up and delivered to the auditor of the imprest the account of lord Holland.—It then states that divers sums of money ought to have been inserted in the said accounts of lord Holland, and delivered in to the auditor as charges upon lord Holland; and it enumerates the several sums, amounting, I think, to what was stated before, 48,000*l.*, which was retained and withheld from the public, but to which the public had a right; but which were not inserted in the accounts. It states that these several sums of money, which ought to be inserted in the accounts, were omitted to be inserted in the accounts as charges on lord Holland, and were not in any manner brought into, or taken notice of in the said accounts, or any of them. It then states that, after the delivery of the accounts of lord Holland to the auditors of imprest, and before the final account was adjusted, the defendant Bembridge, who was an accountant in the office, and held the place of receiver and paymaster of the guards, had continued in that place six years. It then states, that the final account of lord Holland was, and continued, open and unsettled for a long time. That it was the duty of Bembridge to disclose and make known to the auditors of the imprest, to whom the final account of lord Holland had been delivered, any charges upon lord Holland which had been omitted to be inserted in the account, which were within the knowledge of Bembridge; in order that the same might be inserted in the said account: and it then charges that Bembridge, after he became, and whilst he continued accountant as aforesaid, and whilst the final account of lord Holland remained open and unsettled, was requested, by the auditors of imprest, to discover and make known to them any charges upon lord Holland within the knowledge of Bembridge, which ought to have been inserted in the accounts. It then charges that this person well knew that the said several sums of money herein before mentioned to have been omitted in the accounts, and which ought to have been inserted in the accounts, were not included therein, but were omitted to be inserted in the accounts as charges on lord Holland. It then states as a charge against the defendant, that he wrongfully, unjustly, and fraudulently contriving and intending to conceal from the auditor of imprest, to whom the first account of lord Holland was delivered as aforesaid, the said several sums of money which ought to have been charged on lord Holland as aforesaid, and to—(your lordships will have the goodness to attend to these words) and to cheat and defraud our present sovereign lord the king, did not at the several days and times when he was so requested, or at any time discover or make known to lord Sondes, the several sums of money which ought to have been inserted, but wickedly, wilfully, fraudulently, knowingly, and corruptly neglected and refused to discover them; and permitted and suffered lord Sondes the auditor, to proceed and close the first account of lord Holland, without the sums having been brought into the same, or made known to lord Sondes, contrary to the duty of him as accountant, to the evil example of others, and the deceit of the king;—What I have stated, particularly constitutes the first count in this information.

* 1 Esp. N. P. C. 60.

I will not proceed to detain your lordships with enumerating the others, because they are in substance the same, with little variations of form, but all that I meant to do, was to possess your lordships of what appears to be the case which came under the consideration of the court of King's-bench; and the only question which the Court had to consider, was whether, supposing all these facts to be true, which your lordships know in that state of the premises they must have been taken to be, whether they do or do not constitute any indictable offence: that is to say, whether a public accountant at the moment of passing his account, with the knowledge of this imposition practised upon the public, withdrawing 48,000*l.* from that account, and doing it for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the king, — whether that was or was not an indictable offence. Your lordships will have very little difficulty in supposing, and I apprehend, will not expect that we admit much when we do not in the least controvert that that was indisputably an indictable offence. This is the only case that is brought before your lordships, the particulars of it were not before stated: I hope I have not detained your lordships improperly, with barely possessing your lordships of what the facts, which constitute that case, are upon this record.

Mr. Adam.—I have nothing to add.

Mr. Attorney General.—My lords, if the managers for the House of Commons, in the opening of this business, particularly my learned friend who summed up the evidence upon it, did not state any of the circumstances which were afterwards mentioned; and particularly the case to which the learned counsel has just alluded, it was undoubtedly because they thought the law so clear, and incontrovertible, that they could not foresee that it would be disputed. My lords, I shall not add any thing by way of assigning to your lordships any reason for that omission of which the learned gentleman seems to complain.

My lords, in stating the case to your lordships in my reply, I took the liberty of doing it under a perfect conviction that nothing could be so important to the public, as your lordships settlement of the principles laid down by the learned counsel for the noble defendant; and upon which they sought from your lordships his acquittal.

My lords, it was for that purpose that, amidst a great variety of matter of which I was possessed, my wish to aid your lordships desire to bring this matter to a speedy termination, led me to confine myself to the judgment of the court of King's-bench upon that recent case of the king v. Bembridge, and barely to name, which was all that I did, the case which followed, and which occurred in the year 1793, the King v. Munton. My lords, I stated the case of the King v. Bembridge, not because I supposed, or because I meant to have it understood, that the facts of that case in themselves were specifically the facts which occur in this case, that they were facts exactly and identically of the same description: I possessed the record, having been furnished with the postea the evening before, when my determination to trouble your lordships upon this subject was taken. I possessed the postea, and had caused an abstract of the first count to be made: That abstract I have now in my hand, and it does not differ very materially from the abstract with which the learned counsel has been furnished. The difference only consists in an omission or two, which I shall point out to your lordships.

Before I do so however, you will permit me to observe, that, in stating the case, I mentioned two of your lordships having been counsel in it. I thought this necessary, because, following up the observations which I made with the information that the case was not in print, it was my duty to enable your lordships to get the best information (which I was satisfied you would obtain) on the subject, in order that you might check or correct any account of it with which I was furnished. I believe your lordships will do me the justice to recollect my having stated that there was not in print any report of that case, but that I was in possession of two manuscript reports of it; my having taken the liberty of reading what I thought material from both those manuscripts; and my having stated not only that the noble lord who now presides in this House was counsel for Mr. Bembridge, but also that the noble and learned lord who lately presided in this House and in the court of Chancery was counsel for the defendant in that case. It is unnecessary for me to add, that that circumstance might enable such of your lordships as think it material to possess yourselves of farther information upon the subject.

The first count in question, besides stating what Mr. Plumer has cited, states that the office of accountant in the paymaster's office, was an office of trust, touching the making up of accounts in the Exchequer; that the accounts of lord Holland had not been made up and delivered to the auditor of imprest, at the time he went out of office; that on the 11th of January, 1782, his accounts were made up, not by Mr. Bembridge the defendant, but by John Powell, esq. then being accountant in the paymaster's office, and delivered to the auditor of imprest, in order to be settled; that divers sums of money ought to be inserted in these accounts as charges on lord Holland; and then it is stated that before the account was adjusted, Charles Bembridge, esq. became accountant in the office of paymaster, and continued so until the 22nd of February, 1783; that the final account continued unsettled for six years after Mr. Bembridge became accountant; that it was the duty of Mr. Bembridge, as accountant, to disclose to lord Sondes any sums which had been omitted to be charged on lord Holland, in order that the same might be charged. That Mr. Bembridge was requested by lord Sondes, whilst the final account was unsettled, to disclose any sums which had been omitted; that Mr. Bembridge well knew the several sums above mentioned to have been omitted, but fraudulently intending to conceal from lord Sondes the several sums of money above-mentioned, and thereby to defraud his majesty, did not make known to lord Sondes, when he was so requested, such sums, but fraudulently and corruptly permitted him to proceed to close the final account without their being brought into the same.

It may be material, as your lordships may perhaps have occasion to inspect that record, to point out that, in the third count, the word cheat does not occur; and the verdict is a general verdict. Then all who have the goodness to retain any memory of what I took the liberty of stating to your lordships, will recollect that I stated lord Mansfield's judgment, concurred in by the rest of the judges of the King's Bench, expressly for the purpose of proving to your lordships not the facts of the case, but the principles upon which the judgment of the Court proceeded: principles, which I contended for, in all that I submitted to your lordships; and which I thought established by the highest authority, when I found them established by the court of King's Bench, in the judgment of that Court pronounced by lord Mansfield. All I shall take the liberty of reading to your lordships is this short passage (which I shall not now repeat from both the manuscript reports, the reports are concurrent), and I do it in order to justify the managers of the Commons, and satisfy your lordships, that what they undertook to show was, the principle of law, but not the particular case; the omission of public duty, whether accompanied by fraud or not; that the purpose for which this case was cited, was to show that the omission of the discharge of public duty was an indictable public offence; the words which I took the liberty of reading to your lordships, are the words of the noble judge who pronounced the judgment of the Court.—“It is said, this is a mere civil injury, a fraud, a breach of trust, and not indictable; and that there is no precedent of such an offence being indicted: the law, though explained by particular instances, does not consist in them; but in principles, which govern the Court as they arise, that is, as the instances arise. There are two principles which apply to the present case; first, that where any person accepts of an office of trust and confidence respecting the public, especially when it is attended with profit, he is amenable to the king; and this can only be criminally. This holds by whomsoever or howsoever the officer is appointed; whether appointed by his majesty or appointed by any other authority; there are many offices respecting the public which are not given by the king; for instance, the masters in Chancery.” Then Vidian's Entries 213, is referred to, which is a precedent of an information against the custos brevium of the court of King's Bench for losing a roll: “Had it been a steward of a manor, he would have been liable to an action only; but being a public officer, he was prosecuted by information. Secondly, there is another principle; any breach of trust, fraud, or imposition, respecting the king and the public, which between subject and subject would only be actionable, if it concerns the public, is indictable. There are some authorities for this, though the principle is sufficient, as it is essential to the existence of the country. In the time of Edward the third, it is clear that an indictment lay for the omission or concealment of a pecuniary duty to the king. Assise 27, Placito 17. Had that been between subject and subject, it would not have been indictable. In 1 Rolle's Reports 2, lord Coke says, If a person collect any thing pro bono publico, and do not employ it accordingly, he may be indicted. In 2 Hawkins, 25. sect. 4. the distinction between public and private injuries is clearly taken. In 6 Modern. 96, it is said, any public officer is indictable for misbehaviour in his office; and there is no doubt, that he is a public officer who has so much power over the public revenue.”

My lords, I shall not make any observations upon this, but stop by reading it as I have done before; and by barely adding that my purpose in stating it to your lordships, was not with a view to the facts of the case, but to state this as a text, to show your lordships the principles upon which the court of King's Bench proceed; and for that reason, out of the great number of pages in both manuscript reports which are occupied by this case, I thought myself justified in troubling your lordships with the conclusion of the judgment of lord Mansfield only.

Adjourned to the Chamber of Parliament.

Tuesday, June 3, 1806.

The lords being met in the Chamber of Parliament, the following questions were put to the judges:—

1st. Whether monies issued from the Exchequer to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, pursuant to the act 25 Geo. 3, c. 31, may be lawfully drawn from the said Bank by the person duly authorised by the treasurer to draw upon the Bank, according to the said act, the drafts of such person being made for the purpose of discharging bills actually assigned upon the treasurer before the date of such drafts, but not actually presented for payment before such drawing? and whether such monies, so drawn, for such purpose, may be lawfully lodged and deposited in the hands of a banker, other than the Bank, until the payment of such assigned bills, and for the purpose of making payment thereof, when the payment thereof shall be demanded, or whether such act, in so drawing such monies, and lodging and depositing the same as aforesaid, is in the law a crime or offence?

2nd. Whether monies issued from the Exchequer to the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of the navy, pursuant to the act 25 Geo. 3, cap. 31, may be lawfully drawn therefrom, by drafts drawn in the name, and on the behalf of the said treasurer, in the form prescribed in the said act, for the purpose of such monies being ultimately applied to navy services; but in the mean time, and until the same should be required to be so applied for the purpose of being deposited in the hands of a private banker, or other private depositary of such monies, in the name, and under the immediate sole control and disposition of some other person or persons, than the said treasurer himself?

Thursday, June 5, 1806.

The lords being met in the Chamber of parliament, the lord chief justice of the court of Common Pleas [sir James Mansfield] delivered the unanimous opinion of the judges upon the first question.

That monies issued from the Exchequer to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of his majesty's navy, pursuant to the act 25 Geo. 3, cap. 31, may be lawfully drawn from the said Bank, by the person duly authorised by the treasurer to draw upon the Bank, according to the said act, the drafts of such person being made for the purpose of discharging bills actually assigned upon the treasurer before the dates of such drafts, but not actually presented for payment before such drawing, and that such monies, so drawn for such purpose, may be lawfully lodged and deposited in the hands of a banker, other than the Governor and Company of the Bank until the payment of such assigned bills, and for the purpose of making payment thereof, when the payment thereof shall be demanded; and that such act, in so drawing such monies, and lodging and depositing the same as aforesaid, is not in the law a crime or offence.

Upon the Second Question,—If by the expression “for the purpose of being deposited in the hands of a private banker, or other private depositary,” is to be understood that such was the object or reason of drawing the money out of the Bank of England, the judges answer, that monies may not be lawfully drawn out of the Bank of England by the treasurer of the navy for such purpose, although the money be intended to be, and may in fact be, ultimately applied to navy services. But if, by that expression, it is to be understood, that such intermediate deposit in the hands of a private banker or depositary, is made, bona fide, as the means, or supposed means, of more conveniently applying the money to navy services, in that case, the judges answer, that monies issued from the Exchequer to the Bank of England, on account of the treasurer of the navy, pursuant to the act of the 25th Geo. 3, cap. 31, may be lawfully drawn therefrom by drafts drawn in the name, and on the behalf of the treasurer, in the form prescribed by the said act, for the purpose of such monies being ultimately applied to navy services, although in the mean time, and until the same shall be required to be so applied, the money may be deposited in the hands of a private banker, or other private depositary of such monies, in the name, and under the immediate sole control and disposition of some other person or persons than the treasurer himself.

Friday, June 6, 1806.

The lords being met in the Chamber of Parliament, the following question was put to the judges

3. Whether it was lawful for the treasurer of the Navy, before the passing of the act of 25 Geo. 3rd, c. 31, and more especially, when by warrant from his majesty, his salary, as such treasurer as aforesaid, was augmented in full satisfaction for all wages, fees, and other profits and emoluments, to apply any sum of money imprested to him for navy services, to any other use whatsoever, public or private, without express authority for so doing; and whether such application by such treasurer, would have been a misdemeanor, or punishable by information or indictment?

Monday, June 9, 1806.

The lords being met in the Chamber of Parliament, the lord chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas delivered the unanimous opinion of the judges upon the third question.

That it was not unlawful for the treasurer of the Navy, before the act 25th Geo. 3rd, c. 31, although after the warrant stated in the question, to apply any sum of money imprested to him for navy services, to other uses, public or private without express authority for so doing, so as to constitute a misdemeanor punishable by information or indictment.

SIXTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, June 12, 1806.

The lords and others came from the Chamber of Parliament into Westminster-hall, in the same order as on the first day of the trial.

Lord Chancellor.—My lords, your lordships having fully heard and considered of the evidence and the arguments in this case have agreed upon several questions, which are severally to be put to your lordships, and the first question is this:—

Is Henry viscount Melville guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him in the First Article of the impeachment or not guilty?

John lord Crewe, what says your lordship on this First Article?

Whereupon John lord Crewe, standing up, in his place, uncovered, and laying his right hand upon his breast, answered—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

In like manner, the several lords, after mentioned, being all that were present, answered as follows:—

James Lord Lauderdale—Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles Lord Barham—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Sheffield—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles George Lord Arden—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Lord Ellenborough—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Murrrough Lord Thomond—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Alleyne Lord St. Helens—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Joshua Lord Carysfort—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Eldon—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Lord Lilford—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Northwick—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Gilbert Lord Minto—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Lord Bolton—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles Lord Bayning—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Robert Lord Carrington—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Rolle—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Lord Harewood—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Francis Lord De Dunstanville and Bassett—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Christopher Lord Dawson—Guilty, upon my honour.

Francis Lord Stuart, of Castle Stuart—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles Lord Yarborough—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Lord Dundas—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Orlando Lord Bradford—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Lord Mulgrave—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Upper Ossory—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

William Lord Auckland—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Lord Douglas of Lochleven—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Lord Gage—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Archibald Lord Douglas of Douglas—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

James Bucknell Lord Verulam—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

James Lord Fife—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

William Lord Amherst—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Richard Lord Braybrooke—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Lord Kenyon—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Robert Lord Hawkesbury—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry James Lord Montagu—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Lord Berwick—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Boringdon—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Sommers—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas James Lord Bulkeley—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Elliot—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Francis Lord Rawdon—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Lord Rodney—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

William Lord Grantley—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Talbot Lord Dynevor—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Richard Lord Holland—Guilty, upon my honour.

Frederick Lord Boston—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Philip Lord Grantham—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Frederick Lord Ponsonby—Guilty, upon my honour.

Peter Lord King—Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Robert Lord Hay—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

William Shaw Lord Cathcart—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Lord Ashburnham—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Lord Clifton—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Lord Spencer of Wormleighton—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

St. Andrew Lord St. John of Bletsoe—Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Lord De Clifford—Guilty, upon my honour.

John [Buckner] Lord Bishop of Chichester—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Richard [Beadon] Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Samuel [Horsley] Lord Bishop of St. Asaph—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

William Viscount Lowther—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Viscount Hampden—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Viscount Wentworth—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Viscount Hereford—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles William Earl of Charleville—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Earl of Powis—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edmund Henry Earl of Limerick—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Earl of Chichester—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Onslow—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

James Earl of Rosslyn—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Dupré Earl of Caledon—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Richard Earl of Donoughmore—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Richard Earl of Lucan—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Willoughby Earl of Enniskillen—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Earl of Longford—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Frederick Earl of Westmeath—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Earl of Caernarvon—Guilty, upon my honour.

David William Earl of Mansfield—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Earl of Digby—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Hugh Earl Fortescue—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Richard Earl of Mount Edgecumbe—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Earl Strange—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Jeffreys Earl Camden—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Robert Earl Grosvenor—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Earl of Uxbridge—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Earl Bathurst—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Earl of Chatham—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Jacob Earl of Radnor—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Philip Earl of Hardwicke—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Egremont—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Robert Earl of Buckinghamshire—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

James Earl Graham—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Macclesfield—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles Earl Stanhope—Guilty, upon my honour.

Peter Earl Cowper—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Frederick William Earl of Bristol—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer—Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Glasgow—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Earl of Stair—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Earl of Breadalbane—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Aboyne—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Earl of Kellie—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Earl of Strathmore—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Earl of Doncaster—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Frederick Earl of Carlisle—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Essex—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Earl of Westmoreland—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John William Earl of Bridgewater—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Earl of Suffolk and Berks—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Earl of Derby—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

George Earl of Dartmouth, lord chamberlain of the household—Not Guilty upon my honour.

Heneage Earl of Aylesford, lord steward of the household—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Thomas Marquess of Headfort—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Francis Marquess of Hertford—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles Marquess Cornwallis—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John James Marquess of Abercorn—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

James Marquess of Salisbury—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles Marquess of Winchester—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

John Henry Duke of Rutland—Not Guilty upon my honour.

Aubrey Duke of St. Albans—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Charles Duke of Beaufort—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Edward Adolphus Duke of Somerset—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Charles Duke of Norfolk, earl marshal—Guilty, upon my honour.

Henry Viscount Sidmouth, lord privy seal—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

William Earl Fitzwilliam, lord president of the council—Guilty, upon my honour.

His Highness, William Frederick Duke of Gloucester—Guilty, upon my honour.

His Royal Highness Adolphus Frederick Duke of Cambridge—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

His Royal Highness Augustus Frederick Duke of Sussex—Guilty, upon my honour.

His Royal Highness Ernest Augustus Duke of Cumberland—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

His Royal Highness Edward Duke of Kent—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

His Royal Highness William Henry Duke of Clarence—Guilty, upon my honour.

His Royal Highness Frederick Duke of York—Not Guilty, upon my honour.

Lord Chancellor, And I, Thomas lord Erskine, am of opinion, that Henry viscount Melville is Not Guilty of this first article of the impeachment, upon my honour.

Then, after proclamation for silence, the Lord Chancellor said, the second question I am to put to your lordships is this:—

Is Henry viscount Melville guilty of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him, in the second article of the impeachment—or not guilty?

And after a similar proclamation for silence, between putting the question on each article, observing the same form throughout the ten articles, ending with his own opinion.

The opinions delivered by their lordships in answer to the several questions were as follow:

|                                                                      | 1st  | 2nd  | 3rd  | 4th  | 5th  | 6th  | 7th  | 8th  | 9th  | 10th |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|
| Edmund Henry Earl of Limerick .....                                  | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Thomas Earl of Chichester .....                                      | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| George Earl of Onslow .....                                          | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| James Earl of Rosslyn .....                                          | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.C. |
| Dupré Earl of Caledon .....                                          | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Richard Earl of Donoughmore .....                                    | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Richard Earl of Lucan .....                                          | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Willoughby Earl of Enniskillen .....                            | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Thomas Earl of Longford .....                                        | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| George Frederick Earl of Westmeath .....                             | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Henry Earl of Caernarvon .....                                       | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. |
| David William Earl of Mansfield .....                                | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Edward Earl of Digby .....                                           | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Hugh Earl Fortescue .....                                            | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Richard Earl of Mount Edgecumbe .....                                | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Earl Strange .....                                              | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Jeffreys Earl Camden .....                                      | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Robert Earl Grosvenor ..                                             | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Henry Earl of Uxbridge .....                                         | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Henry Earl Bathurst .....                                            | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Earl of Chatham .....                                           | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Jacob Earl of Radnor .....                                           | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | N.G. |
| Philip Earl of Harwicke .....                                        | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| George Earl of Egremont .....                                        | N.G. | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Robert Earl of Buckinghamshire .....                                 | N.G. | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| James Earl Graham .....                                              | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| George Earl of Macclesfield .....                                    | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Charles Earl Stanhope .....                                          | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | G.   | G.   | G.   |
| Peter Earl Cowper .....                                              | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. |
| Frederick William Earl of Bristol .....                              | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Edward Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer .....                        | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | G.   | G.   |
| George Earl of Glasgow .....                                         | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Earl of Stair .....                                             | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Earl of Breadalbane .....                                       | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| George Earl of Aboyne .....                                          | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Thomas Earl of Kellie .....                                          | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Earl of Strathmore .....                                        | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Henry Earl of Doncaster .....                                        | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Frederick Earl of Carlisle .....                                     | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.C. | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| George Earl of Essex .....                                           | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| George Earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham .....                       | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Earl of Westmoreland .....                                      | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John William Earl of Bridgewater .....                               | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Earl of Suffolk and Berks .....                                 | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | *    | G.   | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. |
| Edward Earl of Derby .....                                           | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. |
| George Earl of Dartmouth, Lord Chamberlain ofthe Household ..... | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Heneage Earl of Aylesford, Lord Steward of theHousehold .....    | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Thomas Marquess of Headfort .....                                    | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Francis Marquess of Hertford .....                                   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Charles Marquess Cornwallis .....                                    | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| John James Marquess of Abercorn .....                                | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| James Marquess of Salisbury .....                                    | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Charles Marquess of Winchester .....                                 | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. |
| John Henry Duke of Rutland .....                                     | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Aubrey Duke of St. Albans .....                                      | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Henry Charles Duke of Beaufort .....                                 | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Edward Adolphus Duke of Somerset .....                               | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Charles Duke of Norfolk Earl Marshal .....                           | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. |
| Henry Viscount Sidmouth, Lord Privy Seal .....                       | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. |
| William Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord President of theCouncil .....     | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   |
| His Highness William Frederick Duke of Gloucester .....              | G.   | N.G. | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | G.   | N.G. |
| His Royal Highness Adolphus Frederick Duke ofCambridge .....     | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| His Royal Highness Augustus Frederick Duke ofSussex .....        | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | G.   |

* No Vote.

|                                                             | 1st  | 2nd  | 3rd  | 4th  | 5th  | 6th  | 7th  | 8th  | 9th  | 10th |
|-------------------------------------------------------------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|
| His Royal Highness Ernest Augustus Duke of Cumberland ..... | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| His Royal Highness Edward Duke of Kent.....                 | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| His Royal Highness William Henry Duke of Clarence.....      | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | G.   | N.G. | G.   |
| His Royal Highness Frederick Duke of York ...               | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| Thomas Lord Erskine Lord Chancellor .....                   | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | G.   | G.   | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |

The Clerk, with the Lord Chancellor, proceeded to cast up the numbers at the Woolpack, which they found to be as follow :

|                  | 1st | 2nd | 3rd | 4th | 5th | 6th | 7th | 8th | 9th | 10th |
|------------------|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|------|
| Not Guilty ..... | 120 | 81  | 83  | 135 | 131 | 88  | 85  | 121 | 121 | 124  |
| Guilty.....      | 15  | 54  | 52  | 0   | 3   | 47  | 50  | 14  | 14  | 11   |
| Majority .....   | 105 | 27  | 31  | 135 | 128 | 41  | 35  | 107 | 107 | 113  |

The numbers being ascertained, the Lord Chancellor ordered proclamation for silence ; which being made, his lordship addressed the House as follows :—

My lords, a majority of the lords have acquitted Henry viscount Melville of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him by the impeachment of the Commons, and of all things contained therein.—And then, addressing himself to lord Melville, the Lord Chancellor said,

Henry viscount Melville, I am to acquaint your lordship, that you are acquitted of the articles of impeachment exhibited against you by the Commons for high crimes and misdemeanors, and of all things contained therein.

Lord Melville stood whilst the lord chancellor addressed him, and made a low bow when he had finished.

Lord Chancellor.—Is it your lordship's pleasure to adjourn to the chamber of parliament? —Ordered.

Adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The House was resumed in the chamber of parliament.

Lord Chancellor.—Your lordships have resolved and adjudged, that Henry viscount Melville is acquitted of the several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the Commons for high crimes and misdemeanors, and of all things contained therein ; and the impeachment is therefore dismissed.

Then the following order was made :—

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the lord high chancellor do give orders for the printing and publishing the trial of lord Melville ; and in addition thereto, the several questions put to the judges on Tuesday the 3rd, and Friday the 6th, of this instant June, and their answers thereto ; and that no other person do presume to print the same.

On May 23rd the thanks of the House of Commons were voted to the managers, upon the motion of the secretary at war. Vide 7 Hans. Parl. Deb. 351.

END OF VOL. XXIX.

|      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |
|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|
| 1st  | 2nd  | 3rd  | 4th  | 5th  | 6th  | 7th  | 8th  | 9th  | 10th |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |
| N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. | N.G. |

The Clerk, with the Lord Chancellor, proceeded to cast up the numbers at the Woolsack, which they found to be as follow :

|     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |      |
|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|------|
| 1st | 2nd | 3rd | 4th | 5th | 6th | 7th | 8th | 9th | 10th |
| 120 | 61  | 57  | 138 | 101 | 82  | 82  | 141 | 161 | 194  |
| 15  | 24  | 22  | 0   | 3   | 47  | 50  | 14  | 14  | 11   |
| 105 | 27  | 31  | 132 | 128 | 41  | 32  | 107 | 107 | 113  |

The numbers being ascertained, the Lord Chancellor, in pursuance of the resolution, which he had taken, his lordship addressed the House as follows :—
 My lords, the result of the trial of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him, is the acquittal of the defendant, and of all things contained therein. And I am addressing myself to Lord Melville, the Lord Chancellor, and to the House of Commons, that the trial of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him, is the acquittal of the defendant, and of all things contained therein; and the impeachment is therefore dismissed.

Then the following order was made :—
 It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the Lord high chancellor do give orders for the printing and publishing the trial of Lord Melville; and in addition thereto, the several questions put to the judges on Tuesday the 3d, and Friday the 5th of this instant June, and their answers thereon; and that no other person do presume to print the same.

On Monday the 11th of the month of June, 1800, the House of Commons were voted to the minutes, upon the motion of the Hon. Mr. Pitt, that the House do resolve, that the trial of Lord Melville, and the answers to the questions put to the judges, be printed and published.

The House then adjourned to the 12th of the month of June, 1800, at ten o'clock.

The numbers being ascertained, the Lord Chancellor, in pursuance of the resolution, which he had taken, his lordship addressed the House as follows :—
 My lords, the result of the trial of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him, is the acquittal of the defendant, and of all things contained therein. And I am addressing myself to Lord Melville, the Lord Chancellor, and to the House of Commons, that the trial of the high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him, is the acquittal of the defendant, and of all things contained therein; and the impeachment is therefore dismissed.

Then the following order was made :—
 It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the Lord high chancellor do give orders for the printing and publishing the trial of Lord Melville; and in addition thereto, the several questions put to the judges on Tuesday the 3d, and Friday the 5th of this instant June, and their answers thereon; and that no other person do presume to print the same.

Cobbett, William, 1763-1835 / Cobbett, William, / Howell, Thomas Bayly

Cobbett's complete Collection of State Trials and proceedings for high treason and other crimes and misdemeanors from the earliest period to the present time with notes and other illustrations

Bd.: Vol. 29. - 1804 - 1806

London (1821)

Crim. 59 r-29

urn:nbn:de:bvb:12-bsb10394038-5